PATERSON, J. On August 25, 1884, in an action pending between plaintiff and his wife, in the superior court, the bonds of matrimony existing between the parties were dissolved, and Spencer, the plaintiff herein, was ordered to pay to his wife the sum of $50 per month alimony. The decree was on May 13, 1887, so modified as to require him to pay the sum of $25 per month. On December 24, 1888, Mrs. Spencer presented to, and filed in, the court below an affidavit alleging that nothing had been paid to her under the modified decree for alimony for over six months prior to that date, although the plaintiff was and had been amply able to respond to the order. Spencer, the petitioner herein, was thereupon cited to show cause before the court why he should not be punished for contempt. The parties appeared before the court on December 27th, and after a full hearing the court decided that the petitioner herein had contumaciously refused to obey the order of the court, adjudged him guilty of contempt, and committed him to the custody of the sheriff until the amount of alimony due should be paid. On the following day his attorneys gave notice that he would apply to respondent herein, Hon. F. W. Lawler, presiding judge of the department in which the order adjudging petitioner guilty of contempt was made, for a discharge under the provisions of section 1143, Code Civil Proc., et seq. It is alleged in the petition herein that respondent sent a messenger to petitioner's attorneys, informing them that he would not hear the application for a discharge on the 31st day of December, the time fixed in the notice, or at any other time; that, nevertheless, said attorneys appeared in court on the day last named to make the application aforesaid, but respondent was not present to hear it. Upon these facts the petition was filed herein February 2, 1889, asking for a writ of mandate commanding respondent to hear petitioner's application for a discharge from imprisonment. In his answer the respondent admits that an application was made, as alleged, for a discharge on December 28th, but alleges that he did not consider such an examination necessary at that time, because he had fully and fairly examined into the matter of petitioner's ability to pay the alimony on the day previous, but that he (respondent) at all times since the expiration of 10 days from and after December 27th has held himself in readiness as judge of said court, and is now ready and willing, to make whatever examination, and to hear whatever testimony, may be produced by petitioner touching his ability to pay the several sums of money as ordered. We think that the respondent properly refused to again examine into the matter so soon after the examination which was held on December 27, 1888. In re Wilson, 75 Cal. 580, 17 Pac. Rep. 698. Furthermore, it appears, taking the answer of the respondent as true,—and there is nothing to the contrary, except the allegation that a messenger informed the attorneys of the petitioner that respondent would not hear it at all,—that if the application had been renewed at any time subsequent to the expiration of the 10 days referred to by the respondent, and before the time when this petition was filed herein, the respondent would have made the examination which we are asked here to require him to make. The attorneys for petitioner ought not to have relied upon communications from a messenger or the clerk; they should have applied to the judge of the court. If they had done so, this petition would have been unnecessary. The matter now between the parties seems to be one simply of costs. In view of the facts that petitioner's application would have been granted if made to the court below at any time after January 6th, and that no application was made, we think he should pay the costs of this proceeding. Petition dismissed.

BARTLETT v. ODD-FELLOWS' SAV. BANK.

(No. 11,871.)

ATTORNEY AND CLIENT—CONTRACTS.

1. Where the attorney of a corporation is employed at a salary which, as also his term of employment, may be changed at the option of the corporation, there is nothing illegal or improper in his making a contract with the corporation for a special fee in a special case; no undue influence, persuasion, or misrepresentation being used by him.

2. Under an agreement by which, for his legal services in a case, the attorney was to receive a fee contingent upon the amount the corporation should receive from the opposite party, and payable when so received, the damages for discharging the attorney without cause before the services were completed are the stipulated portion of the amount received by the corporation, with interest from the date of its receipt.

3. In such case the statute of limitations would not begin to run against the attorney's claim for damages until the receipt of the money by the corporation.

4. Allegations in the complaint that, by reason of the contract, defendant is under an obligation to pay plaintiff a certain sum of money, but has refused to pay the same, and that, therefore, such sum and interest thereon are due, for which judgment is prayed, sufficiently allege that plaintiff has sustained damages.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; M. A. EDMONDS, Judge.

C. L. Tilden, for appellant. Stanly, Stoney & Hayes, for respondent.

FOOTE, C. This action was brought by an attorney at law to recover a sum of money alleged to be due him by the defendant. Judgment passed for the plaintiff as prayed for, from which and an order denying a new trial the defendant appeals. The points made for the reversal of the judgment and order are (1) that the facts set up in the complaint show that the action was not brought to recover compensation for services rendered as an attorney, but that the cause of action is founded upon a breach of contract by the defendant, and arose when the relation of attorney and client was terminated, and was therefore barred by the statute of limitations; (2) that the contract, as alleged, is of a kind where the presumption arises that it has been entered into without consideration, and under undue influence, and this presumption has not been overcome by the plaintiff; (3) that the contract alleged was entered into by the defendant while laboring under a mistake of fact, and that the defendant had a right under the law to rescind it; (4) that the complaint is insufficient, in that it does not contain an allegation of damages, and therefore is not sufficient to support the judgment.

The case, as presented by the record, is one where an attorney at law, who was the general attorney of the corporation, at a salary which might be changed at the option of the corporation, and whose period of employment as such was subject to the same condition, was voluntarily, and without any effort, fraud, or undue influence on his part, employed specially by the corporation, through its proper officers, to perform certain special work, which he was ready and willing to perform, and did partially perform, but which the defendant prevented him from fully accomplishing, through no fault of his. The compensation of the attorney was to depend for its time of payment upon the time when the corporation should obtain by judgment or compromise the payment of a claim it had against William Sharon. Its amount was to be controlled by the amount received from said Sharon. A certain sum of money was received from that source by the corporation, but before that time it had discharged the plaintiff from being its attorney, and, on his demanding the amount of money which he claimed under the contract that he was entitled to have, payment was refused, and before the time of the running of the statute of limitations from the date of the reception of the money by the corporation this suit was instituted. The corporation had the power to change the amount of the attorney's salary in its general employment at any time; so it could as to the term of his employment. In this existing state of relationship of the parties it does not seem at all wrong that in a special case the attorney should enter into contract with his principal for a special fee; and if, as in this case, the employment is voluntarily tendered to him by those competent to contract with him, with a full knowledge of their right and of the circumstances under which they are acting, we do not perceive anything improper in it. Mr. Bartlett, the plaintiff, did not seek the employment; it was tendered to him. He did not misstate any facts, or mislead the defendant. The contract was entered into with a true appreciation of the situation surrounding the transaction, and was in no sense unfair. To us it seems as if the plaintiff was discharged without cause, and did not forfeit any of his rights. The suit has been instituted to recover the amount of money to which the plaintiff would have been entitled had the defendant allowed him to complete the services which he had commenced to perform. If the defendant, by its wrongful conduct, prevents the performance of acts which entitle a party to a specific recompense, it would seem that such amount and interest from the time it became due may be recovered in an action which sets forth such a state of facts.

The plaintiff could not sue for damages resulting from his discharge, at the time of such discharge, because he could recover no money under his contract until the defendant should be paid some by William Sharon. The moment that money came to the hands of the defendant, and not until then, was the plaintiff entitled to his proportionate share of it. His cause of action could not accrue until the condition had happened; that is, the money had been paid by William Sharon to the defendant, by means of which alone the plaintiff would be entitled to anything. Had the plaintiff brought his action for damages for the non-compliance of the defendant with its contract, in discharging him without allowing him fully to perform the services he had undertaken, the defense would have been that no damages could be recovered, because no money had been received from William Sharon; that the condition on which the plaintiff was alone to be paid had not happened; and the amount of his compensation could not be determined, as it also was contingent on, and a proportionate part of, the amount which Mr. Sharon might pay. There can be no doubt that the plaintiff's cause of action accrued when the defendant received the money, and refused to pay him his share of it. The statute of limitations did not, therefore, bar the action. The detriment caused by the breach of the defendant's obligation to pay the plaintiff the amount of money which it had agreed to pay is the amount due by the terms of the obligation, with interest thereon. Civil Code, § 3302. The allegations of the complaint are that the defendant is under an obligation to pay the plaintiff a certain sum of money and interest, and that it has refused to comply with such obligation, and that, therefore, a certain sum of money and interest is due, for which judgment is prayed. When the plaintiff, as here, alleges facts to exist which, if proved, would entitle him to recover the sum of money he demands from the defendant, he has shown, so far as the recitals of the complaint can, that he has sustained damages. When he proves the facts he should recover a judgment for the sum of money he has thus shown himself to be entitled to. If he states the facts in his complaint which in law constitute his damages and their measure, he has shown enough in the pleading to warrant a recovery of what he claims, if his proof corresponds to his allegations. We perceive no prejudicial error in the record, and advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are affirmed.

COUSINS v. PARTRIDGE. (No. 11,920.)

NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS—MATURITY—PRACTICE.

1. Civil Code Cal. § 3135, providing that "the apparent maturity of a promissory note payable at sight or on demand is" six months after date, if it does not bear interest, etc., does not overturn the rule that as to the maker a note payable on demand is due presently without any demand, but, as shown by the context, relates to the rights and obligations of indorsers, etc.

2. An instruction that the execution of the note sued on "is just about the only question for you to determine," is not open to the objection that it takes from the jury the issue as to whether there was any consideration for the note, where, in the next sentence, the court says, "the first and principal question for you to determine is," was this note duly signed, etc., "and, if so, was there any consideration for it," and afterwards discusses the question of consideration fully.

3. It is not reversible error for the court to read an extract from the opinion of the highest court of another state, containing a correct statement of the law and applicable to the case on trial, the only comment made thereon by the trial court being that "it is a case somewhat similar to this."

4. There was no error or abuse of discretion in allowing plaintiff to introduce certain testimony after defendant had closed his evidence.

T Z. Blakeman, for appellant. Wm. H. & Wm. B. Sharp, for respondent.

MCFARLAND, J. This is an action on a promissory note alleged to have been made by Louis G. Partridge, deceased, on February 19, 1885, for $2,000, payable to plaintiff on demand after date. The answer denies that the note was ever made or delivered by the deceased to plaintiff, or that there was "any consideration for the said promissory note." The case was tried without a jury, and the verdict and judgment were for plaintiff. Defendant appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying a new trial.

1. Appellant contends strenuously that the evidence is insufficient to justify the jury in finding that the deceased made the note, or that there was any consideration for it; but if it could be rightfully said, in the language of appellant's counsel, that "it is difficult to avoid looking upon the claim of Mr. Cousins in this connection without suspicion," that, at least, is all that could be rightfully said on the subject. There certainly was strong evidence tending to show both the making of the note and the consideration, and we cannot say that the verdict is not justified by the evidence, and that, notwithstanding the fact that plaintiff and the deceased held the relation towards each other of attorney and client.

2. Appellant contends that the court, when charging the jury, erred in reading part of the opinion of the court of appeals of the state of New York in a certain case decided in that court. Reading from the opinion of another court when instructing a jury is, perhaps, not a practice to be commended; but as the part of the decision read in the case at bar appears to be a correct statement of the law, and applicable to the case before the jury, we do not see how the practice in this particular case affords a ground for a reversal of the judgment. All that the court told the jury before reading the extract from the opinion, was that "it was a case somewhat similar to this."

3. Appellant objects to the charge of the court, because in one place the jury are told that the execution of the note "is just about the only question for you to determine;" the argument being that this language took away from the jury the question whether or not there was any consideration for it. But in the next sentence the court says: "The first and principal question for you to determine is, was this promissory note signed by Louis G. Partridge in his life-time, and, if so, was there any consideration for it;" and afterwards, the question of consideration is fully discussed. The jury, therefore, could not have been misguided in the matter complained of; and we think that the instructions on the subject of consideration were correct.

4. There was no error or abuse of discretion in the court in allowing plaintiff to introduce certain testimony after defendant had closed his evidence.

5. Appellant complains of one or two remarks made by the court to counsel during the trial of the cause, about the immateriality of certain evidence which was admitted; but no exceptions were taken to the remarks at the time they were made, and they are not brought here in any legal way for review, and, if we could review them, they are not of sufficient importance to work a reversal of the judgment.

6. Appellant contends that the motion for nonsuit should have been granted because the note was not due when the action was commenced. The note was made and dated February 19, 1885, and was payable on demand, without interest. The action was brought June 15, 1885, less than six months after date, and the contention of appellant is that it was not due until six months after date, under certain provisions of the Civil Code.

It has always been the rule that suit may be brought on a note, payable on demand, at any time without any previous demand; the suit itself being all the demand necessary. The rule has been occasionally criticized by judges as illogical; but it has been universally followed by courts, and is as well settled as any other rule of law that could possibly be suggested. Counsel contends, however, that this ancient and well-known rule was intended to be overturned, and was overturned, by section 3135 of the Civil Code, which reads as follows: "The apparent maturity of a promissory note, payable at sight or on demand, is: (1) If it bears interest, one year after date; or, (2) if it does not bear interest, six months after its date." But this section clearly applies to a case where a demand is necessary, and a demand is necessary only when it is sought to charge indorsers and others than the principal. Formerly, in order to hold indorsers on paper payable on demand, demand and notice had to be made and given within that very uncertain period called "a reasonable time." Now section 3135 limits that time to a year or six months, (according as the note does or does not bear interest,) and after that time there cannot be a demand and notice which will bind an indorser. The article in which the section appears is entitled "Presentment for Payment;" and the first section (3130) provides that "it is not necessary to make a demand of payment upon the principal debtor in a negotiable instrument in order to charge him." The next section (3131) provides that "presentment of a negotiable instrument for payment, when necessary, must be made as follows;" and the following sections, including 3135, deal with the subject of presentment, demand, etc., in the cases of various kinds of negotiable paper, subject, of course, to the qualification, "when necessary," and to the said provision of section 3130, that a demand need not be made in order to charge the principal debtor. But these sections were not intended to, and do not, disturb the rule that the payee of a demand note may maintain an action on it against the maker without any demand other than that made by the suit itself.

7. There are no other points which need to be noticed in detail. We think that the presentation of the claim to the administratrix is sufficiently averred, and that there were no material errors in the matter of allowing or rejecting evidence. Judgment and order affirmed.

We concur: SHARPSTEIN, J.; THORNTON, J.

APPEAL—JURISDICTION—SERVICE OF NOTICE.

1. In a contest between attaching creditors of a foreign corporation and intervening creditors seeking to have the corporation adjudged insolvent, the corporation failed to appear, but a judgment was rendered to the effect that the court had no jurisdiction in insolvency proceedings over such a corporation. The intervening creditors appealed. Held that, though the corporation had been defaulted, the judgment appealed from was one in its favor, and the effect of a reversal would be to deprive it of all control over its property, and hence that it was essential to the jurisdiction of the supreme court that notice of appeal should be served on the corporation.

2. Such notice being jurisdictional, the objection that it was not served may be raised for the first time on rehearing of the appeal. Supreme court rule 13 does not apply to the raising of objections going to the jurisdiction.

In bank. On rehearing. For department decision, see 18 Pac. Rep. 794.

Olney, Chikering & Thomas, for appellants. Clunie & Knight, Wm. H. Sharp, and Cope, Boyd & Fifield, for respondents.

BEATTY, C. J. The Castle Dome Mining & Smelting Company is a New York corporation, having a mine in Arizona, and smelting works in Alameda county, in this state. Its property in this state was attached by certain of its creditors, and thereupon other of its creditors filed a petition, under the insolvent law, in the superior court of Alameda county, praying that it might be adjudged insolvent, and required to surrender its property, etc. The usual order to show cause why the petition should not be granted was made and served on the president and general manager of the company. On the return-day the company failed to appear, but the attaching creditors appeared, and filed interventions, and at the same time demurred to the petition in insolvency, upon the ground, among others, that the superior court of Alameda county had no jurisdiction of the proceeding against a foreign, non-resident corporation. The court sustained the demurrers, and dismissed the petition in insolvency, upon the ground that it had no jurisdiction. From this order of dismissal the petitioning creditors appealed, but they served their notice of appeal upon the intervenors only, omitting to serve it on the Castle Dome Company. In department 2, where the case was originally submitted for decision, the argument of counsel was directed exclusively to the question presented by the demurrers, and decided by the superior court, viz., whether, in the case of a foreign corporation carrying on business and having property in this state, such property is subject to the provisions of our law concerning involuntary insolvency. Upon this point it was held by the department in its decision rendered June 25, 1888, (18 Pac. Rep. 794,) that our insolvent law does apply in such cases, and the judgment of the superior court was ordered reversed. Subsequently a petition for rehearing was filed by respondents, the attaching creditors, in which for the first time several objections to the right of the appellants to be heard on the merits of the appeal were specified. A rehearing having been granted, these objections are renewed, and insisted upon, and one of them being jurisdictional, and, in our opinion, fatal to the appeal, the others need not be, and the question formerly decided cannot be, considered. The notice of appeal was never served on the Castle Dome Company. The judgment appealed from, although rendered at the instance of the intervenors alone, and in the absence of, and after default by, the Castle Dome Company, was still a judgment in favor of the company. It may be, as contended by appellants, that the company is in fact wholly unconcerned in the controversy between the attaching and petitioning creditors; that all its property will go, in any event, in partial satisfaction of its debts; and that it will not be affected in any practical manner, however this appeal may be determined. But the fact still remains that the judgment appealed from was a judgment in its favor, and cannot be reversed without depriving it of an apparent legal advantage. The effect of the judgment was to affirm its right to hold and dispose of its property, subject only to the lien of the attachments. The effect of a reversal of the judgment would be to deprive it of all control of its property, or, in other words, to convert a judgment in its favor into a judgment against it upon the whole subject-matter of the proceeding. This being so, it was absolutely essential to give this court jurisdiction that the notice of appeal should be served on the Castle Dome Company. Code Civil Proc. §§ 938–940; Senter v. De Bernal, 38 Cal. 641; Williams v. Association, 66 Cal. 193, 5 Pac. Rep. 85; O'Kane v. Daly, 63 Cal. 317; Randall v. Hunter, 69 Cal. 80, 10 Pac. Rep. 130; Miller v. Thomas, 71 Cal. 407, 12 Pac. Rep. 432; Milliken v. Houghton, 75 Cal. 537, 17 Pac. Rep. 641; Moyle v. Landers, 20 Pac. Rep. 241.

Our jurisdiction cannot be saved in this case upon the ground taken in Randall v. Hunter, supra. A reversal in that case would have had no effect upon the judgment entered against the party not served, but here a reversal would convert a judgment in favor of the party not served into a judgment against it. And we cannot hold that respondents are precluded by rule 13 of this court from urging this objection now because they failed to make it prior to the original hearing of the case. Rule 13 cannot be held to apply to an objection which goes directly to our jurisdiction to hear an appeal. The ground upon which a respondent is allowed to object to the hearing of an appeal because some other party adverse to the appellant has not been served with notice of appeal is not that his rights are affected, but merely that the court is bound at all times to keep within its proper jurisdiction, and must give heed to such objections, no matter how they are brought to its attention. For the reasons stated this appeal must be dismissed, and it is so ordered.

We concur: WORKS, J.; THORNTON, J.; SHARPSTEIN, J.; MCFARLAND, J.; PATERSON, J.

SHAIN v. BELVIN. (No. 9,995.)

PLEADING—ANSWER—CROSS-COMPLAINT.

1. A so-called "cross-complaint" in an action on a note, alleging facts from which the conclusion follows that the note was given without consideration, amounts only to a defense to the action, and is insufficient as a cross-complaint.

2. An answer in which the defense of want of consideration is averred "by way of cross-complaint," with a prayer for affirmative relief, cannot serve both as answer and cross-complaint, and, being styled an answer by defendant, it need not be answered as a cross-complaint.

Commissioner's decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JOHN F. FINN, Judge.

Action by Joseph E. Shain against W. W. Belvin on a promissory note. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Ben Morgan, for appellant. Vincent Neale, for respondent.

HAYNE, C. There is absolutely no merit in this appeal. The action was upon a promissory note. The defendant offered no evidence. The sole point made is that the document headed "Answer" contains a cross-complaint, and that inasmuch as the plaintiff filed no answer thereto the defendant should have had judgment thereon by default. The answer contains several denials, and proceeds as follows: "And, for a further and separate answer and defense to said action, defendant avers, by way of cross-complaint," in substance that the note was without consideration; and then, "for a further and separate answer and defense to the complaint herein, avers, by way of cross-complaint," two facts and a conclusion which, when taken in connection with the other pleadings, tend to show the thing previously averred, viz., that the note was without consideration. The document concludes with a prayer "that said note be delivered up for cancellation, for general relief, and for costs."

The judgment in favor of the plaintiff was clearly right. In the first place, the defendant's pleading does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of cross-complaint. Assuming for the purposes of the case that there may be circumstances under which a note which is past due may be ordered to be delivered up and canceled, on the ground that it was without consideration, it seems clear that when the holder brings an action upon it (in which, as a matter of course, he would be entitled to a jury trial) the defendant cannot take the case away from a jury and remove it to the domain of equity, by averring affirmatively a legal defense to the action, and praying for equitable relief. If there were any circumstances showing a right to cancellation they should have been averred. Lewis v. Tobias, 10 Cal. 575; Smith v. Sparrow, 13 Cal. 597.

In the next place, if a defendant has any cause of cross-complaint, he should plead it as such. Matters which are proper as a defense will not be turned into a counter-claim or cross-complaint merely by a prayer for affirmative relief. Doyle v. Franklin, 40 Cal. 110; Brannan v. Paty, 58 Cal. 331–333; Carpenter v. Hewel, 67 Cal. 590, 8 Pac. Rep. 314. And, if a party calls his pleading a counter-claim, he will not afterwards be allowed to maintain that it was really a cross-complaint, and required an answer. McAbee

v. Randall, 41 Cal. 136. Upon the same principle a party will not be allowed to gain any advantage by giving his pleading two inconsistent characters. If matter is pleaded as a defense, it is denied by force of the statute: if it constitutes a cross-complaint, and is pleaded as such, it requires an answer from the plaintiff. It is inconsistent to say that the same matter does and does not require to be answered. The pleader should take one ground or the other, so that his adversary may know how to proceed. If he, as here, "for further and separate answer and defense to the complaint, avers, by way of cross-complaint," etc., the rule that a pleading must be construed against the pleader applies, and as against him it may be treated merely as a defense. The words "by way of cross-complaint" may be treated as surplusage. Meeker v. Dalton, 75 Cal. 154, 16 Pac. Rep. 764. We cannot see the least shadow of excuse for the appeal. We therefore advise that the judgment and order denying a new trial be affirmed, with 20 per cent. damages.

We concur: BELCHER, C.C.; FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are affirmed; and, it appearing to the court that the appeal herein was taken for delay, it is ordered that there be added to the costs 20 per cent. of the amount of the judgment as damages by virtue of the provisions of section 957, Code Civil Proc.

FIRST NAT. BANK OF OAKLAND v. WOLFF. (No. 11,965.)

EVIDENCE—COMPETENCY.

A defendant in an action on a promissory note, the genuineness of which is denied, may testify concerning a conversation about the note, between himself and another person, though no representative of the payee was present, if such person has testified about the same conversation as a witness for the payee, the plaintiff in the action. Reversing ante, 551.

In bank. On rehearing. For statement of facts, see former opinion, ante, 551.

Wm. R. Davis and Wm. Lair Hill, for appellant. Metcalf & Metcalf, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The rehearing is denied, but we are of opinion that the court did not err in allowing Wolff's testimony regarding his conversation with Bennett as to the note in suit, inasmuch as Bennett had, as witness for the plaintiff, previously testified as to it. The opinion heretofore filed is modified in that respect.

PLEDGE—LIMITATION OF ACTIONS.

1. A complaint by pledgeors of personal property against the administratrix of the bailee, praying for the recovery of the specific property, if to be had, and, if not, for its value, payable in the due course of administration, and an amended complaint stating the same facts, but omitting the prayer for the return of the property in specie, and asking only for judgment for its value, aver one and the same cause of action, and the statute of limitations ceases to run at the filing of the original complaint.

2. A finding of the fact that decedent held as a pledge for the payment of a note certain articles, naming them, the property of plaintiffs, is responsive to the allegations of the pleadings, though it does not identify the articles as those sued for; there being no other articles of the kind mentioned in the pleadings or evidence.

3. An averment in the answer excusing the failure to return the property, on the ground that it was lost by or stolen from the pledgee without his fault, is an affirmative allegation, and, if unsupported by proof, a finding against the truth of it is proper.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; M. A. EDMONDS, Judge.

W. K. Vanderslice and Kenneth Melrose, partners trading as W. K. Vanderslice & Co., sued Elizabeth D. Traylor, administratrix, etc., of W. W. Traylor, deceased, for the recovery of the possession of a watch and two pairs of diamond ear-rings. Judgment for plaintiffs for the value of the property, and defendant appeals.

Robert Harrison, (Wm. Douthitt, of counsel,) for appellant. Gordon & Young, for respondents.

FOOTE, C. This action was originally brought against Elizabeth D. Traylor as the administratrix of the estate of W. W. Traylor, deceased. The complaint alleged that the plaintiffs borrowed a certain sum of money from W. W. Traylor, in his life-time, and gave him as collateral security for the payment thereof a certain watch and two pairs of diamond ear-rings, valued at $2,000; that at Traylor's death a part of the money borrowed remaining unpaid, the plaintiffs, on the 21st day of November, 1883, tendered it to Elizabeth D. Traylor, the administratrix of said decedent, and demanded the return of the articles pledged as collateral; that she refused to return them; that afterwards, on the 24th day of November, 1883, the plaintiffs presented for allowance to the administratrix their claim in writing against the estate of her decedent, duly verified, and containing all things necessary according to law, etc., upon which this action is founded, for the return of the articles pledged, or the value thereof, viz., the sum of $2,000; that upon the last-mentioned day the administratrix refused to allow the claim, or any part of it, and wholly rejected it. The prayer of that complaint is for judgment against the administratrix; that she return the property pledged, or, in case a return cannot be had, for the value thereof, $2,000, etc., payable in due course of administration, etc. This complaint was filed on the 10th day of January, 1884, less than three months after the date of the rejection of the claim. Afterwards, by leave of the court, an amended complaint was filed on the 7th day of August, 1884. The allegations are the same in both complaints, the latter complaint differing from the first in the respect only that the prayer of the latter omits to ask for the return of the property, and confines the relief prayed for to a judgment payable in due course of administration for the value of the property, $2,000. The administratrix answered the amended complaint, denying generally the facts alleged in it, and setting up the special defenses that the cause of action was barred by the statute of limitations under section 1498 of the Code of Civil Procedure; that the decedent lost the articles pledged without any fault or negligence on his part; and that they were stolen from him without his knowledge or negligence before coming into the custody of any representative of his estate. She then preferred a counter-claim upon a promissory note made by the plaintiffs to W. W. Traylor, deceased, for $1,151.63, dated March 29, 1882, and prayed for judgment for that sum, interest and costs.

The trial court made findings in which, among other things, in its third finding it declares: "That at the time of the making of said promissory note as aforesaid, and at the time of its delivery as aforesaid, said W. W. Traylor held, as collateral security for the payment of said note, one gold chronograph watch, and two pairs of diamond ear-rings, all of which was the property of these plaintiffs." The findings of fact and conclusions of law were filed on the 12th of August, 1885, but no judgment had been entered when the administratrix, Elizabeth D. Traylor, died, on the 21st of October, 1885. On the 1st day of December, 1885, the present defendant, Louise E. Matthews, was appointed the administratrix of the estate of Mrs. Elizabeth D. Traylor, deceased, and was substituted as defendant in the cause, and on the 1st day of February, 1886, a judgment nunc pro tunc upon the above-mentioned findings was entered. The findings, among other things, show that the watch and two pairs of diamond ear-rings were pledged to W. W. Traylor in his life-time to secure the payment of a promissory note, which, with interest, amounted, at the date of this judgment, to the sum of $1,522.-26; that the articles thus pledged were never returned to the plaintiffs, nor were lost by or stolen from W. W. Traylor in his life-time, nor were they or either of them lost or stolen after his death; that the plaintiffs tendered the amount due upon the note to the administratrix, conditioned on her delivering up to them the watch and ear-rings, which she did not do, as she declared she did not have them; that the claim was duly presented to her for the amount of money claimed to be the value of the articles pledged, which she rejected. As a conclusion of law, it is held that the defendant administratrix is entitled to offset the amount of the promissory note and interest against the plaintiffs' claim. The judgment was for the defendant, that she recover her costs and disbursements, from which and an order refusing a new trial she appeals.

No question as to the correctness of the judgment against the plaintiffs can be considered, because they have not appealed. The judgment is therefore final as to them, and conclusive as against their right to recover. So far as the defendant is concerned, upon the findings, as made, she can have no further judgment as against the plaintiffs, for the reason that the amount of her counter-claim is offset by the plaintiffs' claim against the decedent's estate. The point is made that the amended complaint states a different cause of action from the original complaint, and as the first-mentioned pleading was not filed until more than three months had elapsed from the rejection of the claim which was then due, and on which it was based, that the action is barred under section 1498, Code Civil Proc. The cause of action is the same in both complaints, for the same facts are alleged in both as being the foundation of the action; the same evidence is required to prove the statements of facts in the one as the other. In such case "there is no change in the identity of the cause of action. That is the same as before, and the commencement of the action dates from the filing of the original complaint." Easton v. O'Reilly, 63 Cal. 308. The facts set out in the amended complaint state no new cause of action, and the plaintiffs' cause is not barred by the statute of limitations. Easton v. O'Reilly, supra; Cox v. McLaughlin, 18 Pac. Rep. 102–109.

It is further claimed that the evidence is not sufficient to uphold the third finding. This contention is without force. The point made that the finding does not identify the property mentioned in the complaint is untenable. There is nothing in the record to show that the finding could have related to any diamond ear-rings except the two pair mentioned in the complaint, and it is plain that the finding is responsive to the allegation contained in that pleading, and refers to the two pairs of ear-rings there described, and no others.

The court found against the allegation set up as new matter in the answer, i. e., that the articles left with Mr. Traylor during his life-time were lost or stolen without fault or negligence, etc. That was proper. There was no testimony proving the allegation, and the court was right in finding against the defendant upon the issue thus made. Campbell v Buckman, 49 Cal. 368. These are the only contentions urged by the appellant, and we advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; HAYNE, C.

CRAMER v. TITTEL et al. (No. 11,723.)

APPEAL—BRIEFS.

Respondent's brief, after charging the commission of perjury by appellant in his answer, as to a fact alleged to be within his attorney's knowlenge, continued: "When counsel can be permitted to draft pleadings and present them to their clients for verification, and the pleadings being drawn from facts within the knowledge of counsel, and the counsel causes his client to willfully commit perjury," etc. Held, a gross violation of professional ethics, and that the brief should be stricken out, with permission to file another within 10 days, or the judgment would be reversed without an inspection of the record.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. G. MAGUIRE, Judge.

Action by Cramer against Tittel and another. Defendants appeal.

Robert Ash, John H. Boalt, Hall & Rodgers, and Van Ness & Roche, for appellants. J. J. Coffey and W. H. Tompkins, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. Counsel for respondent concludes his written argument with the following peroration: "Let the case be reviewed. The complaint charges notice of assignment to Huber and Tittel, and to Mr. Ash, their attorney, before this action of Cramer v. Tittel; yet in the face of the verified complaint, the evidence of Tittel, Huber, Nobman, Hartman, and Hoffman, and answers drawn by Mr. Ash, as attorney, and without any reservation, B. Ernest Tittel, under the solemnity of an oath, adds another crime to the rascality he had practiced on Lichtnock by committing willful perjury in denying that they, or either of them, knew, or had any notice whatever, that Cramer was the assignee. When counsel can be permitted to draft pleadings and present them to their clients for verification, and the pleadings being drawn from facts within the knowledge of counsel, and the counsel causes his client to willfully commit perjury by an utter disregard of the solemnities of the obligation of an oath, the time has come when perjury can be placed at a premium, and too designing and artful practitioners, assisted with clients of elastic consciences, will be found ready to swear to any fact essential to obtain the end sought. Respondent's counsel has been been extremely careful to present this case as disclosed by the record, with page of same, seeing from the brief of counsel for the appellant an evident desire on his part to misstate both the law and the facts, and thereby try to mislead the court." Counsel forgets that this is not an action against the defendants for perjury, nor against their attorney for subornation of perjury, or for disbarment. Such charges should be made only under oath, and in the proper court. Placing them in a brief for the records of this court is a gross violation of professional ethics. The brief for respondent is stricken out, with permission to file another brief within 10 days, or the judgment will be reversed without an inspection of the record.

ASSIGNMENT—JUDGMENT.

1. L. sued to recover a certain sum of money and an undivided interest in land, and afterwards sold to plaintiff an undivided one-half of all of the same, and assigned to him the cause of action. Judgment was subsequently recovered by L., and was assigned by him to one who had full knowledge of plaintiff's rights, and who filed a satisfaction, and afterwards, with L., jointly executed and filed another satisfaction. Held, that the mere fact that such assignee failed to get title to the judgment because of his notice of the assignment to plaintiff did not render him liable to plaintiff for the judgment debt or land.

2. L. was not a necessary party defendant to an action against the assignee and judgment debtor, to recover the judgment debt and land, where no plea of non-joinder was made by demurrer, and the answer showed that he had assigned his interest in the judgment before the action was begun.

3. In the latter action it was improper to give judgment for a certain sum, and leave plaintiff to take other proceedings for the land and the reversionary fund acquired under the assignment. The whole subject-matter should be disposed of, and defendants should be required to execute to plaintiff a conveyance of the interest in the land and the reversionary fund.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. G. MAGUIRE, Judge.

Robert Ash, (John H. Boalt, and Hall & Rodgers, of counsel,) for appellants. J. J. Coffey and W. H. Tompkins, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. On April 4, 1883, one Lichtnock commenced an action against Tittel (defendant herein) to recover a certain amount of money and an undivided interest in a parcel of land. On June 11, 1883, he sold to plaintiff herein an undivided one-half of all the property which was the subject-matter of the action, and executed and delivered to plaintiff an assignment of the cause of action. In consideration of this assignment plaintiff agreed to pay the costs and counsel fees incurred in the prosecution of the case. The court ordered judgment for the plaintiff therein on November 23, 1883, for the sum of $1,450, with interest from the 16th of December, 1881, and for the recovery of the one-fifth interest in the parcel of land sued for, together with costs. On December 5, 1883, the defendant Huber, at the instigation of the defendant Tittel, and with full knowledge of the rights of plaintiff herein, procured from Lichtnock an assignment of his judgment, and filed the same in the superior court. On May 2, 1884, the defendant Huber filed a written satisfaction of the judgment, and on January 30, 1885, Lichtnock and Huber jointly executed and filed another satisfaction of the judgment. Some of the findings of the court—from which we have taken the above facts—are attacked, but there is sufficient evidence, we think, to sustain them all. This action was commenced October 3, 1885, to recover from Tittel and Huber one-half of the money and land awarded to Lichtnock in his action against Tittel. The court entered a judgment in favor of the plaintiff, as prayed for, and from that judgment the defendants have appealed.

Upon the facts stated, the simplest and most direct remedy was for the plaintiff to proceed in the court below by motion to set aside the satisfaction of the judgment in Lichtnock v. Tittel, and substitute himself as a party plaintiff therein. Section 385, Code Civil Proc.; Thomas v. Mining Co., 54 Cal. 578. It is only where damages are claimed, or equitable relief which cannot be had on motion, that an action is necessary. Lichtnock is not a necessary party defendant. No plea of non-joinder was made by demurrer, and the answer shows that prior to the commencement of the action Lichtnock had sold and assigned his interest in the judgment. The judgment against Huber is not warranted by the facts. He is, of course, a necessary party to this action, wherein the court is asked, in effect, to adjudge that he is not the owner of the judgment, and he would have been a necessary party to a proceeding by motion to set aside the satisfaction of judgment, and in each case liable for the costs; but the fact that he failed to get title to the judgment because of his notice of the prior assignment to plaintiff does not render him liable to plaintiff for the judgment debt due from Tittel to plaintiff. His position, under the facts of this case, is not different from that of a purchaser of any chose in action with notice of a prior assignment, set-off, or other defense. The judgment debtor and assignee with notice of the prior assignment may, by a fraudulent and collusive assignment and satisfaction of judgment, succeed in delaying the enforcement of the judgment until, through the insolvency of the debtor, or attachment of his property by other creditors, the judgment creditor or his assignee is deprived of the fruits of his judgment. But no such circumstances appear in this case. It does not appear whether Lichtnock, Tittel, or Huber have been made, or attempted to make, any transfer of an interest in the real estate, other than by the assignment and satisfaction referred to. The court gave judgment against defendants for the sum of $1,042.63 and costs of suit; and then "adjudged and decreed that the plaintiff, C. W. Cramer, or his assigns, have leave to proceed as they may be advised for the recovery of the reversionary interest, and the interest of said Lichtnock in and to the lot of land." The whole subject-matter ought to have been disposed of at once,—not piecemeal. It was not necessary to leave the controversy thus unfinished. The court ought to have required the defendants to execute and deliver to plaintiff a good and sufficient conveyance of the interest in the land, and of the reversionary fund acquired by plaintiff under his assignment from Lichtnock. The judgment must be reversed, and, in order to dispose of the whole matter, it is necessary to reverse the judgment as to both defendants. The defendant, Tittel, however, is not entitled to recover costs of this appeal, as the judgment is more favorable to him than it should have been. Judgment and order reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

APPEAL—PRACTICE.

1. A defense not within the issues, nor attempted to be made in the court below, cannot be asserted on appeal.

2. Matters well pleaded in the complaint, and not denied by the answer, stand admitted.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Butte county; LEON D. FREER, Judge.

C. K. Boneste, for appellant. Hundley & Gale, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. C. This action was brought to establish a resulting trust. The property in controversy is a quarter interest in a mining claim situate in Butte county. The complaint alleges that defendant purchased the interest for the sum of $500, and took a deed therefor in his own name, but that in doing so he acted for and as the agent of plaintiff, and that plaintiff paid the purchase money. The court found all the facts to be as alleged in the complaint, and rendered judgment accordingly. The defendant moved for a new trial, and has appealed from the judgment and order denying his motion. The principal question presented for decision by appellant relates to the finding as to the amount and payment of the purchase money. The contention is that appellant paid for the property $1,500, and not $500, as found by the court, and had therefore a right to retain the title until he received from plaintiff the balance of the purchase price. But no such defense was set up, or even hinted at, in the answer. It cannot, therefore, be raised here for the first time. The case was properly tried upon the issues presented by the pleadings, and upon all of those issues there was ample evidence to justify the findings. It is further contended that the finding that defendant, shortly before the commencement of this suit, repudiated the understanding between the plaintiff and himself, and denied plaintiff's ownership of the one-fourth interest purchased by him for plaintiff, and refused to give plaintiff a deed thereof, was not justified by the evidence. It is said that "the most rigorous examination of the evidence discloses nothing tending to support this finding." The answer to this position is that the facts found were distinctly and clearly averred in the complaint, and were not denied by defendant in his answer.

They were therefore admitted, and no evidence in support of them was necessary. No other points are made, and it follows that the judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: FOOTE, C.; HAYNE, C.

PEOPLE v. BOWERS. (No. 20,345.)

MURDER—POISONING—EVIDENCE.

On a trial for wife-murder by phosphorus poisoning the evidence was almost entirely circumstantial; the existence of the most important facts was established only by experts, and was disputed by other experts; some of the usual symptoms of phosphorus poisoning were not shown to exist, and there were indications that death might have, and probably did, result from natural causes; there was no evidence that defendant had procured, or had in his possession, any phosphorus. Held, that where the conduct of the trial judge was calculated to give the jury the impression that he thought defendant guilty, and the prosecuting attorney made objectionable statements calculated to influence the jury, though the court instructed the jury to pay no attention to such statements, a conviction and sentence of death would be set aside, and a new trial granted. McFARLAND, J., dissenting.

In bank. On rehearing. For former report, see 18 Pac. Rep. 660.

On December 29, 1888, the supreme court, sitting in bank, filed the following order: "This cause having been heretofore submitted to the court sitting in bank, and upon consideration it appearing that a constitutional number of the justices who heard the argument cannot agree upon a judgment, it is therefore ordered that the order heretofore made submitting the case be, and the same is hereby, set aside, and the cause placed upon the calendar to be heard by the court in bank."

Charles N. Fox and Colin Campbell, for appellant. George A. Johnson, Atty. Gen., for the State.

PER CURIAM. The defendant was convicted of murder, and judgment of death passed against him. He was charged with having poisoned his wife by the use of phosphorus. The evidence against him is almost entirely circumstantial. The existence of the most important facts was established only by the opinion of experts, and their existence is disputed by experts apparently equally competent. The significance of the supposed facts as inculpatory circumstances was also matter of difference. The judgment of medical experts was also taken upon the question whether all the clinical symptoms and pathological conditions indicated death from phosphorus poisoning. Upon this there was also a wide difference of opinion. Some symptoms and conditions usually present in cases of phosphorus poisoning were wholly absent in this case, or at least were not proven to exist. There were indications which, in the opinion of some of the physicians, indicated that death might have resulted, and probably did result, from natural causes. There was atrophy of the liver, which was greatly reduced in size. It was admitted that this might have been occasioned by disease, and there was a difference of opinion as to whether the condition was, or could have been, caused by phosphorus poisoning. There was no jaundice. There was an ulcer in the stomach. Whether this could have been occasioned by phosphorus poisoning was a matter of controversy. Clots of blood were found in the heart and in the ovaries and fallopian tubes. There is evidence that the illness of the deceased was brought on by a miscarriage, purposely caused by her own act, and that she did not wish her husband to know anything about it. There was no evidence that the defendant had procured, or had in his possession, any phosphorus.

We do not feel like saying, under these circumstances, that as matter of law the jury could not be satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt of the guilt of the defendant; but it is evident that the case was one of great difficulty, and required unusual circumspection, and the utmost coolness and impartiality in its consideration. Now, when we remember that the crime with which the defendant is charged is one of an unusually revolting character, it is easy to believe that one unaccustomed to judicial investigations might easily be made to feel, upon finding a mere probability of guilt, much short of the certainty required to authorize a conviction, a strong desire for the punishment of the defendant. In view of all these circumstances, certain occurrences at the trial have a significance which in a different kind of a case we should hesitate to attribute to them. Unfortunately the judge allowed himself rather frequently to question the witnesses, always in the interest of the prosecution, and often by putting questions which were leading and suggestive. We think the jury would be sure to get the impression that the judge thought the defendant guilty. Still more objectionable was the conduct of the prosecuting attorney. It is true, the court properly interfered, rebuking the attorney, and instructing the jury to pay no attention to the statements. But the statements were well calculated to influence the jury in a case of this character, and it is impossible for us to say that no injury resulted to the defendant therefrom.

We think, upon a careful examination of this record, that the interests of justice require a new trial before a judgment of this gravity should be carried into execution. We do not see the necessity of passing upon the other points made. The questions are not likely to recur upon the new trial. Judgment reversed, and a new trial ordered.

I dissent: McFarland, J.

Thornton, J., (concurring.) The only poisoning charged in this case is that by phosphorus. If there was no poisoning by phosphorus, then it is not pretended that there was any poisoning at all. In my opinion, the preponderance of evidence supports the conclusion that there was no phosphorus poisoning. The indications of such poisoning were lacking. There was no garlicky odor on the breath before death, and there was no luminosity apparent when the test of the Mitscherlich process was applied after death. The garlicky odor, if apparent in the portion of the stomach and intestines subjected to examination after death, may be accounted for by two circumstances. Such odor is usually made apparent by the decay of the human body, and this decay had commenced when the portion of the stomach and intestines were taken from the body, (to which the process above-mentioned was applied,) some seven or eight days after death. The other circumstance is this: that for some 15 or 20 days prior to the death of Mrs. Bowers a compound containing phosphorus had been given to her by the physician or physicians in charge. These two facts account for whatever garlicky or alliaceous odor may have been perceived after death. The evidence tends strongly to show that Mrs. Bowers died from disease indicated by the symptoms which manifested themselves during her illness, and by the conditions of the body after death. This was the opinion of some of the physicians who testified upon the trial.

Upon a full consideration of the evidence in the case I am of opinion that the preponderance of evidence sustains the conclusion that Mrs. Bowers did not die of phosphorus poisoning, and that in the judgment of men of average intelligence and discretion the evidence would establish the conclusion that the defendant could not be held to be guilty beyond a reasonable doubt. Where this is the case there should be no conviction. For the foregoing reasons I am convinced that the verdict ought not to stand, and that the judgment and order should be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

Taylor v. North Star Gold Min. Co.

(No. 12,522.)

Corporations—Assessments on Stock.

Where a mining corporation buys an adjoining property and transfers all the property to a new company, receiving stock in the new corporation therefor, and borrows money from one of its stockholders to pay the expenses thereof, there being no fraud, the company is liable for the money borrowed, and can levy an assessment to pay for it.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Nevada county; J. M. Walling, Judge.

Suit by M. C. Taylor against the North Star Gold Mining Company, to have an assessment sale of stock set aside.

Charles W. Kitts and Cross & Simonds, for appellant. A. W. Thompson and Gaylord & Searls, (Niles Searls, of counsel,) for respondent.

Hayne, C. This was an action to set aside an assessment sale of mining stock. It is admitted that the assessment proceedings were regular. The material facts upon which the objections to the sale are based are as follows: The defendant was a corporation organized for the purpose of mining for the precious metals. Success did not attend its operations, and business was discontinued. The organization, however, was preserved. The secretary was continued at a small salary, and the taxes had to be paid upon the property. In this condition of affairs one of the largest stockholders organized a scheme by which it was hoped to give value to the property. In substance it was this: The corporation acquired the works of an adjoining mine called the "Scotia," which also had abandoned business, and transferred these works and its own mine to a new corporation called the "North Star Mining Company," which raised money for renewed work upon said mine. The consideration which the defendant received for the transfer of its property consisted of stock in the new corporation. In the course of the transaction the defendant incurred indebtedness as follows: For the services of an attorney at law, $800; and for incidental expenses in and about the transaction, such as the employment of an expert, a broker, traveling expenses, and the like, $2,020. These sums, together with that due to the secretary, and for taxes on the mine, amounted to $3,940. Some question is attempted to be raised as to whether the defendant authorized the incurring of a part of these expenses. But the services and expenditures were incurred on behalf of the corporation, and with its knowledge, and it raised no question as to their having been authorized, but borrowed money from one of its stockholders to pay what was due for them. It was to pay the money so borrowed that the assessment was levied. The plaintiff knew of the whole transaction while it was going on, and made no objection thereto. The undertaking was a success, and the property became very valuable.

The plaintiff does not seek to have anything set aside except the assessment sale. His main positions are that there was fraud, and that the disposal of the property of the company for stock in another corporation was ultra vires. The findings, however, negative the charge of fraud, and the evidence is sufficient to support the findings. We do not think that the question of ultra vires arises in the case, and we express no opinion in regard to it. There having been no fraud, the company could not refuse to pay the money which it had borrowed, on the ground that it was borrowed for the purpose of being used, and was used, for the payment of expenses which were incidental to an act which was ultra vires. Bradley v. Ballard, 55 Ill. 413. It is possible that there may be cases where ancillary operations are so inseparably connected with the main act that they would have to fall with it; but we do not think that this case presents features of that character. The company was legally liable for the money borrowed, and had power to levy an assessment to pay for it. The other matters do not require special notice, and we therefore advise that the judgment and order denying a new trial be affirmed.

We concur: Belcher, C. C.; Foote, C.

Batchelder v. Baker. (No. 11,495.)

Guardian ad Litem—Quieting Title.

1. The proceedings in the appointment of a guardian ad litem being, under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 670, no part of the judgment roll, on an appeal on the judgment roll, where the appearance and answer of defendant were by guardian ad litem, the court will not go outside the record to determine whether such guardian was appointed or not.

2. In an action to quiet title, a judgment that plaintiff is the owner of the land is supported by a complaint alleging possession for a sufficient length of time to show title in plaintiff.

3. In such case a finding that defendant has no interest in the land is not necessary, where defendant sets up no such claim in his answer.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Oliver P. Evans, Judge.

Maria A. Batchelder sued A. S. B. Baker to quiet title. Code Civil Proc. § 670, determines what portion of the proceedings below shall form the judgment roll. Proceedings in the appointment of a guardian ad litem are not included.

Fox & Kellogg, for appellant. E. J. & J. H. Moore, for respondent.

Works, J. This is an action to quiet title to real estate. The defendant answered by a guardian ad litem, as shown by the recitals in such answer, denying the allegations of the complaint, but set up no claim or title to the property. There was judgment for the plaintiff quieting her title, decreeing that she was the owner of the property, and that the defendant had no interest therein. The appeal is from the judgment, and is presented to us on the judgment roll. It is contended by the appellant (1) that no guardian ad litem was appointed by the court for the defendant, who was a minor; (2) that the judgment is not supported by the complaint; (3) that the findings do not support the judgment.

1. As to the first of these points we cannot know from the record before us whether a guardian ad litem was appointed or not. The appeal being upon the judgment roll, we cannot look outside of it to determine the question. Harper v. Minor, 27 Cal. 107; Sharp v. Daugney, 33 Cal. 505, 512. Proceedings relating to the appointment of a guardian ad litem form no part of the judgment roll. Code Civil Proc. § 670; Emeric v. Alvarado, 64 Cal. 592, 2 Pac. Rep. 418. In this condition of the record we must presume in favor of the action of the court below, especially as the answer itself and the recitals in the judgment show that the appearance and answer of the defendant were by a guardian ad litem. Sharp v. Daugney, supra; Emeric v. Alvarado, supra.

2. The ground upon which it is claimed that the complaint does not support the judgment is that the complaint alleges possession only, and the judgment is that the plaintiff is the owner of the property. But the complaint alleges possession, not only at the time of the commencement of the action, but for a sufficient length of time to show title in the plaintiff, which is equivalent to a direct allegation of ownership.

3. The last point made is equally groundless. It is to the effect that the findings do not show that the defendant had no interest in the property. Such a finding was unnecessary as the defendant set up no such interest. But the court found the facts showing the plaintiff to be the owner of the property which was sufficient as to the matter of ownership. Judgment affirmed.

Paterson, J. I concur in the judgment.

Partnership—Accounting—Costs.

In a suit for partnership accounting, if the services of an expert are necessary in the examination of the partnership books, he should be appointed by and act under the directions of the court, and neither party is entitled to charge as costs the expense of an expert privately employed.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; T. K. Wilson, Judge.

Wm. H. H. Hart, E. W. McKinstry, Aylett R. Cotton, and Warren Olney, for appellant. C. E. Royce, for respondent.

Works, J. Action for the dissolution of a partnership and for an accounting. Judgment for the plaintiff dissolving the partnership and for the sum of $35,254.24. As to the costs, it was provided in the decree that "the costs of said action be divided between said parties and adjusted hereafter." Subsequently the plaintiff filed his cost-bill, in which was included an item of $4,570, amount expended by him in payment of one Julius Reimer, an accountant. The defendant moved the court to retax the costs, and to strike out the whole of this item, upon the ground, among others, that it was not a legal charge against the defendant as a part of the costs of the action. The court refused to strike out the whole item of costs, but reduced the amount to $1,360, and charged that amount against the defendant as a part of the costs. The defendant appeals to this court from the order of the court retaxing the costs as above stated. The evidence taken at the hearing of the motion to retax clearly shows that Reimer was employed by the plaintiff, or his attorney, as an expert to examine the books of the partnership, and render a statement of the condition thereof. The question presented, therefore, is whether it is proper, where an expert is employed and is acting for one of the parties, to charge the same against the losing party as a part of the costs of the action. If the services of an expert are necessary for the proper presentation and determination of the case, he should be appointed by, and act under the direction of, the court. Where, as in this case, he is the employé of one of the parties, the temptation to act in the interest of such party must be apparent. Therefore, in order to secure his fair and disinterested services, he should be appointed by the court, and not by either of the parties, and if either party sees proper to employ the services of an expert for his own benefit the court should not require the opposite party to pay for the services thus rendered. For these reasons the order appealed from is reversed, with instructions to the court below to sustain the motion of the defendant to strike out the item of costs above mentioned.

SHERIFFS—LIABILITY—FAILURE TO FILE WRIT.

1. In an action by a mortgagee against the sheriff, who made sale under the decree of foreclosure, to recover damages for the sheriff's failure to file the order of sale, with his return thereon, in the clerk's office, whereby plaintiff was prevented from obtaining a deficiency judgment against the mortgagor, evidence that the sheriff's deputy, who actually made the sale, was a competent, prudent, and careful man, was immaterial, it not being shown that he was in any way responsible for the failure to file the order.

2. Evidence that the order of sale, with the sheriff's return thereon, was discovered in the clerk's office, but bearing no marks of filing, is not sufficient to prove that the order was delivered by the sheriff to the clerk or his deputy for the purpose of having it filed.

3. The order of sale, and sheriff's return indorsed thereon, were properly admitted in evidence on behalf of defendants, without first proving that they had been filed in the clerk's office.

4. The facts that, after the death of the mortgagor, plaintiff had his claim for deficiency allowed against the estate as a judgment, (when in truth it was not,) and that, if plaintiff had been diligent in securing its payment according to its priority as such judgment, the estate would have paid it in full, are no defense.

5. Nor is it a defense that the original judgment in foreclosure was a personal judgment, and might have been enforced against all the mortgagor's property. Plaintiff having elected not to treat it as such, and having issued the order of sale, he could thereafter have no personal judgment except for the deficiency, and that depended upon the sheriff's return being properly filed.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; T. H. REARDEN, Judge.

Cope & Boyd, for appellant. Clitus Barbour, for respondents.

WORKS, J. This is an action on a sheriff's bond for damages for a failure to return an order of sale, by reason of which it is alleged the plaintiff failed to procure the entry of a deficiency judgment, and thereby lost his debt. There was a trial by jury, and verdict for the defendants. The plaintiff moved for a new trial, which was denied, and from this order he appeals. The principal controversy in the case, in the court below and in this court, is whether the evidence is sufficient to show a delivery by the sheriff of the order of sale, with his return thereon, to the clerk for filing. The question as to the weight of the evidence relating to this question is discussed in the briefs of counsel, but we do not regard the truth or falsity of the testimony of the defendants' witnesses, tending to show such delivery, as of any importance. The undisputed evidence shows that there was nothing on any of the registers kept by the sheriff or the clerk showing, or tending to show, that the paper had ever been returned to or filed in the clerk's office. There is no direct evidence that it was ever delivered to the clerk for filing. The bill of sale, with the sheriff's return upon it, was produced, and it was shown that a witness who made search, at the instance of the sheriff, found the paper in an out of the way place in the clerk's office. This finding was within a few days of the trial, and after diligent search made by the deputies in the clerk's office. The paper had been missing for several years. The papers in the clerk's office had been removed in the mean time from one building to another, and all of the papers carefully examined, compared with the register, and filings indorsed upon papers where such filings had been omitted, and this particular paper was not discovered. The place where the paper was found, at the last moment, was used for filing large and bulky papers, such as rolls of evidence, and not for small or loose papers. There was evidence tending to show that this drawer or box had been searched frequently for other papers, and that no loose papers were kept or found therein. The bill of sale, when found, had no file-mark upon it. Laying aside the extreme improbability of this paper having found its way to the clerk's office in the usual manner, and in the regular course of official business, and conceding the evidence of the defendants in respect to the matter to be reliable and trustworthy, it was clear to our minds that such evidence was wholly insufficient to show that the paper had been returned to the clerk's office in the manner required by law. There was not a single entry or indorsement in either of the offices tending to show such return. The whole of the defendants' case, or this branch of it, rests upon the evidence that the paper was found in the clerk's office. It is contended by the respondents that it was not necessary to show the filing by the written indorsement of the clerk on the paper, but that the fact might be proved by parol. This may be conceded for the purposes of this case, although we do not wish to be understood as so holding. But if the filing can be proved by parol the proof must show an actual delivery of the paper to the clerk or one of his deputies, and the proof should be clear and positive. It is not enough to show the paper in the office of the clerk. It must be delivered to him for the purpose of filing. There could be no presumption in favor of the defendants that the sheriff had performed his duty as an officer where he was charged with a specific act of negligence, and where a presumption in his favor would necessarily result in a counter-presumption that the clerk had failed to perform his duty as a public officer. Houghton Co. v. Rees, 34 Mich. 481. The defendants were permitted by the court below to prove by the sheriff that the deputy who made the sale of the property under the order of sale was a competent, prudent, and careful man. This was error. The fact that the sheriff was charged with official negligence in this instance, and that he acted therein through his deputy, did not in any way raise the question as to the deputy's general fitness for the office. Besides, it is not shown that he was in any way responsible for the failure to deliver the return to the clerk. He testifies that he indorsed the return on the writ, and delivered it to the book-keeper. There is other testimony tending to show that it was the custom of the office for the book-keepers to return the papers from that office to the clerk's office. If so, the deputy-sheriff was not shown to have been at fault in respect to the failure to deliver the paper to the clerk, and for that reason the testimony was immaterial.

It is further urged that the court erred in admitting in evidence the order of sale, and the return of the sheriff indorsed thereon, without first proving that they had been filed in the clerk's office. There was no error in this ruling. One of the acts necessary to be done by the sheriff was the indorsement of the return on the writ. This was properly proved by introducing the writ and return in evidence. This did not, it is true, prove his whole case, but it was a step in that direction, and, so far, it was competent. One of the grounds of the motion for a new trial was newly-discovered evidence, and an affidavit, presumably for the purpose of sustaining this ground, appears in the record, but it is in no way authenticated, and for that reason cannot be considered.

The respondents, besides combating the errors complained of by the appellant, contend that, admitting that there was a failure to prove the return of the order of sale, the verdict was general, and may have been right for other reasons. One of these alleged reasons is that the complaint did not state a cause of action. But the complaint was demurred to, and the demurrer was overruled, we think, properly.

Again, it is claimed that the evidence failed to show that the plaintiff was or could have been damaged by the failure to make return of the writ. This is based on the theory that the plaintiff in an action of this kind can only recover his actual damages, and as the evidence fails to show that at the time the return should have been made, or at any time thereafter, the judgment debtor was solvent, or had any property out of which the deficiency judgment, if it had been entered, could have been made, no cause of action was made out. In the absence of statutory provisions, the measure of damages in this class of cases is the actual loss incurred by the plaintiff. People v. Palmer, 95 Amer. Dec. 418, 436, and cases cited. In this state the statute imposes upon the officer a penalty of $200. Pol. Code, § 4179. But this does not apply to the sureties. Glascock v. Ashman, 52 Cal. 493. In this case there is no prayer for relief under the statute.

But there was evidence tending to show that the judgment debtor had property out of which the money could have been made. His death subsequent to the recovery of the judgment and failure to make return was shown, and the proceedings had in the settlement of his estate were introduced in evidence, showing the amount of his property, and that a part only of plaintiff's debt could then be made. The defendants offered to prove that the debtor was insolvent during all of the time subsequent to the recovery of the judgment, but the court below, for some reason which does not appear, refused to permit it; so that the evidence of the plaintiff on the point, although not as satisfactory as direct proof would have been, remained unanswered.

It is further contended by the respondents that the plaintiff actually had his claim allowed against the estate as a judgment, and that, if it had been paid according to its priority, it would have been paid in full, and the failure to secure such priority for it was the fault of the appellant, and he cannot for that reason recover the deficiency from the defendants. But the fact remains that plaintiff's claim was not an enforcible judgment, because it had not been entered as such upon a return by the sheriff. Therefore he was not in fault for not procuring for it a priority to which it was not entitled, although it appeared in the claim allowed as a judgment. So it is claimed that the original judgment recovered by the plaintiff was a personal judgment, and might have been enforced against all the property of the debtor. Conceding this, after having proceeded to enforce his foreclosure decree by sale of the mortgaged property, the plaintiff could not, thereafter, treat his judgment as personal and enforce it as such. He had his election to treat it as a personal judgment, and issue execution upon it, or issue his order of sale as upon a decree of foreclosure. He could not do both. Admitting that it was a personal judgment, it could not be enforced as such until the return of the sheriff on the order of sale, and then only for the deficiency. Englund v. Lewis, 25 Cal. 357; Culver v. Rogers, 28 Cal. 520. Thus the hands of the appellant were tied by the failure of the sheriff to return the order of sale, and no laches can be imputed to him for a failure to enforce the judgment. Order reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

APPEAL—LAW OF CASE.

On the trial court's findings of fact this court, on appeal, reversed the judgment, and granted a new trial. On the second trial the court made findings of fact, and rendered judgment in accordance with the opinion on appeal, but subsequently granted a new trial. Held, that though the transcript of evidence on the second appeal is identical with that on the first appeal, there being a conflict in the evidence, this court cannot say that the facts in both trials were the same, nor that it was error to grant the new trial.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; M. A. EDMONDS, Judge.

Jarboe, Harrison & Goodfellow, for appellant. Edw. J. Pringle, T. B. Bishop, and W. H. Fifield, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. This is an action on a promissory note made and delivered by the defendant to plaintiff March 19, 1869, for the sum of $3,300 and interest. The defense is failure of consideration. The case was here several years ago (44 Cal. 462) and the chief question is: To what extent does the decision on the former appeal control the case as it is now presented? The case is before us now on appeal from an order granting a new trial. Appellant contends that the facts as they appeared on the former appeal, and as they appear on this appeal, are substantially the same, and for this reason the court below was bound, as a matter of law, to refuse a new trial. There is no doubt that where the facts are the same as on a former appeal, the principles and rules announced by the court will be recognized on a subsequent appeal as the law of the case. And if the case were before us now on appeal from the last judgment of the court below, which was in favor of the defendant, we should doubtless affirm the judgment, unless some error in the admission or exclusion of evidence necessitated a new trial, because the facts found are substantially the same as the facts shown by the record when the case was here before. But where the court has set aside its findings of fact and granted a new trial, can we say what the facts are without usurping the functions of the trial court? Conceding that the evidence in the transcript before us reads word for word with that in the transcript which was before the court on the former appeal, can we say, unless the evidence is without conflict, that the facts are the same? If the evidence is conflicting, one judge might deduce a certain state of facts from it, and another judge an entirely different state of facts. We are of opinion that the parties are entitled to the benefit of the judgment of the court below upon the evidence as to the facts of the case. As the court has set aside its findings we do not know what view it takes of the evidence. But it is claimed also by appellant that there is no substantial conflict of testimony in the case; that the failure of consideration for the note was so fully established that the court could not do otherwise than decide as it did in the first instance, and as shown by the findings of fact. We cannot say, however, that there is no substantial conflict in the evidence. The testimony of the plaintiff tends to show that he requested the defendant to subscribe for some stock, and the defendant objecting that he had no money on hand, he (plaintiff) to induce defendant to subscribe, agreed that he would pay the first 10 installments of the subscription price of the stock if the defendant would give him his note for $3,300, and that the note was given to plaintiff in consideration of plaintiff's agreement to pay said installments; while the defendant's testimony tends to show that plaintiff sold him 30 shares of the capital stock, and that the note was given for the purchase money. The court below has not informed us as to the ground upon which the motion for a new trial was granted, but every presumption is in favor of the order, and the rule applicable to orders granting new trials, where the evidence is conflicting, is so well known that it is unnecessary to state it. The order is affirmed.

CONTRACTS—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

In an action on a contract to pay plaintiff a certain sum out of money collected on a judgment in a certain action, "provided the said money shall be collected from property" of defendant in that action pointed out by plaintiff, when it appears that plaintiff pointed out property from which the judgment could have been collected, but that defendant compromised by accepting a smaller sum, judgment for plaintiff is proper.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; F. W. LAWLER, Judge.

Stewart & Herrin, (H. L. Gear, of counsel,) for appellant. William H. Sears, (D. H. Whittemore, of counsel,) for respondent.

HAYNE, C. Action upon a contract to pay plaintiff $500 "out of money collected on judgment in action of Frank v. Kilbourn et al., * * * provided the said money shall be collected from property of defendant pointed out by the said Long." The complaint avers that said Long "did point out property belonging to said Kilbourn of the value of $30,000, out of which said judgment could have been collected, and did keep and perform all the requirements of said agreement on his part to be kept and performed," but that defendant compromised and settled said judgment by accepting $4,000 without the knowledge or consent of Long. Judgment was given for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Findings were waived, and the evidence is not brought up. It must, therefore, be presumed that Long did point out property from which the amount of the judgment in question could have been collected, and that the appellant chose not to collect it, but to accept a less sum. This being the case, judgment was properly given against him. Wolf v. Marsh, 54 Cal. 232. We therefore advise that the judgment be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is affirmed.

WILLS—MENTAL INCAPACITY—UNDUE INFLUENCE.

1. Where a complaint alleges that at the time of executing a codicil the testator's mind was "weak, debilitated, and deranged, to such an extent as to incapacitate him from making or undertaking a will or codicil," a special issue, asking if testator at that time was "mentally incompetent" to make a codicil, is within the pleadings.

2. The definitions of fraud and undue influence contained in Civil Code Cal. §§ 1572, 1575, though appearing in that part relating to contracts and under the chapter entitled "Consent," apply to fraud and undue influence generally.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; E. M. GIBSON, Judge.

Wm. M. Pierson, H. C. Hyde, and John Lloyd, for appellants. Chas. F. Hanlon, for respondent.

FOOTE, C. This is an appeal from a judgment rendered upon the special verdict of a jury annulling a codicil to the last will of a decedent, and from an order denying a new trial of the contest of the codicil. The testator, Andrew Kohler, made his will on the 19th of February, 1884, wherein he made several legacies, among them being one of $5,000 to the contestant, Miss Carrie Gerholdt, who seems to have been at that time a favorite niece. On March 4, 1885, he executed a codicil to that will, whereby he revoked the legacy given to the contestant. The grounds of the contest are that the testator was fraudulently induced to execute the revoking codicil; that undue influence was exercised to accomplish that end; that he was mentally incompetent when he made the codicil. The fourth ground, the informality attending the making of the codicil, was abandoned, and the special issues, from the seventeenth to the twenty-second, inclusive, were withdrawn from the consideration of the jury. Special issue No. 9, under the head of "Undue Influence," was also withdrawn by contestant. After the evidence on the part of the contestant had been submitted to the jury upon the issues then before them, a nonsuit was moved for by the appellant, which was refused. The proponents then presented their side of the case, the issues were submitted to the jury, and they found in favor of the contestant. The court rendered its judgment, based upon the verdict, that the codicil in contest was, so far as its formal execution was concerned, in accordance with law, but that it was not, in fact, the codicil of the testator, on the ground of his incompetency to make it or to dispose of his property by will; that at the time he made it he was acting under undue influence and fraud practiced by other persons. The appellants claim that the evidence was totally wanting in any of the necessary elements to sustain the contentions of the contestant, even according to her own showing, and that a nonsuit should accordingly have been given in their favor.

A close scrutiny of the record has satisfied us that there was no such entire absence of evidence, tending to prove the issues as submitted, as would permit us to declare the action of the court below erroneous.

The instructions are also very sharply assailed. It is said that they are misleading; that the court improperly applied the rules of law as laid down in the Civil Code, with reference to undue influence and fraud; that the rule as declared with reference to undue influence is taken from section 1575 of the Civil Code, in that part relating to contracts, and under the chapter entitled "Consent," and that it has no reference to wills. There is nothing in the section which shows that it was not intended to apply to undue influence generally, and the rule is certainly applicable under the evidence in the record. The same argument is used with reference to the rule laid down as to actual fraud, under section 1572 of the same Code. We do not perceive any merit in the position taken. The instructions, taken altogether, were plainly expressed, and easy of comprehension to an unbiased mind. The law, as it seems to us, was properly given, under the pleadings, issues, facts, and circumstances contained in the record, and this is entirely sufficient. People v. Tomlinson, 66 Cal. 347, 5 Pac. Rep. 509.

The appellants further claim that there was no issue made in the pleadings as to the competency of the testator to make a will, and that, therefore, the verdict on special issue No. 16 was not supported by the pleadings. The special issue submitted was this: "Was Andrew Kohler mentally incompetent to make a codicil or dispose of his property by will on March 4, 1885?" The allegation of the complaint on the point is that "on March 4, 1885, and for a long time prior to his death, said Andrew Kohler's mind was weak, debilitated and deranged, to such an extent as to incapacitate him from making or undertaking a will or codicil." It is provided by the Code of Civil Procedure, § 1312, that a will may be contested upon the issues: (1) "The competency of the decedent to make a last will and testament." If the testator's mind was weak, debilitated and deranged, to such an extent as to incapacitate him from making or undertaking a will or codicil, he could hardly be said not to be incompetent to make a will or codicil. Thus the issue found upon was within the pleadings.

The verdict of the jury, based upon all the evidence in the case, is most vigorously attacked. In view of the fact that the witnesses for the contestant sharply contradicted those for the proponents in all material matters, it is unnecessary to go into a detailed argument showing the verdict to have been sustained by a preponderance of evidence. The jury saw and heard the witnesses, observed them, doubtless, particularly and critically, and took note beside of all the circumstances surrounding the transactions. We cannot say that, upon evidence substantially conflicting, they gave credit to some witnesses and denied it to others improperly.

Upon the whole case, perceiving no prejudicial error, we advise that the judgment and order denying a new trial be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; VANCLEIF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

In re BAUER'S ESTATE. (No. 12,853.)

PRESUMPTION—HUSBAND AND WIFE—SEPARATE PROPERTY—WITNESS—ATTORNEYS.

1. A husband at his marriage owned personalty worth more than $3,000; and, shortly after, engaged in business with a partner, using his separate property, or a part of it, therein. He then purchased his partner's interest, which he sold at a profit, for $1,400. He supported his family from his business, and purchased for $5,000 land on which he and his wife joined in declaring a homestead. The $1,400 was applied on the price, and the remainder was paid by borrowed money. The declaration of homestead contained the following: "We further declare that said property was, to the extent of $3,000, acquired and improved with the separate estate of" the husband. Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1961, provides that a presumption, not by law declared to be conclusive, "may be controverted by other evidence, direct or indirect." Section 1963, subd. 32, makes it a disputable presumption "that a thing, once proved to exist, continues;" and Civil Code, § 163, provides that "all property owned by the husband before marriage, * * * with the rents, issues, and profits thereof, is his separate property." Held, that the separate property owned by the husband on his marriage would be presumed to have continued his separate property; and that the presumption that the real property, having been purchased during coverture, was the community property of himself and wife, was overcome.

2. An attorney at law who drew the declaration of homestead, acting at the time for both husband and wife, is competent to testify, in a contest between the deceased husband's legatee, who claims the property as his testator's separate property, and testator's widow, who claims it as community property, as to whether the recital in the declaration of homestead was explained to the wife, and as to what the explanation was.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. V. COFFEY, Judge.

F. J. French and T. M. Osment, for appellant. McAllister & Bergin, for respondent.

GIBSON, C. In probate. Contest between Charles F. Bauer, son of deceased, and his mother, Frederica Garrett, late widow of deceased, over the settlement of the final account of the administrator and the final distribution of the residue of the estate. The deceased and Frederica Bauer—now Garrett—intermarried on the 7th of May, 1868, and on the 9th of May, 1869, the contestant was born unto them. On the 8th of November, 1872, the deceased in his own name purchased the land in controversy for $5,000, and received a deed therefor in the usual form. The deceased and his wife on March 4, 1875, and while living upon and occupying the land as a place of residence, jointly executed and acknowledged a declaration of homestead in proper form and caused the same to be recorded in the office of the county recorder in and for the city and county of San Francisco. The homestead thus created still exists. On December 1, 1878, Charles A. Bauer died, leaving a will dated April 6, 1875, whereby Frederica Bauer, his widow, and one Liemert were nominated as executrix and executor of the will, and his son, the contestant, made sole devisee of the separate property of deceased and one-half of the community property. The will was admitted to probate upon the application of his widow, who was appointed and duly qualified as executrix, and acted as such until October, 1880, when, after her accounts were finally allowed and settled, she resigned and was discharged from her trust. On the 26th day of October, 1880, the present administrator, husband of the late widow of Bauer, deceased, was appointed, but did not qualify as such until February 14, 1887, six years and four months after his appointment. He thereupon entered upon the discharge of his duties as administrator, and on the 23rd day of August, 1887, filed his final account with his petition for final distribution, showing, inter alia, that all the personalty belonging to the estate had been disposed of; that the only residue consisted of the homestead; and that the same was community property, and that the only heirs and devisees of deceased are contestant and his mother, Frederica Garrett. To which petition Mrs. Garrett answered, averring that the homestead was selected and declared to be such by herself and her former husband; that it was at that time community property, not exceeding $5,000 in value; and up to the date of the death of deceased did not exceed such value; and closing with a demand for the distribution of the homestead to her as her sole property. The contestant also filed exceptions to the administrator's account for his, the administrator's, failure to collect and charge himself with the rent of the homestead property from the date of his appointment until he qualified, and for expenditures for counsel fees and interest paid on a mortgage debt which had never been presented to the administrator for allowance; and also his opposition to the distribution of the whole of the homestead to his mother, on the ground that three-fifths of the purchase price thereof was the separate property of the deceased, and by the terms of the will he, contestant, should receive three-fifths of the homestead. After a hearing upon the issues thus raised, the court decreed that the homestead was community property, and assigned it to Mrs. Garrett, and that the rents and profits of the homestead during the six years and four months from the appointment until the qualification of the administrator were received and applied by Mrs. Garrett to her own use and the maintenance and education of contestant; that the items of counsel fees and interest were paid out of such rents, and as contestant had no interest in the homestead he had no right to object. From this decree the contestant appeals.

The principal question is whether the realty from the time it was purchased until the time the homestead character was impressed upon it belonged to the community property, or partly to the community property and partly to the separate estate of deceased. The property having been purchased for $5,000, during the coverture of deceased and Mrs. Bauer, became presumptively the community property of both. This is a disputable presumption. "A presumption is a deduction which the law expressly directs to be made from particular facts." Code Civil Proc. § 1959. And "a presumption (unless declared by law to be conclusive) may be controverted by other evidence, direct or indirect; but unless so controverted, the jury are bound to find according to the presumption." Id. § 1961. Respondent contends that this presumption upon which the decree depends, and which of itself is indirect evidence, the latter consisting of two kinds of evidence,—inferences and presumptions, Id. § 1957,—must be controverted by clear and decisive proof, citing Meyer v. Kinzer, 12 Cal. 251, in which the presumption was absolute, because the only proof made to overcome it was the mere joinder by the wife in a conveyance of certain realty which was community property, and the taking by them in their names jointly of a mortgage for a portion of the purchase price therefor, which facts standing alone fell within the same presumption that was assailed. In speaking for the court, Mr. Justice FIELD said: "This invariable presumption which attends the possession of property by either spouse during the existence of the community can only be overcome by clear and certain proof that it was owned by the claimant before marriage, or acquired afterwards in one of the particular ways specified in the statute, or that it is property taken in exchange for, or in the investment, or as the price of the property so originally owned, or acquired. The burden of proof must rest with the claimant of the separate estate." Although in a former part of the same case the phrase "clear and decisive" is used in the same connection, the language above quoted contains a proper and correct statement of the rule, and is in conformity with the rule as established by the Code of Civil Procedure, supra.

Applying this rule, we think the evidence is sufficiently clear and certain to overcome the presumption relied upon by the respondent and acted upon by the trial court, and shows that when the deceased married he had separate property consisting of personalty of his own amounting to over $3,000 in value, and was then employed as a printer, and five months thereafter changed his occupation, and with his wife's father entered into business as partners, using his separate property or a portion thereof to engage in and carry on the partnership business. They remained in business together until his partner's death in December, 1871, and in January, 1872, C. A. Bauer, deceased, purchased at probate sale the interest in the business of his deceased partner for $1,030; and two weeks later, at a profit of $370, sold the same interest to a new partner for $1,400, receiving $300 of it at the time and the remainder in two several payments about one month later. While it is difficult to determine what became of all the separate property of the deceased between the date of his marriage and the purchase of the homestead property, and to trace his separate funds through the community funds which were commingled so as to destroy their identity at the two banks where he had accounts, it is sufficiently clear, and the inference may be fairly deduced, especially in the absence of any evidence to the contrary,—excepting the presumption that the homestead was purchased with community funds, and which, in the opinion of the learned trial judge, overcame all the evidence adduced to rebut it,—that, at the time the homestead was purchased, deceased's interest in the business he was then engaged in was his separate property, and also the $1,400 that he had eight months before received from his partner in business in payment as before stated for the interest sold to such partner; and that, at least, the said sum of $1,400 was used by deceased as his separate property in purchasing the homestead; and that the remainder of the purchase price was derived from a loan from his wife's mother, a portion of which loan was used to finish or repair the building that was then on the land purchased. He supported his family out of his earnings or profits in his business, and had no other business or income except occasional dividends from the banks where and while he had money on deposit, these dividends having been earned by the separate and community property, and, it not appearing in what proportion, must be considered as belonging to the community property. Where property is acquired by funds belonging partly to the separate property of one spouse and partly to the community property, the property so acquired becomes in part the separate property of the spouse who furnishes the funds from his or her separate property, and in part the community property of both spouses in proportion to the separate and community funds invested in it. Schuyler v. Broughton, 70 Cal. 282, 11 Pac. Rep. 719. In following the separate property of deceased through its various mutations in the two banks and in his business until the purchase of the homestead, we are aided by the principles that it having been conclusively shown that deceased owned separate property at the time of his marriage it is presumed that it continued to remain such, (Code Civil Proc. § 1963, subd. 32,)[1] and that the profits thereof acquired the same character. Civil Code, 163.[2]

Under the facts in Smith v. Bailey, 66 Tex. 553, 1 S. W. Rep. 627, cited by respondent, it was hardly possible to distinguish the separate from the community property. In that case the profits arising from the investment of the married woman's property in carrying on a business for herself, but in her husband's name, became by law of that state the community estate of herself and husband; and had been, for between two and three years, commingled with her separate estate in replenishing her stock of goods in carrying on her business; especially as there was no evidence to show what part of the profits had been used in keeping up the stock.

When the declaration of homestead was made, in which both joined, the following, to wit: "We further declare that said property was to the extent of $3,000 acquired and improved with the separate estate of Charles Bauer," was inserted therein. This declaration or recital was on the part of Mrs. Bauer self-disserving, and can be used against her, especially as she is claiming under her husband, with whom in the homestead she was a tenant in common. The acts and declarations of one co-tenant in the presence and hearing of the other as to their relative rights is competent evidence against the one claiming under the other. Crippen v. Morss, 49 N. Y. 63.

Standing alone, this admission is not sufficient to overcome the presumption that the property belonged to the community, but tends to show how she regarded the property at the time it was made. It seems also that from that time until she filed her answer to the petition in this contest, a period of twelve years, she treated it as property belonging partly to the separate estate of the deceased and partly to the community property of both. And, while acting as the executrix, she signed and swore to the inventory of the estate, which set forth that the realty to the extent of $3,000 was the separate property of the deceased. Although this, and the statement to the same effect in the declaration of homestead, are admissions subject to explanation operating against her, and tending to show how she regarded the property at the time of signing the instruments respectively, (Duff v. Duff, 71 Cal. 513, 12 Pac. Rep. 570, and authorities cited, Code Civil Proc. §§ 1850 and 1870, subd. 7,) they do not, as contended for by appellant, estop her from asserting the contrary. In Anthony v. Chapman, 65 Cal. 73, 2 Pac. Rep. 889, the court says: "The appellant contends that by representing in his petition for letters testamentary of the will of Mary A. Smith that said property belonged to her estate, and filing an inventory of her estate which included said property, J. P. Smith was estopped from afterwards claiming that it was his own. In Carter v. McManus, 15 La. Ann. 676, the court says 'that admissions made by the executor or an administrator in the course of judicial proceedings are made for the benefit of the estate represented by him, and do not conclude his individual right by way of estoppel.' Another case very much in point is Werkheiser v. Werkheiser, 3 Rawle, 326. The facts in this case fall short of what is required to constitute an estoppel." From the foregoing it follows that the court erred in distributing all of the homestead property to Mrs. Garrett, and in holding that contestant had no interest therein, and had no right to object to the account of the administrator.

One other point remains to be considered. The attorney at law who drew the declaration of homestead, and was at the time apparently acting for the deceased and his wife in the matter, was interrogated, on behalf of contestant, as to whether the recital in the declaration of homestead was explained to Mrs. Bauer, if she understood it, what explanation was given, and what she knew about the matter. This was objected to on the ground that it called for a privileged communication between attorney and client, and was sustained, and excepted to. The objection should have been overruled. When two persons address a lawyer as their common agent, their communications to the lawyer, as far as concerns strangers, will be privileged, but as to themselves they stand on the same footing as to the lawyer, and either can compel him to testify against the other as to their negotiations. 1 Whart. Ev. § 587; Hanlon v. Doherty, 109 Ind. 37, 9 N. E. Rep. 782; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 244; Michael v. Foil, (N. C.) 6 S. E. Rep. 264. In the latter case it was held that an attorney who wrote the deed could be examined as to what was said by the parties at the time relative to the transaction, whether he was acting as attorney for the one who called him or for both. We therefore advise that the decree be reversed, and the contest remanded for further proceedings.

[1] This section makes it a disputable presumption "that a thing, once proved to exist, continues as long as is usual with things of that nature."

RAZZO v. VARNI et al. (No. 11,558.)

TRESPASS—PLEADING—DAMAGES.

1. A complaint in trespass, alleging that defendants entered plaintiff's close, and diverted the waters of his well, and frightened his wife, is not objectionable as presenting a misjoinder of causes of action.
2. In such action, where plaintiff shows peaceable possession under a paper title for several years, if defendants have any right of entry, it must be pleaded in justification.
3. In such case, evidence by plaintiff that his loss was four dollars per day, estimated on the loss of profits on his crop of vegetables, is incompetent, as being the conclusion of the witness, and not the facts on which an estimate could be made.
4. Such damages were special, and, if recoverable at all, must be pleaded.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. F. SULLIVAN, Judge.

C. Razzo sued N. Varni and others for trespass. His complaint alleged an entry on his close, which was then "the property of, and in the quiet and peaceable possession of, said plaintiff, and then and there, willfully, unlawfully and maliciously, and with force and arms, broke and dug up said close and the soil, earth, and ground of said close, and made a large, long, and deep ditch in said close, and diverted the waters from a certain spring on said close, and converted and appropriated the waters of said spring to their (said defendants) own use, said spring and the waters thereof being then the property of plaintiff; and broke and destroyed a large quantity of rushes then and there growing on said soil, and the property of plaintiff; and frightened and terrorized Catarina Razzo, the wife of plaintiff, whereby she became sick and was injured; and then and there disturbed the plaintiff in the use, possession, and occupation of said close, and prevented him from enjoying the same, as he otherwise would have done; whereby said plaintiff has been injured and damaged in his said close, and in said soil and rushes, and said spring, and the waters thereof, and in the use and enjoyment thereof, and by reason of all which premises aforesaid, said plaintiff is injured and has sustained damages in the sum of $5,000." Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal.

M. C. Hassett, Winans & Belknap, (J. B. Hannon, of counsel,) for appellants. T. C. Coogan, for respondent.

HAYNE, C. Action for a malicious trespass in entering with force the plaintiff's close, and diverting the waters of a certain spring. Verdict and judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal.

We do not think that the complaint was ambiguous, or that there was any misjoinder of causes of action. The circumstances adverted to by counsel were matters of aggravation, and the defendants must be held to have had no right to enter the close, for the plaintiff proved a peaceable possession under a paper title for several years; and, if defendants had any right of entry for any purpose, they should have pleaded it in justification, which was not done.

But we think there was error in the admission of evidence upon the question of damages. Conceding that where a trespass is malicious or accompanied with circumstances of oppression the damages may be exemplary, nevertheless some of the evidence was not admissible. The plaintiff was called as a witness, and was asked: "What do you estimate your damages per day from your loss of water from that spring?" and was allowed to answer that he estimated his damages at about four dollars per day. It is apparent from the use of the words "per day" that the question called for some continuing damages supposed to result from the trespass. And it is clear from the testimony of the witness that he was speaking of the profits which he thought he would have made from the sale of vegetables which he was of opinion he could have raised upon his land had his supply of water not been lessened by the acts of the defendants. His business was "that of gardener,—furnishing vegetables to the city markets;" and he says: "Before defendants dug the ditch I grew nice vegetables. Now I have poor vegetables; not worth anything. My garden used to bring me in twice as much as it does now. I raised twice as many vegetables, for then I could irrigate it; but since the ditch was dug I could not." Assuming, as counsel have assumed, that such damages are not too remote and speculative, we think that the question was improper for two reasons: In the first place, it called for a mere conclusion of the witness, and not for facts upon which any rational estimate could be made; and in the second place, the damages, if recoverable at all, were special, and were not pleaded. The rule that special damages must be pleaded is well settled. Potter v. Froment, 47 Cal. 166; Nunan v. San Francisco, 38 Cal. 690; Gay v. Winter, 34 Cal. 162; Stevenson v. Smith, 28 Cal. 103. There was scarcely any other evidence of pecuniary damage, and we cannot say that the jury did not base their verdict upon this evidence. We therefore advise that the judgment and order appealed from be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

CARDWELL v. SACRAMENTO COUNTY et al.

(No. 12,572.)

NAVIGABLE WATERS.

The effect of a series of statutes declaring what streams or portions of streams shall be navigable, which, after declaring a stream navigable between certain points, and repeatedly changing one of those points, omits the stream from the list of navigable waters entirely, is to declare by implication that the stream is non-navigable. THORNTON, J., dissenting.

In bank. Commissioners' decision. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county.

Action by John T. Cardwell against the county of Sacramento, the California Bridge Company, and Alfred W. Burrell, to restrain the erection of a bridge across the American river. A demurrer to the complaint was sustained, and plaintiff appeals.

Taylor & Holl, for appellant. Davis & Hill and W. H. Beatty, for respondents.

BELCHER, C. C. This action was brought to enjoin the defendants from constructing a bridge without a draw across the American river, and thereby obstructing its navigation. In the complaint it is alleged, in substance, that plaintiff owns a large tract of land bordering on the American river, about 20 miles above its mouth; that during the winter and spring months of the year the river is navigable from its mouth to a point above the land of plaintiff, and by the use of steam-boats and other vessels he is able to transport the commodities produced and existing on his land down the American river to the Sacramento river, and thence to the cities of Sacramento and San Francisco, which are his principal markets; that the county of Sacramento has contracted with the other defendants for the construction of a bridge across the American river at a point about a mile above its mouth, which, under the contract, is to be made without a draw or other opening for the passage of vessels, and it is to be so low that when the river is navigable,—that is, at the time of high water,—no vessels capable of transporting the products of plaintiff's land can pass beneath it; that unless restrained the defendants will proceed to construct the bridge according to the contract, and that, if it is so constructed, it will obstruct the navigation of the river, and cause special damage to the plaintiff. A general demurrer was interposed and sustained to the complaint, and, the plaintiff declining to amend, judgment was thereupon entered dismissing the action. The appeal is from this judgment.

It is argued for appellant that the demurrer admits that the American river is a navigable stream, and that section 2875 of the Political Code expressly prohibits the construction of bridges across navigable streams without draws, or so as to obstruct navigation; and section 3479 of the Civil Code provides that anything which obstructs the free passage or use in the customary manner of any navigable river or stream is a nuisance; that the demurrer was therefore improperly sustained, and the judgment should be reversed. But the averment in the complaint is only that the river is navigable at certain seasons of the year, when the water is high, and not generally that it is a navigable stream. What is meant by the words "navigable streams," as used in the section of the Code cited? Do the words include all streams that can be navigated in times of high water? If so, then many small creeks and sloughs in the state, though they may be nearly dry during the larger part of the year, must be treated as navigable streams, across which bridges "must be so constructed as not to obstruct navigation, and must have a draw or swing of sufficient space or span to permit the safe, convenient, and expeditious passage at all times of any steamer, vessel, or raft which may navigate the stream or water bridged." We do not think the words were intended to have the broad meaning suggested, or to include any streams other than such as have been declared navigable by the legislature, or are generally navigable in fact, that is to say, during ordinary stages of water. But, however this may be, the words certainly cannot be held to include streams which have been in effect declared by the legislature to be non-navigable. Now, turning to the statutes, we find that in 1850 an act was passed which declared the American river to be navigable from its mouth up to "the place called the 'Mill Dam,' at the head of the race, made by Captain J. A. Sutter for the erection of a grist-mill." St. 1850, p. 100. In 1851 a new act was passed repealing the act of 1850, and declaring the American river navigable from its mouth to the town of Brighton. St. 1851, p. 422. In 1853, and again in 1854, the act of 1851 was amended, and by both of these amendatory acts the American river was declared navigable from its mouth to the "lower ford," which is said in respondent's brief to be the site for the erection of the bridge in controversy. St. 1853, p. 182; and 1854, p. 81. In 1860 and 1861, the act of 1854 as amended in 1853 and 1854, was further amended, and by these acts, the American river was entirely dropped from the list of navigable streams. St. 1860, p. 168; and 1861, p. 274. Many other acts, and among them section 2349 of the Political Code, have since been passed, declaring certain rivers and water-ways to be navigable, but in none of these acts is the American river named or referred to. The question then is, what is the effect of this legislation? In Water Co. v. Amsden, 6 Cal. 443, the court, speaking of the same river, said: "In regard to the river under consideration, the statute declares it to be navigable up to a point which is below the dam of the plaintiffs. Thus, by implication, it is declared non-navigable above that place." This language seems to be applicable to the case in hand. Here we have a stream which was by statute declared navigable up to a certain point, and then, by successive amendments to the statutes, was placed lower and lower down, until finally the stream was wholly omitted from the list of navigable waters. This shows that the attention of the legislature was directly called to the matter; that its action was direct and affirmative; and that by implication the whole stream has been declared non-navigable. We therefore conclude that the American river is not a navigable stream, or a "public way," within the meaning of any of the provisions of the Codes, and that the judgment should be affirmed.

I concur: Vancleif, C.

Baker et al. v. Ducker et al. (No. 12,471.)

Religious Societies—Complaint—Evidence.

1. A complaint for the recovery of land, stating in substance that plaintiffs are members of a certain religious society and sue for the benefit of themselves and all other members; that the society is in full membership with a certain national church, and was organized to teach the gospel according to the rules, discipline, and doctrine of that church; that the society was incorporated; that it purchased the property in question to be used as a parsonage, with funds contributed by its members and others; and that the defendants, who were members, also, procured the name of the corporation to be changed for fraudulent purposes, and diverted the property from its intended use,—avers a good cause of action.

2. Such a complaint, alleging that the plaintiffs accepted one doctrinal standard and the defendants another, is sufficiently definite, though it does not show the difference between the two confessions of faith.

3. Plaintiffs could maintain such an action under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 382, providing that one or more may sue or defend for all in an action involving a question of common or general interest to many persons.

4. A document identified by members of the society, one of whom was its secretary, as the constitution and by-laws used by the society from its organization, is admissible, though no vote of the society, adopting it as such, is shown.

5. A majority of the society could not change the purpose for which the property was purchased by adopting the different doctrine of a different church, and procuring a change of its corporate name.

6. Evidence that some of the persons who were members of the society when it was organized and incorporated, and many contributors to the parsonage fund, were members of the church to whose use defendants sought to divert the property, is irrelevant.

In bank. Commissioners' decision. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by Henry Baker and others against John Ducker and others, to recover land. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal.

Joseph H. Budd, (T. M. Osment, of counsel,) for appellants. J. C. Campbell, (C. H. Clement, of counsel,) for respondents.

Belcher, C. C. This is an action to recover, for the use of the members of the First Reformed Church of the City of Stockton, a lot of land, with the dwelling-house thereon, which is situate in the city of Stockton and was purchased and formerly used as a parsonage for the church. The defendants demurred to the complaint on the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action; that it was indefinite and uncertain in certain specified particulars; and that the plaintiffs had not legal capacity to sue and maintain the action. The demurrer was overruled, and thereupon the defendants answered. The findings and judgment were in favor of plaintiffs, and the appeal was taken by defendants from the judgment and order denying them a new trial.

The first question to be considered is as to the sufficiency of the complaint. The complaint is very long, but it states, in substance, that the plaintiffs and those with whom they are associated, and for whose benefit the action is also prosecuted, are a religious society in full membership with a national religious society known as the "Reformed Church in the United States;" that they were organized for the purpose of teaching the gospel according to the particular form of worship, rules of government, discipline and doctrines of that church, and, after such organization, they were duly incorporated under the name of the "First Reformed Church of the City of Stockton;" that the corporation purchased the property in controversy with funds donated by its members and by the public, for the purpose of using it as a residence for its pastors, and for no other or different purpose whatever; that the defendants, for fraudulent purposes, procured the name of the corporation to be changed, and thereafter diverted the property from the use for which it was purchased and originally intended.

1. Assuming, as we must on demurrer, that all facts stated are true, we think the complaint states a cause of action.

2. We do not think the complaint indefinite and uncertain in any important particular. The plaintiffs accepted the doctrinal standard contained in the Heidelberg Catechism, and the defendants that of the Lutheran Church. These doctrinal standards are alleged to be different; but we can see no necessity for stating particularly what they were and wherein they differed.

3. The plaintiffs aver that they, together with a large number of other persons, are associated together for religious purposes, and are members of the First Reformed Church of the City of Stockton, and that they prosecute the action for all the members of the church as well as themselves. This shows the question to be one of a common or general interest of many persons, and that the action was authorized by section 382 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

4. It is argued for appellants that the court erred in admitting in evidence the constitution and by-laws of the First Reformed Church of the City of Stockton, and in support of this argument it is said that they were never adopted by any vote or act of the congregation. The congregation was organized in 1870, and the paper offered in evidence was headed: "Constitution and By-Laws of the First Reformed Church of Stockton, Adopted the 12th of June, 1870." One of the defendants, Louis Tschiersky, was a witness, and, on being shown the book containing the writings objected to, testified: "This which you now show me in the book are the constitution and by-laws of the Reformed Church,—of our church here in Stockton. I do not know of any other constitution or by-laws for that church." Another witness, Schimelpfenig, on being shown the same book, testified: "I was the first secretary of the church here. That book is one of the books of the First Reformed Church. The constitution was written by Mr. Fox, the minister. We always took it for the constitution and by-laws of our church. They always acted on them, and considered them as such. I do not know of any direct vote of the congregation adopting them, but they have always been the constitution and by-laws of the church, since it was organized until the present day." In view of the foregoing testimony, we see no error in the ruling complained of.

5. It is also urged that the court erred in excluding evidence offered by defendants to show that some of the persons who were members of the society when it was organized, and took part in having it incorporated, and many of those who contributed money for the purchase of the parsonage, were at the time Lutherans in their religious belief. The objection was that the evidence was irrelevant and immaterial, and we are unable to see how it was relevant to any issue in the case. The society was organized and incorporated as a "reformed church." Its articles of incorporation show that its purpose was "to provide its members with the preaching of the gospel, the administration of the sacraments and the other means of grace, in accordance with the confessions of faith known as the 'Heidelberg Catechism,'" and that it adopted the doctrine and discipline of the Reformed Church in the United States. The subscription list by which all the money was raised to purchase the parsonage was headed: "We, the undersigned, obligate ourselves to pay the sums which we have written opposite our respective names for the erection of a parsonage for the First Reformed Congregation of Stockton;" and the deed of the property was made to the Reformed Church of the City of Stockton. This being so, the property was dedicated to the use of the church for which it was purchased, and it was a matter of no consequence whether some of the church members and some of the persons who contributed money to make the purchase were Lutherans or not.

6. Stress is laid upon the fact that the name of the corporation was changed by an order of court, and that 11 of its members signed the paper asking for the change. But it does not appear that the 11 were a majority of the members of the church, nor, if it had so appeared, do we see how appellants would have been aided thereby. Defendant Tscheirsky testified: "When we made the application for a change of name it was to change the church into an independent Lutheran church and adopt the Lutheran doctrine." And the court found that the application was made "with the intent and for the purpose of depriving said congregation of the benefit of their corporate franchise, and of changing the original purpose and intent for which the same was organized, and of depriving said Reformed Church, and the congregation thereof, of the use and benefit of their property herein described, and for the purpose of diverting all of said property of said corporation from the use to which it was dedicated by said corporation and by the members of said congregation, and from the purposes for which the funds were subscribed with which to purchase the said property." It is thus made clear that the property in question was held by the Reformed Church in trust for its members, and the defendants, even though they constituted a majority of the members, had no right and no power to divert it to the use of another and different church organization. Kniskern v. Lutheran Churches, 1 Sandf. Ch. 439; Schnorr's Appeal, 67 Pa. St. 138; Roshi's Appeal, 69 Pa. St. 462; Watson v. Jones, 13 Wall. 679.

The other points discussed by counsel do not require special notice. Looking at the whole record, we find nothing calling for a reversal of the judgment, and we therefore advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

I concur: FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are affirmed.

PATERSON, J., did not participate in the decision of this cause.

LOVELAND v. GARDNER et al. (No. 12,550.)

FENCES—BARB-WIRE—NEGLIGENCE—APPEAL—REVIEW.

1. One who has constructed and maintains a barb-wire fence in a negligent manner is liable for injuries occasioned thereby to the domestic animals of others, though the fence is entirely on his own land.

2. Where a judgment for plaintiff is for too large an amount, and the supreme court ascertains the correct amount, which is small, the cause will be remanded, with directions to require plaintiff to file a waiver of any greater sum than the correct amount, with interest from the date of the judgment, or, on his failure so to do, to grant a new trial.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Lassen county; M. MARSTELLER, Judge.

Action by F. C. Loveland against Charles F. Gardner and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal.

Taylor & Holl, for appellants. Spencer & Raker and E. R. Dodge, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. The defendants inclosed their land with a barb-wire fence, part of it running along a highway. The posts were thirty-six feet apart, and had fastened to them three strands of barb-wire. The first strand was 24 inches above the ground; the second, 13 inches above the first; and the third, 15 inches above the second. Nothing was used in the construction of the fence but posts and wire. The fence was built entirely upon the lands of the defendants. Plaintiff, who is an adjoining owner, and a stock-raiser, alleged and proved that some of his horses came in contact with the fence without any fault or negligence on his part, and a number of them were killed, and others badly wounded. There was evidence tending to show that the wires of the fence were not properly stretched, but were left hanging loose between the posts, in such a way that stock would not be likely to see them. The question of negligence in the construction of the fence was properly and fairly left to the jury under the instructions of the court.

The act of the defendants in constructing the fence upon their property, and along the line of the public highway, did not, of itself, render them liable to the plaintiff for the damages sustained, but, if the fence was constructed and maintained in such a manner as to constitute negligence, they were properly held liable. We cannot say that the evidence is insufficient upon the question of negligence to support the verdict. There are many material circumstances which, added to the facts above stated, tend to show negligence, but we do not deem it necessary, for the purposes of this decision, to relate them. A lawful wire fence has been defined by the legislature as follows: "Wire fence shall be made of posts not less than twelve inches in circumference, set in the ground not less than eighteen inches, and not more than eight feet apart, with not less than three horizontal wires, each one-fourth of an inch in diameter. The first one shall be eighteen inches from the ground, the other two above this one at intervals of one foot between each, all well stretched, and securely fastened from one post to another, with one rail, slat, pole, or plank of suitable size and strength, securely fastened to the posts not less than four and one-half feet from the ground." Pol. Code, § 19, subd. 23; Hitt. Gen. Laws, § 3032. Of course the liability of the defendants does not depend upon the question whether their fence came up to the legislative standard,—which fixes the liability of owners of trespassing animals in certain counties,—but the act quoted shows what the legislature of the state considered a good fence. The defendants were not bound to maintain any fence at all, but, having undertaken to maintain one, they were bound to see that it was not made a trap for passing animals. It is the duty of the land-owner to take notice of the natural propensity of domestic animals, and to exercise reasonable care to prevent his fence from becoming dangerous. The fact that the fence was constructed entirely upon defendants' land is no defense, if negligently constructed or maintained. The case comes within the rule established by a recent decision of this court in Malloy v. Savings & Loan Society, ante, 525, (filed April 22, 1889.) In that case the defendant had negligently suffered a privy vault and cess-pool to remain open upon its premises, about 10 feet from the sidewalk of a public street in the city of San Francisco, without any inclosure, and plaintiff's minor child, without any fault or negligence on his (plaintiff's) part, had fallen into the same and was drowned therein. The demurrer to the complaint, which stated substantially these facts, was sustained in the court below, and the order reversed here. The decision was based upon the principle that one should so use his own property as not to injure the property of another. Of course, this principle—which is a maxim of common justice, as well as of law—does not create a liability for every injury one may sustain through the use by another of his own property; but where the latter is guilty of a breach of duty which he owes to others in the use of his property, whether by intention or neglect, he is liable for any injury which is occasioned thereby, if the injury is the natural or probable result of the act, and such as a prudent man, under the circumstances, acting with ordinary care, would have foreseen. Under such circumstances, it is no defense that the property is used for a lawful purpose. The following cases illustrate the rule: Birge v. Gardner, 19 Conn. 507; Durham v. Musselman, 18 Amer. Dec. 133; Railroad Co. v. Allen, 22 Kan. 286. The case at bar is similar to Sisk v. Crump, 112 Ind. 504, 14 N. E. Rep. 381, where it was held that a barbwire fence, the strands of which were negligently suffered to sag down and hang loosely from the posts, was not such a fence as a good husbandman would construct or maintain, and that the defendant was liable for injuries occasioned to plaintiff's horse while attempting to pass from the street into defendant's field. See, also, Powers v. Harlow, 19 N. W. Rep. 259; Fink v. Furnace Co., 10 Mo. App. 69; Railroad Co. v. Hudson, 62 Ga. 680.

The court instructed the jury that the plaintiff could recover only one-half of the damage sustained by the horses owned by him and Knight jointly. We thing the instruction is correct, but, whether correct or incorrect, the jury was bound by it. Emerson v. County of Santa Clara, 40 Cal. 543. The verdict and judgment were in favor of the plaintiff for $575 and costs. The evidence shows without conflict that the damage to the property owned jointly by Knight and the plaintiff was $390. Only four horses belonged to plaintiff individually. It is in evidence that two of these horses were damaged to the extent of $75. The other two of the four mentioned were a sorrel colt and a black mare, but plaintiff does not state the damage occasioned to these, or either of them. The witness Cady mentioned the sorrel colt, and estimated the damage to it to be $30. Assuming this to be the property of plaintiff, the colt mentioned by plaintiff as his property, he would be entitled to recover the following sums only: One-half of $390,—the damage to the joint property of Knight and himself,—and the other sums mentioned,—$75 and $30 damages to his individual property,—or a total of $300. The amount involved is very small, and we desire, if possible, to avoid the expense and delay of a new trial. The cause is therefore remanded, with directions to the court below to enter an order requiring plaintiff, within such time as the court may fix, to file with the clerk a waiver of any greater sum than $300, with interest thereon at 7 per cent. from the date of the judgment, together with the costs of the action, and directing that, unless such waiver be filed within the time mentioned, a new trial will be granted. In case such waiver is filed, each party will pay one-half the costs of this appeal, and the judgment and order will stand as they are. If the waiver be not filed, the court below will order a new trial

STREET CONTRACTS—EXTENSION OF TIME.

1. Const. Cal. art. 11, § 19, (which went into operation January 1, 1880,) prohibits the letting of any contract by a city for street improvements the cost of which is chargeable upon private property by special assessments, unless the assessments therefor shall have been previously levied, collected, and paid into the city treasury. Held, that a contract for street work, made by a city at a time when there was no such constitutional restriction, could lawfully be extended, as to time of completion, by agreement made after January 1, 1880, but before the expiration of the period originally fixed for completion. Following Paving Co. v. Barstow, ante, 544.

2. The special act (Acts Cal. 1877–78, p. 231) conferring certain powers upon the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco in addition to those already existing under the general street-improvement act of April 1, 1872, does not affect the latter act as to the authority of the street commissioner to make contracts for the street grading authorized by the act of 1878, nor the jurisdiction of the board of supervisors to have the work performed under such contracts.

3. Though the act of 1878 authorized the improvement of a street consisting of eight blocks, it is not required that the work shall be let by a single contract, nor treated as an entirety, but the board of supervisors are given full discretionary power to order what part shall be graded under different contracts.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; M. A. EDMONDS, Judge.

J. C. Bates, for appellant. Garber & Bishop, for respondent.

FOOTE, C. This is an action to recover on an assessment upon certain property of the defendant to pay for work done in grading Seventh street, from King to Berry street, in the city and county of San Francisco. The plaintiff sues as the assignee of one Buckman, the contractor, who is alleged to have performed the work. The improvement was made by virtue of a statute contained on page 231 of the Legislative Acts of 1877 and 1878, which gave certain powers to the board of supervisors of said city and county in addition to those which already existed under the general street-improvement act of April 1, 1872, (Acts 1871–72, p. 804 et seq.) The cause was heard before the court without a jury, and upon the evidence adduced a nonsuit was entered. From the judgment therein, and an order denying a new trial, this appeal is taken. There seems to be no dispute but that the assessment, warrant, diagram, and return show prima facie the regularity of all the proceedings prior thereto. The contract to which the complaint has reference, as well as the assessment, was in due form; so that if the contract was performed under constitutional authority, and was authorized and made in accordance with the Acts of 1872 and 1878, supra, it seems to be conceded on all sides that the nonsuit should not have been granted on the grounds alleged,—that the evidence was insufficient to sustain the action, or that the claim set up in the complaint was invalid.

The main defense upon which the respondent relied in the court below, and relies here, is that the claim set forth in the complaint is void, because in contravention of section 19, art. 11, of the state constitution of 1879.[1] He claims that, although the contract on the performance of which the assessment was issued may have been authorized by the acts of April 1, 1872, and March 12, 1878, supra, if performed before the date of the going into effect of the constitution of 1879, yet that, being unperformed at that time, to-wit, January, 1880, it became null and void, and no valid assessment based upon it could be made. The contract was entered into November 28, 1879, and was by its terms to be completed in 100 days. Before the expiration of the 100 days an additional time of 60 days was given by the board of supervisors of the city and county above mentioned, and, before the last-mentioned extension expired, an additional extension of 100 days was granted, within which latter time the work was completed. The argument of the respondent is that the extensions of time in which to perform the work were in the nature of new contracts, and, as such, were forbidden by the constitutional provision above cited; that any contract unperformed at the date of the going into effect of the constitution of 1879 was nullified, and nothing could be done under it by which any liability could be fixed to pay street assessments. The same contentions raised here upon the effect of the constitutional provision as regards the street work where extensions of time in which to perform it have been given were made in a case lately decided by the appellate court, and were disposed of as follows: "As the contract was made before January, 1880, it was not impaired or affected by the new constitution. The granting of the extension of time was not a novation or new contract; it was merely a pursuance of the original contract under rights existing by virtue of the law under which it was made. The extensions were made before the original time, or the time given in the first extension, had elapsed. The case of Bank v. County of Franklin, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 159, cited by the appellants, differs in many respects from the case at bar." Paving Co. v. Barstow, ante, 544, (No. 11,972, filed April 24, 1889, Department 2.)

It is further alleged that the contract is void on its face because it purports to have been made under the street act of 1872; the respondent claiming that the contract was made, and could only be made, under the act of 1878, which he alleges was a special act, and repealed the act of 1872, so far as the latter gave any jurisdiction to order or make the improvement; that, therefore, no contract could be made under the act of 1872. An examination of both acts shows that the act of 1878 was supplementary merely to the act of 1872; so that a part of Seventh street might be opened without any petition of the owners of the lots thereon, as prescribed by section 4 of the act of 1872, as a condition precedent to give the board of supervisors jurisdiction to have the work done. Notice is also dispensed with to property-owners in certain instances, and special reference is made to all laws respecting street work, including the act of 1872; and it is declared that all such not inconsistent with the act of 1878 are made applicable thereto. The act of 1872 was left intact as regards the authority of the street superintendent to make a contract such as is here involved, and the jurisdiction of the board of supervisors to have the work performed, as required under the act of 1872, was not taken away under the act of 1878. The last act was intended to confer additional powers on the board, not possessed by them under the act of 1872, and what was done under and by virtue of the last-mentioned act is in entire consonance with the act of 1878, supra. It is said by respondent, however, that the contract is void because it authorized only a part of the improvement which the act of 1878 authorized to be done, it being argued that the statute only authorized the work to be done as a whole; that, while the contract was for one block only, the statute contemplated the improvement of eight blocks as an entirety. We do not think that the act in question is susceptible of this narrow construction. It seems to give the board of supervisors full discretionary power to order what part should be graded in one or more contracts at a time. This disposes of the material points made for the affirmance of the judgment and order. They seem to have no substantial merit, and we advise that the judgment and order be reversed.

We concur: Belcher, C. C.; Hayne, C.

[1] No public work or improvement of any description whatsoever shall be done or made in any city, in, upon, or about the streets thereof, or otherwise, the cost and expense of which is made chargeable or may be assessed upon private property by special assessment, unless an estimate of such cost and expense shall be made, and an assessment, in proportion to benefits, on the property to be affected or benefited shall be levied, collected, and paid into the city treasury before such work or improvement shall be commenced, or any contract for letting or doing the same authorized or performed.

WITHERS v. JACKS. (No. 11,919.)

MORTGAGES—QUIETING TITLE.

1. A land-owner gave two mortgages and in a suit to foreclose one of them defendant, the other mortgagee, was made a party. The mortgagor defaulted and consented to the foreclosure of defendant's mortgage also. There was a dispute as to the priority of the mortgages, and defendant appealed from a decision against him, without, however, obtaining or asking for a stay of execution. The judgment was reversed for defective findings as to priority, but it was held in that suit, and in a suit between the mortgagor and defendant, that the mortgagor was not affected by the appeal and that the foreclosure sale was final. Plaintiff held under the purchaser at the sale, and the land was not redeemed. Held, that plaintiff was the owner in fee of the land.

2. Defendant, in a suit to quiet title, after having denied that plaintiff had any right or title to the land, and put him to his proof, cannot contend, on appeal, that a mortgage, which was the interest defendant claimed, was not such an interest as would justify a decree quieting title.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Monterey county; JOHN K. ALEXANDER, Judge.

Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 738, authorizes an action by any person against another who claims an estate or interest in real property adverse to him, to determine such adverse claim.

S. O. Houghton and S. F. Leib, for appellant. N. A. Dorn and W. M. R. Parker, for respondent.

MCFARLAND, J. This is an action to quiet title to certain lands in Monterey county, described as "lots one and two" of a certain range. The answer denies that plaintiff is the owner of the land, or that he has any estate or right or title to the same, or any part thereof, and avers that defendant has a mortgage upon said land executed by one Milton Little and his wife, Mary Little, bearing date July 21, 1874. The court below gave judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals from the judgment and from an order denying a new trial.

Plaintiff holds title to the land by virtue of a sheriff's deed made upon the foreclosure of a mortgage by Milton Little and wife to James W Withers, executed December 11, 1875, and recorded the next day, and, also, of another mortgage executed by said Little and wife to David Jacks, (defendant herein,) dated July 21, 1874, but not recorded until June 2, 1876. The foreclosure suit was brought by said James W. Withers, and Jacks was made a party defendant therein. The Littles made default, and consented that Jacks' mortgage might also be foreclosed. Both mortgages were foreclosed. There was a contest between Withers and Jacks as to priority between the two mortgages. The court decided that contest in favor of Withers. Jacks appealed, but did not get, or ask for, any stay of execution. The land was sold under the decree of foreclosure to James W. Withers, and in due time—no redemption being made—he received a sheriff's deed and the title under said deed was conveyed to Milton Withers, the plaintiff in this present action. On Jacks' appeal the judgment was reversed on account of defective findings on the issue of priority between the two mortgages; but it must be taken to have been conclusively held in that case, (Withers v. Little, 56 Cal. 370,) and in the subsequent case of Little v. Superior Court, 74 Cal. 219, 15 Pac. Rep. 731, that the Littles were not affected by the appeal, and that the sale under the foreclosure was final. We think, therefore, that the court correctly found that the plaintiff is the owner in fee of the land. Milton Little, the former owner of the land, died testate, and devised it to Mary Little, who conveyed to plaintiff herein; so that plaintiff, also, in that way, represents the former owners.

2. Appellant, having denied that respondent had any title or right to the land, and put him to his proof, ought not to be heard to say now that a mortgage is not such an interest as will justify a decree quieting title. Moreover, we think that the claim set up by appellant would be a cloud on respondent's title which he has a right to have quieted. "The plaintiff has a right to be quieted in his title whenever any claim is made to real estate * * * the effect of which claim might be litigation, or a loss to him of his property." Head v. Fordyce, 17 Cal. 149. Section 738, Code Civil Proc., is "intended to embrace every description of claim whereby the plaintiff might be deprived of his property, or its title clouded, or its value depreciated." Id.

3. We think the findings cover all the material issues in the case. Judgment and order affirmed.

MILLARD v. SUPREME COUNCIL AMERICAN LEGION OF HONOR. (No. 11,716.)

VERDICT—NEW TRIAL.

1. A new trial must be granted where the findings of the jury do not determine all the material issues made by the pleadings.

2. Under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 659, relating to motions for new trial and their contents, it is not necessary, in a motion for new trial for failure to pass on all such issues, to set out in the statement such failure as a ground for the motion.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JOHN HUNT, Judge.

R. B. Mitchell, for appellant. Manuel Eyre, for appellee.

BELCHER, C. C. This is an appeal from an order granting the defendant a new trial. The action was brought to recover the amount of a benefit certificate issued by defendant, and judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff for the amount sued for. It does not appear from the record upon what ground the new trial was granted, but counsel for respondent prints in his brief what purports to be the opinion of the learned judge who made the order, and from that it appears that the motion was granted upon the ground that there were no findings upon some of the material issues raised by the pleadings. Assuming that the motion was granted upon the ground stated, the question is, was the ruling erroneous? It is argued for appellant that the findings did cover all the material issues, and that, at any rate, a new trial should not have been granted, because it does not appear that the failure to make full findings, if there were such failure, was prejudicial to the losing party, and because there was no specification of the failure in the statement as a ground for the motion. It has been held by this court that a judgment based upon findings which do not determine all the issues raised by the pleadings is a decision against law, for which a new trial may be had. Knight v. Roche, 56 Cal. 15; Brown v. Burbank, 59 Cal. 535. And in such case the statute does not require the moving party to specify in his statement the failure as a ground for his motion. Section 659, Code Civil Proc. After carefully reading the record, we think it clear that the findings did not cover all the material issues raised in the case, and we cannot say, as claimed by appellant, that the judgment would have been the same if the omitted findings had been made in favor of defendant, and that defendant was therefore in no way prejudiced by the failure. The rule is that every error is presumed to work injury to the losing party, unless the contrary clearly appears, and the burden is upon the winning side to show that no injury could have resulted. The cases cited by appellant do not meet the case in hand. The above disposes of the appeal. Counsel have discussed the whole case in their briefs, but we are not called upon to follow them and thus determine what the judgment should be in advance of the new trial. We advise that the order appealed from be affirmed.

We concur: FOOTE, C.; HAYNE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the order appealed from is affirmed.

CENTRAL IRRIGATION DISTRICT v. DE LAPPE et al. (No. 12,954.)

IRRIGATION DISTRICTS—ELECTION—BONDS.

1. Irrigation districts, provided for under Laws Cal. 1887, p. 29, are public corporations to the same extent as reclamation districts.

2. Under section 2 of the act which requires that the petition for the district "shall set forth and particularly describe the proposed boundaries of such district," a description which would be good in a deed is sufficient, and false calls may be rejected, and lines supplied by intendment.

3. Section 2 provides that the petition must be accompanied by a bond to pay all costs if the organization is not completed; and then, "when such petition is presented," the supervisors shall hear the same. A petition was signed by 64 persons. A bond recited that certain persons named, including R. and T., proposed to present a petition "herewith." R. and T. did not sign the petition. Held that, there being no other petition presented, the recital sufficiently identified it.

4. Where the statute requires a bond conditioned to pay the costs "in case the organization is not effected," a bond to "pay all the costs" is insufficient compliance therewith.

5. The board had the power on the day set to hear the petition to continue the hearing and allow a new bond to be filed, and it is sufficient if the bond be filed on the day of the hearing.

6. The recording of an ordinance of a board of supervisors, providing for the holding of regular meetings, is not essential to the validity of the ordinance.

7. A verbal application to the supervisors by an owner of land, to have the same included in the district, is sufficient.

8. Section 2 of the act provides that the board shall not exclude lands from the district which are capable of irrigation by the same system. Held, that the judgment of the board as to the propriety of excluding any lands was final.

9. There is nothing in the act requiring the board to state the reasons which led it to establish the boundaries of the district.

10. A publication of the notice of the election on November 22d in a weekly newspaper, on October 28th, and on the 5th, 12th, and 19th of November, is a sufficient compliance with the provision of the act requiring publication "three weeks prior to the election."

11. The act provides that the election shall be "conducted" in accordance with the general election laws, which provide that voting precincts shall be established at least 30 days before the election. Section 3 of the irrigation act provides that the supervisors shall establish a convenient number of election precincts. Held, that the time for establishing the precincts was in the discretion of the board, and when published with the election proclamation it was sufficient.

12. Section 15 of the act provides that the board of directors shall determine the amount of money required for the purpose of constructing the works, etc., and shall call an election and submit to the electors "the question whether or not bonds of said district shall be issued in the amount so determined, and if a majority vote 'Bonds, yes,' then the board shall cause bonds in said amount to be issued." "The bonds shall each be of the denomination of not less than $100, nor more than $500," and "said bonds shall be payable in installments." Held, that the bonds were properly drawn so as to make each one payable in installments.

Commissioners' decision. Appeal from superior court, Colusa county; E. A. BRIDGFORD, Judge.

W. F. Good, W. C. Belcher, H. M. Albery, and K. Albery, for appellants. Richard Bayne, for respondent. Stanton L. Carter, amicus curiæ.

HAYNE, C. This was an application for mandamus to compel the secretary of an irrigation district to sign and seal certain bonds. One of the property owners of the district was allowed to intervene for the purpose of contesting the validity of the bonds. The court below awarded the mandamus, and the defendant and the intervenor appeal. The district was organized under the act known as the "Wright Law." See Laws 1887, p. 29. This act was held to be constitutional in Irrigation Dist. v. Williams, 18 Pac. Rep. 379. In that case irrigation districts were likened to districts organized for the reclamation of swamp lands, and the court said that it was inclined to think that they were to be regarded as public corporations. We think that the analogy between the two kinds of corporations is strong. The purpose of the one is to make large bodies of land fit for cultivation by removing the excess of water, and that of the other is to make large bodies of land fit for cultivation by distributing water over them. Their general powers are similar in many respects, and they are organized upon the same plan. It is settled that reclamation districts are public corporations, (Dean v. Davis, 51 Cal. 410, 411; People v. Reclamation Dist., 53 Cal. 348; People v. Williams, 56 Cal. 647; Hoke v. Perdue, 62 Cal. 546; People v. La Rue, 67 Cal. 528, 8 Pac. Rep. 84;) and we think that irrigation districts must be held to be so to the same extent. Many objections are taken to the proceedings for the organization of the district, and the argument in relation thereto rests in great part upon the proposition that the proceedings are to be strictly construed. This is put upon two grounds. It is said, in the first place, that the proceedings are for the purpose of divesting the citizen of his property in invitum. It is true that later on provision is made for assessing the property within the district for the purpose of defraying expenses; but no assessments have yet been levied, and none are involved in the case before us. The objections made relate to the organization of the district. The primary purpose of such organization is to perform certain important public functions. The power of assessment, it is true, is incidental. But in the same way it is incidental to cities, and other municipal corporations, strictly so called, for the improvement of streets, etc. And it can no more be said that for this reason proceedings for the organization of irrigation districts are for the purpose of depriving the citizen of his property in invitum than the same could be said of proceedings for the organization of cities and other municipal corporations. It is said, in the next place, that the district was not created by the legislature itself, but by or under the supervision of a local body. But all municipal corporations in the state are henceforth to be created in this way. The constitution provides that corporations for municipal purposes shall not be created by special laws, but shall be organized under such general laws as the legislature shall provide. Article 11, § 6. This necessitates organization under some kind of local supervision, and the general laws which the legislature has provided require that the organization shall be under the supervision of a local body, much in the same way as in the case of an irrigation district. A petition "which shall set forth and particularly describe the proposed boundaries of such corporation" is to be presented to the board of supervisors of the county, which body is to deal with it much in the same manner as the board is to deal with the petition for the formation of an irrigation district. In fact the phraseology of the irrigation law is so similar to that of the municipal corporation act as to make it evident that the former was modeled upon the latter. See Laws 1883, p. 94. Hence, if proceedings for the formation of irrigation districts are to be strictly construed because they are organized under the supervision of a local body, proceedings for the formation of municipal corporations must be so construed for the same reason. But the consequences of wiping out municipal organizations, perhaps after property rights had grown up, because of some slip in the preliminary proceedings, would be so serious that we cannot think that any court would adopt the strict rule of construction which would require it. It will be time enough to apply such a rule when questions as to the extent of the powers arise. So far as proceedings for the organization are concerned, we think that a reasonably liberal rule of construction should be adopted to carry out the wise purposes of the law. In the light of this rule we proceed to examine the various objections made.

1. Several objections are taken to the description contained in the petition. They are based upon the requirement of the second section of the act, that such petition "shall set forth and particularly describe the proposed boundaries of such districts." It is probable that this provision requires a description by metes and bounds, for it is "the boundaries" which are to be described, and not merely the district. But we think that a description by metes and bounds, which would be sufficient in an ordinary deed, is a compliance with the provision. "The same construction that is given to grants is given to statutes which prescribe the boundaries of incorporated territories." Iron Works v. Tolland, 9 Cush. 496. It has even been held that a more liberal rule should be applied. Hamilton v. NcNeil, 13 Grat. 394. But, at all events, a description by metes and bounds, which would be good in a deed, is sufficient in the petition.

Now, the main point in regard to the description is that it cannot be made to close upon itself. The learned counsel say that "the only way in which this could be done would be to change the distance '200 feet' in line 10 of folio 14 to '2,000 feet,' and '540 feet' in line 6 of folio 18 to '5,400 feet.'" But, if this is necessary, we think that it can and should be done upon the data furnished by the petition itself. The first call referred to is as follows: "Thence south, 34 degrees east, 200 feet to stake 208." For anything that appears to the contrary, this stake is a perfectly plain monument; and, being so, it must control the statement of the distance. Mills v. Lux, 45 Cal. 273; Penry v. Richards, 52 Cal. 672. If, therefore, it is 2,000 feet from the point of departure, the call for 200 must be rejected. False calls may be rejected, and lines supplied by intendment, in the description of the boundaries of a municipal corporation. In re Inhabitants of Ipswich, 13 Pick. 431. A false call may be rejected even in a tax-deed. Bosworth v. Danzien, 25 Cal. 299. The objection to the call for "540 feet" is to be disposed of in a similar way. It is also contended that the starting point and certain other calls of the description are too indefinite. But we cannot say from the face of the paper that this is so; and the evidence to explain and locate the calls, which was clearly admissible, (Reamer v. Nesmith, 34 Cal. 626,) makes them sufficiently definite. Similar objections are made to the description in the order of the board establishing the boundaries of the district, and similar answers apply.

2. It is contended that a proper bond was not filed with the petition. The provision of the act is that "the petitioners must accompany the petition with a good and sufficient bond, to be approved by the said board of supervisors, in double the amount of the probable cost of organizing such district, conditioned that the bondsmen will pay all said cost in case said organization shall not be effected. * * * When such petition is presented, the said board of supervisors shall hear the same," etc. Section 2. The petitioners presented, and the board approved, a bond which is claimed to be insufficient in form. The particulars in which it is said to be insufficient are the following: It is said, in the first place, that the recital in the bond misdescribes the petition. The petition was signed by 64 persons, among whom were J. A. Sutton, James McDermott, George B. Harden, George M. Sutton, and P. R. Garnett. The recital in the bond is that "whereas, J. A. Sutton, James McDermott, Geo. B. Harden, Geo. M. Sutton, P. R. Garnett, N. D. Rideout, A. J. Tully, and others, their associates, propose to present herewith" a petition, etc. Rideout and Tully did not sign the petition. The argument is that the petition filed does not correspond to the one referred to in the bond, and, consequently, that there was no bond upon that petition. The recital, however, is not of a petition actually presented, but of one proposed to be presented. There is no pretense that any other petition was presented. The bond did in fact accompany this petition, and we think that this circumstance, coupled with the recital, is sufficient to identify the document. In the next place it is said that the bond was not conditioned as required by the act. The condition was that the bond should be void "if said obligors or bondsman shall pay all the costs," etc., while the condition required by the statute is that the bondsmen shall pay the cost "in case said organization shall not be effected." The difference is therefore that the bond given provided that the bondsmen should pay the cost in any event, while the statute only requires that they should pay in a certain contingency. We think, however, that the bond may fairly be said to include the provision required by the statute, and that it is not vitiated by including something which was not required; and the use of the singular number in the phrase "if said obligors or bondsman shall pay," etc., is unimportant. But at most the bond was defective merely, and, if it be assumed for the purposes of the case that the giving of a bond was jurisdictional, we think that the board had power to allow a new one to be given before taking action on the petition. The petition was presented, pursuant to notice, on October 10th; and when the matter came up on that day the board made an order allowing a new bond to be filed, and continuing the hearing until a future day. A bond free from objection was filed, and the board then proceeded with the hearing. We think that this course was within the power of the board. No time is fixed for the presentation of a petition. It is to be presented at a regular meeting, pursuant to notice, and the bond must "accompany" the petition. Neither the petition nor the bond need be filed before the petition is presented, and the hearing and the action of the board in the matter may be at the same meeting, although power is expressly given to adjourn for a certain time. It is sufficient, therefore, if the bond be given on the day of the hearing, and we think it clear that there was power to adjourn the hearing so as to allow a proper bond to be filed. Such a bond may be said to "accompany" the petition in the sense of the statute. Even in the case of an appeal-bond it was held, prior to the enactment of any statute on the subject, that where a bond had been given which was defective merely the defects could be cured by giving a new bond in the supreme court. See cases in Hayne, New Trial & App. 651.

3. It is objected that the petition was not presented at a lawful meeting of the board. The act provides that the petition "shall be presented at a regular meeting of said board." A similar provision is in the municipal corporation act. Laws 1883, p. 94. In relation to meetings of boards of supervisors the county government act has the following: "The board of supervisors must by ordinance provide for the holding of regular meetings of the board at their respective county-seats." In pursuance of this provision the board, on April 11, 1885, passed an ordinance fixing the times for its regular meetings. Meetings were held under this ordinance for nearly two years, and up to and including the presentation of the petition. The objections made go back to the validity of this ordinance. It is said that it was not properly recorded in the ordinance book. But its recording in that book has been held to be not essential to its validity. People v. Cole, 70 Cal. 60, 11 Pac. Rep. 481. It is further said that the vote of one of the supervisors was not shown by the entry in the minutes or by the publication; but the meetings were held under this ordinance for a long period as and for regular meetings, and they were the only meetings of the kind which were held; and we do not think that the question of their regularity can have any such far-reaching and collateral effect as to render abortive all the public business that has been transacted during a series of years.

4. It is contended that the petition was not published. The objections in this regard are founded on slight mistakes in the spelling of some of the names, which are entirely unimportant, and of certain defects in the description which are disposed of by what is said under the first head.

5. It is urged that the board had no power to modify the boundaries of the proposed district in the way it did. What the board did was, in the first place, to include in the district certain lands not included by the petition, upon the verbal request of the owners, and, in the second place, to exclude from the district certain lands included by the petition. The provision of the act under which this was done is as follows: "The said board, on the final hearing, may make such changes in the proposed boundaries as they may find to be proper, and shall establish and define such boundaries: provided, that said board shall not modify said boundaries so as to except from the operation of this act any territory within the boundaries of the district proposed by said petitioners which is susceptible of irrigation by the same system of works applicable to the other lands in such proposed district; nor shall any lands which will not, in the judgment of the said board, be benefited by irrigation by said system, be included within such district: provided, that any person whose lands are susceptible of irrigation from the same source shall, upon application of the owner to said board, be entitled to have such lands included in said district." Section 2.

(a) The objection to the inclusion of lands not embraced in the petition is that the application of the owners (which is admitted to have been made) was not in writing; but we see nothing in the act which requires a writing, and we do not think that the court is authorized to superadd such a requirement.

(b) The objection to the exclusion of lands from the proposed boundaries is based upon the proviso that "said board shall not modify said boundaries so as to except from the operation of this act any territory within the boundaries of the district proposed by said petitioners, which is susceptible of irrigation by the same system of works applicable to the other lands in such proposed district." The appellants offered evidence to show that the excluded lands were in fact susceptible of irrigation by the same system of works as the other lands; and such evidence was excluded on the ground that the judgment of the board as to the matter was final. We think that this ruling was right. It is to be observed that no power is given to the board to include lands which are not included by the petition, except upon request of the owners; and with reference to excluded lands it is possible (although we express no opinion upon the point) that the owners could, upon request and a proper showing in some appropriate proceeding, have their lands reincluded. But, so far as the validity of the organization of the district is concerned, we think that the judgment of the board cannot be contradicted, as is attempted here. It is clear that this would be so in the absence of the proviso quoted, (People v. Hagar, 66 Cal. 60, 4 Pac. Rep. 951; People v. Riverside, 70 Cal. 461, 11 Pac. Rep. 759;) and from the nature of the question we think that the proviso must be considered merely as a rule for the guidance of the board, and that, so far as the validity of the district is concerned, their decision is as conclusive as if the proviso had not been inserted. It is objected to this view, however, that the records simply show what the action of the board was, and do not show the grounds or reasons upon which such action proceeded, or as counsel put it, that there was any decision of the board upon the question of the application of the system of works to the excluded lands. But the order fixing and establishing certain boundaries, excluding certain of the lands included by the petition, is certainly a decision as to where the boundaries shall be; and there is nothing in the act which requires the board to state why it fixes the boundaries in any particular place, and we think it may be safely laid down as a general proposition that the reasons or grounds of the action of any tribunal or body, whether legislative or judicial, need not be stated unless the law expressly so requires. It is to be observed that there is a clear distinction between cases of the statement of the reasons or grounds of the action which a tribunal is authorized to take and cases where the power to act depends upon the existence of antecedent conditions. We think that this case belongs to the former class.

6. It is objected that the proclamation for the election on the question of the organization of the district was not published as required by the act. The objection is based partly on small inaccuracies in the description, which have been already considered, partly on unimportant mistakes in the spelling of names, and partly on the alleged ground that the proclamation was not published for "three weeks prior to the election." These words, we think, simply indicate the time during which the notice is to be published, and not the manner of the publication, (In re Cunningham, 73 Cal. 558, 559, 15 Pac. Rep. 136;) and, nothing being said about the number of publications, we think this matter was left to the discretion of the board. The board ordered that the publication be made in a weekly newspaper "as often (or for four insertions) as the same may be published between this date and the said day of election." This order was made on October 28th. The election was on November 22d, and the proclamation was published on October 29th and on the 5th, 12th, and 19th of November. This, we think, was sufficient.

7. It is said that the voting precincts were established less than 30 days before the election. The irrigation act does not say in terms when the voting precincts shall be established. It says, however, that "such election shall be conducted in accordance with the general election laws of the state," and by the general election laws the voting precincts must not be established less than 30 days before the election. We are inclined to doubt whether the "conducting" of an election necessarily includes something which cannot take place within 30 days before the election day; but, assuming that it does, the evident meaning is that the election shall be conducted in accordance with the general laws, except as otherwise provided in the act itself. The act provides that, "for the purposes of the election above provided for, the said board of supervisors must establish a convenient number of election precincts in said proposed district, and define the boundaries thereof, which said precincts may thereafter be changed by the board of directors of such district." Section 3. This provision does not say when the precincts are to be established; but we think it cannot be the meaning that the board is to establish them 30 days before the election; for the notice of election is to be, or at least may be, given at the time the order establishing the boundaries of the district is made, (Id.;) and only three weeks' publication of the same is required. Hence the election may take place within less than 30 days from the time when it is first known where the boundaries of the district are to be. Consequently the argument made would require the voting precincts to be established before it was known where the district was to be, or what it was to include. No such absurd construction will be adopted. The time for the establishment of the precincts seems to be left to the discretion of the board. They were established by the election proclamation, which was published for at least three weeks; and this, we think, was sufficient.

8. It is finally objected that the bonds were not in proper form. The provision of the act is as follows: "Said bonds shall be payable in gold coin of the United States, in installments, as follows, to-wit: At the expiration of eleven years, not less than 5 per cent. of said bonds; at the expiration of twelve years, not less than 6 per cent.; at the expiration of thirteen years, not less than 7 per cent.; at the expiration of fourteen years, not less than 8 per cent.; at the expiration of fifteen years, not less than 9 per cent.; at the expiration of sixteen years, not less than 10 per cent.; at the expiration of seventeen years, not less than 11 per cent.; at the expiration of eighteen years, not less than 13 per cent.; at the expiration of nineteen years, not less than 15 per cent.; and for the twentieth year a percentage sufficient to pay off said bonds." Section 15. The bonds here involved were drawn so as to make each one payable in installments; and the objection is that a proper construction of the act requires that a certain number of bonds should be payable in 11 years, a further number in 12 years, and so on. We think, however, that the bonds were in proper form. The phrase, "a bond payable in installments," is clear, and can mean only one thing. Is the meaning changed by putting it in the plural, and making it "bonds payable in installments?" But there are other provisions of the act which make the intention clear. The sixteenth section provides that "the board may sell said bonds from time to time in such quantities as may be necessary and most advantageous," etc. It may happen, therefore, that only a portion of the bonds are sold. Now, for illustration, we will suppose that the bonds are issued on appellant's theory, and that only those payable at the end of 11 years are sold. In such case the only bonds outstanding would be the 11-year bonds; for a bond which has not been sold, or, in other words, not issued, cannot be said to be "outstanding." The whole amount of the principal of such bonds would be due and payable at the end of 11 years. How would it be paid? The twenty-second section provides, in substance, that at the expiration of the tenth year the board of directors shall make an assessment "in the following percentage of the principal of the whole amount of bonds then outstanding, to-wit: For the eleventh year, five per cent.," etc. This is the only provision for raising money to pay the principal of said bonds. It would, therefore, result that upon the appellant's theory, that although the whole amount of the principal of the 11-year bonds would be due and payable, only 5 per cent. thereof could be paid, and similar results would follow as to the others, while, as the bonds are drawn, 5 per cent. upon the whole amount of the principal of the bonds "then outstanding" would be sufficient to pay off each installment of the principal as it became due. It may be that the legislature supposed that there was a good reason for making each bond run in part for the whole 20 years. As is well known, a bond for a long term is more salable (other things being equal) than a bond for a short term, and the object may have been to help the sale of the short bonds by incorporating them with the long ones. However this may be, we think that the intention to have the bonds drawn as the respondent has drawn them is sufficiently expressed. The other matters do not require special notice. We therefore advise that the judgment appealed from be affirmed.

I concur: FOOTE, C.

BELCHER, C. C., being disqualified, took no part in this decision.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is affirmed.

ROMAN CATHOLIC ARCHBISHOP OF SAN FRANCISCO (a Sole Corporation) v. SHIPMAN et al. (No. 12,100.)

ADVERSE POSSESSION.

Plaintiff, who was archbishop, and as such a sole corporation, took a conveyance of land to himself as an individual, which land was paid for with funds of the church. The record title remained in plaintiff as an individual for more than 20 years. A college, chapel, dormitory, etc., were erected on the land, and were used as a college and for church purposes. Plaintiff controlled and managed the property alone and expended the moneys. The corporation had no trustees, and its business was entirely in plaintiff's hands. There was no overt act changing the possession from plaintiff individually to the corporation. A decree was rendered for sale of the land for a street assessment, plaintiff not being made a party in his corporate capacity. Held, in action by plaintiff in such capacity to enjoin the enforcement of the decree, the position that more than 20 years before the assessment proceedings plaintiff, as individual, had delivered possession to the corporation, which had held the land adversely and under claim of ownership, was not supported by the evidence.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JOHN HUNT, Judge.

J. C. Bates, for appellants. Wilson & Wilson, M. C. Hassett, and S. M Wilson, for respondent.

WORKS, J. This is an action to enjoin the enforcement of a decree for the sale of certain real estate in the city of San Francisco for the satisfaction of a street assessment, upon the ground that the plaintiff was, at the time the action was brought and the decree rendered, the owner of the property, and, not having been made a party to the suit, the judgment as against it was void. There was a demurrer to the complaint, which was overruled, and upon a trial by the court a perpetual injunction was decreed. This is the second time the case has been to this court on appeal. At the former hearing it was reversed on the ground that the complaint was insufficient. Archbishop v. Shipman, 69 Cal. 586, 11 Pac. Rep. 343. The complaint has been amended in such a way as to avoid the objections then urged against it, and, as amended, is sufficient, and the demurrer to it was properly overruled.

The only question necessary for us to consider, arises upon the point made by the appellant that the findings of the court below are not sustained by the evidence. The respondent contends that there is but one question in the case, viz., whether the respondent was or was not the owner of the property in controversy at the time of and subsequent to the commencement of the proceeding to foreclose the street assessment lien. This is undoubtedly true, if this question of ownership be determined against the respondent. The undisputed facts as shown by the evidence are these: Joseph S. Alemany was the Roman Catholic archbishop of San Francisco, and was, as such archbishop, a sole corporation. The real estate mentioned in the complaint was, on the 25th day of July, 1858, conveyed to said Alemany, not as such archbishop, but in his individual name, by the then owner of the property; but the same was purchased by and paid for with moneys donated by members of the church. The property was, subsequent thereto, improved by said corporation by the erection of buildings, fences, and other improvements, but the title thereto, so far as it appears of record, has remained in the individual name of said Alemany from the time of the execution of said conveyance to him until now. The complainant alleges the ownership of the respondent in the property as follows: "And the plaintiff avers that the said land above particularly described was purchased by said Alemany for the use and benefit of the Roman Catholic church of the diocese of San Francisco, and was paid for with the money of said church; and that afterwards, and more than twenty years before the commencement of this action, said Alemany delivered the possession of said land and premises to this plaintiff, and then and there this plaintiff entered into and took the actual, peaceable, exclusive, open, and notorious possession and occupation of said tract of land above particularly described under a claim of title exclusive of any other right, and has ever since that time been in and maintained the actual, open, notorious, peaceable, exclusive, continuous, and adverse possession and occupation of said land and every part thereof, claiming to own and hold the same and every part thereof as its own, under a claim of title in fee-simple absolute, exclusive of any other right, and adversely to all the world, during all of which time said land was by the plaintiff fully protected by a substantial inclosure; and said plaintiff paid during all the time of such occupation as aforesaid, and continuously, all the taxes, state, city, and municipal, which were levied and assessed upon said land or any part thereof." The court below found this allegation of the complaint in favor of the respondent. There is no evidence tending to show that at the time of the proceedings to foreclose the street assessment the plaintiff therein had any notice that the respondent had or claimed any title or interest in the property except as such notice might be inferred from the improvements made upon the property and the uses made of it. The learned counsel for the respondent has, by one or two admissions in his brief, very materially narrowed the controversy upon this point. He says: "Of course, if a title stood of record in a trustee, the cestui que trust could not attack a judgment duly rendered against the trustee without notice, to the plaintiff, of the interest of the beneficiary." Again: "In his brief the counsel goes to the extent of citing authorities to show that the deeds which were executed by the Bernals to J. S. Alemany vested legal title in him as an individual or person. With the last proposition we entirely agree, and think there can be no doubt that the deeds originally vested the title in the individual and natural person, J. S. Alemany, though the parol evidence showed him to be a trustee only." We fully coincide with these views. Therefore we take it as fully conceded (1) that as a matter of record J. S. Alemany was the owner of the legal title to this property; (2) that it appears from the parol testimony in the case that he held the legal title as a trustee for the respondent; (3) that these facts alone would not entitle the plaintiff to enjoin the sale, but it must show that it had, subsequent to the deed, become the owner of the legal title to the property, and that the appellants had notice of the fact at the time of the proceeding to enforce the street assessment.

The respondent claims that it has shown the legal title in it by adverse possession. The court below so found. The question is, therefore, whether or not this particular finding is supported by the evidence. The evidence shows conclusively that the respondent was a sole corporation; that the corporation was Joseph S. Alemany, Roman Catholic archbishop of San Francisco; that as such archbishop he purchased the property for and with the money of the church, but took the deed in his individual name; that as such archbishop he had and actually exercised exclusive control over said property, as fully as if he were the sole and individual owner thereof; that all improvements made thereon, and use made of the same, were made at the instance of, and used under the exclusive direction and control of, said Alemany as such archbishop, as fully and completely as if he were the sole and individual owner of the property. There is no evidence showing or tending to show that any overt act was done, as constituting a change of possession from Joseph S. Alemany, individual, to Joseph S. Alemany, archbishop. It is true, improvements are shown to have been made, and made with the money of the church, but the improvements were made, and the money expended, by Joseph S. Alemany. The testimony of the archbishop shows this very clearly. After testifying fully to the improvements made upon the property, the use made of them, and that they were made with the money of the church, his examination proceeds: "Question. Has this corporation any secretary? Answer. Yes, sir; that is, not as such,—not one specifically, especially for that. Q. It does not have a seal? A. Yes, sir. Q. Have you any trustees? A. The sole corporation has no trustees. Q. You have been the sole manager of that corporation, I suppose, from beginning to end, haven't you? A. I may say yes; but, of course, I have to take advice. I have to consult. I have to guide myself a great deal with counsel." Again, the following from the testimony of one P. J. Gray, a witness for the respondent, is equally convincing on this point: "A. Well, I was president of the college for five years. I went there in 1863, and I stopped there till 1868. Q. What would you say with reference to the management and control of that property by the corporation? A. It was all under the archbishop. It was all managed by the archbishop. I was only representing him." Does this evidence show adverse possession in the respondent, such as is required to confer title, and such as could constitute notice of a transfer of title from the individual Alemany to Alemany the archbishop. We cannot think so. To constitute the possession adverse it must have been open, visible, notorious, and exclusive, and must have been retained under a claim of right to hold against the owner, and in hostility to his title. Thompson v. Felton, 54 Cal. 547. Unger v. Mooney, 63 Cal. 586. Here the owner of the legal title, as it appeared of record, was in the actual possession of the property, and, as the sole corporation, he was the beneficiary under the deed conveying him the legal title, and, as the respondent contends, he was also in possession as the adverse claimant, and holding in hostility to himself. So far as the title was concerned, he might have held it either as an individual or as the representative of the church; but the possession must have been by Joseph S. Alemany in person, in either capacity, and his possession in one capacity could in no way be distinguished from his holding in the other. "Where property vests in a bishop, parson, or other sole corporation, he holds it to his own use and benefit, whilst he holds the office, and afterwards the estate and the enjoyment of it go together to his successor, when established. The transmission of the estate is perpetual, but the beneficial enjoyment changes at each succession." Overseers v. Sears, 22 Pick. 124; Weston v. Hunt, 2 Mass. 500. So he was equally entitled to the possession and control of the property, whether his holding was that of an absolute owner in his individual right, or of a trustee under an absolute deed; and his right to the possession was precisely the same as if the deed had been made to him as the archbishop in his corporate capacity. Fitzpatrick v. Fitzgerald, 13 Gray, 402; Perry, Trusts, §§ 321-328. Such being the case, we cannot conceive of any theory upon which a title by adverse possession can be upheld under the circumstances of this case. One cannot hold in hostility to himself; nor can one holding in one capacity hold adversely to himself, claiming in another capacity. In the case of Heiss v. Vosburg, 59 Wis. 532, 18 N. W. Rep. 463, it was held that a priest, being in charge of a church as the agent of the bishop, the possession of the building was, as a matter of law, in the bishop, although the congregation worshiped in the building, and paid the salary of the priest and the expense of keeping the property in repair, and maintaining services, and although the committee of trustees aided the priest in the management of the temporalities of the church. It must be presumed that Alemany held possession under the legal title vested in him by the deed; and, as the undisputed evidence is that he continued in possession, there was no actual change of possession or control of the property that could amount to constructive notice of any claim adverse to such title. Smith v. Yule, 31 Cal. 180; McCarthy v. Nicrosi, 72 Ala. 332; 3 Wait, Act. & Def. 450; Cook v. Travis, 20 N. Y. 400; Burrows v. Holt, 20 Conn. 459, 463.

The manner in which property is held and controlled by a sole corporation is well stated in Overseers v. Sears, 22 Pick. 128, in which it is said: "In all these respects the distinction between an aggregate and sole corporation, growing out of their different modes of constitution and forms of action, is striking and obvious. A bishop or parson acting in a corporate capacity, and holding property to him and his successor in right of his office, has no need of a corporate name. He requires no peculiar seal. He performs all legal acts under his own seal, in his own name and name of office. His own will alone regulates his acts, and he has no occasion for a secretary, for he need not keep a record of his acts; no need of a treasurer, for he has no personal property, except the rents and proceeds of the corporate estate, and these he takes to his own use when received. By-laws are unnecessary, for he regulates his own action by his own will and judgment, like any other individual acting in his own right."

It is claimed by the respondent that the use made of the property was sufficient to constitute adverse possession. The evidence shows that there was erected on the property a large brick building used as a college for the education of young men, chapel, dormitory, stables, and other out-buildings, and that these buildings were used as a college and for church purposes. The construction of such buildings, and the uses made of them, were not necessarily inconsistent with private ownership, nor were they inconsistent with the trust under which Alemany is claimed to have held originally; but, if they were, the occupation and use of the buildings and property are thus shown to have been by individuals, presumably members of the Catholic church, and not by the plaintiff. Such individual members of the church could not, by any use they could make of the property, acquire any interest in it that could avail the respondent in this action. As we look at this evidence, it was wholly insufficient to sustain the finding that the respondent was the owner of the property, and for that reason the case must be reversed.

There are other questions raised and elaborately argued, but, the question of ownership being the decisive one, we need not extend this opinion by taking up the other points discussed. Judgment and order denying a new trial reversed, and cause remanded.

MITCHELL et al. v. HAWLEY et al. (No. 11,987.)

INJUNCTION BOND—ACTION—ATTORNEYS' FEES.

1. In an action on an injunction bond it appeared that the attorneys for defendant in the injunction suit were paid $500 for all their services in the case; that they attempted to get the temporary injunction dissolved, but failed; that afterwards the injunction was ended by dismissal of the action because of a recent decision of the supreme court of the United States determining the issues against the plaintiff. It was not proved that there was any separate or distinct amount paid to the attorneys for the attempt to procure the dissolution. Held, that it was error in the suit on the bond to award $400 for attorneys' fees.

2. The fact that counsel fees are not allowed in the United States courts in actions on injunction bonds does not preclude recovery of such damages in an action in a state court on an injunction bond given in a United States court.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. F. SULLIVAN, Judge.

M. A. Wheaton and G. E. Harpham, for appellants. Charles A. Shurtleff, for respondents.

MCFARLAND, J. This is an action to recover damages on a bond for a temporary injunction in an action in the United States circuit court. The judgment was for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal from the judgment, and from an order denying a new trial. The court found that plaintiffs were damaged by the injunction, generally, in the sum of $770, and that they were also entitled to the further sum of $400 for attorneys' fees in procuring its dissolution.

1. We have carefully examined the elaborate argument of the learned counsel for appellants to the point that the evidence does not justify the court in finding the first item of damage of $770, but, after a close examination of the transcript and the views of counsel, we find no reason for disturbing that finding. It would serve no useful purpose to discuss that matter in detail.

2. We cannot agree with counsel in the view that in an action brought in a court in this state, on an injunction bond given in a court in the United States, counsel fees can, in no instance, be recovered as damages, because such damages are not allowed by the federal courts. Bondsmen, in such a case, cannot be held to have contracted with the understanding that a suit would be brought upon the bond, if at all, in a federal court, and that their liabilities would be fixed according to the view which that court might be supposed to take of the law. If, for instance, the defendants here and the defendants in the injunction suit were all residents of California, which was probably the fact, an action on the bond could probably not be maintained in a federal court at all.

3. But we think the court below erred in allowing as damages the item of $400 for attorneys' fees. The allowance of counsel fees in suits on injunction bonds, and in one or two other actions of a kindred character, is exceptional, and it should not be carried beyond the point to which former decisions have taken it. In the injunction suit in which the bond now before us was given, the attorneys for the defendants were given $500 in gross for all their services in the case. They made an effort to get the temporary injunction dissolved, but failed. Afterwards the injunction was ended by the dismissal of the action; and the action was dismissed because a recent decision of the supreme court of the United States, (Heald v. Rice, 104 U. S. 737,) made after the attempt to dissolve the injunction had failed, determined all the issues in the injunction suit against the plaintiffs therein. Whether or not attorneys' fees can be recovered at all for services rendered in an unsuccessful attempt to dissolve an injunction it is not necessary here to decide. In New York it was held that "having thus been unsuccessful in resisting the allowance of the injunction, there is no ground upon which the sureties can be required to pay these expenses," (Randall v. Carpenter, 88 N. Y. 293.) And in Allen v. Brown (5 Lans. 511) the court says as follows: "The defendants' motion, before the trial of the action on the merits, for an order vacating the injunction, was denied. The referee correctly refused to allow the defendants any costs or counsel fees on that motion, for the reason that the expenses of an unsuccessful motion to set aside an injunction cannot be recovered, though the court afterwards decides that the plaintiff was not entitled to the injunction." Without now holding that such should be the rule here, it is sufficient to say that in the case at bar there was no separate, distinct amount of money paid the attorneys for services in unsuccessfully attempting to procure a dissolution of the injunction, no special charge made for them, and no sufficient showing in the evidence of a segregation and apportionment of a part of the gross sum to those services. Bustamente v. Stewart, 55 Cal. 115. The cause is remanded, with directions to the superior court to modify the judgment by striking out the $400 awarded for attorneys' fees; and, in all other respects, the judgment and order are affirmed.

In bank. Commissioners' decision. Appeal from superior court, Yolo county; C. H. GAROUTTE, Judge.

Action by the county of Yolo against Margaret Barney, to recover certain land. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Thomas & Hurst, for appellant. F. S. Sprague, (F. E. Baker, of counsel,) for respondent.

FOOTE, C. This action was brought by the plaintiff to quiet its title to a piece of land claimed adversely by the defendant. An answer and cross-complaint was filed by the latter, in which, after denying the right and title of the plaintiff, she claims title by continuous adverse possession for more than five years before the commencement of the action, and asks that the plaintiff be made to show its interest in the land, and that her title thereto be quieted. The court found, among other things, that all the allegations of the complaint were true; that the defendant was not the owner of the land, although she had been in possession of it for more than five years; that her possession was not such as entitled her to obtain title through the statute of limitations; that the land had been, long before her entry, dedicated to a public use by the county of Yolo, and that the right to such public use had never been relinquished or abandoned. And as conclusions of law, "that neither the defendant nor her grantors ever acquired any right, title, or interest in or to the land in controversy so dedicated to public use by their possession of the same; nor does the fact of such possession constitute a sufficient defense to this action." Judgment was given quieting the plaintiff's title to the land as against the defendant and for costs. From that and an order refusing a new trial the appeal is taken.

It is contended that the findings are not supported by the evidence, chiefly for the reason, as alleged, that the land was never dedicated to a public use, but was bought by the county as a private individual would buy property, and was subject to be resold by the county, abandoned as to whatever use it might have been temporarily put, and subject, like ordinary municipal or private property, to be acquired by peaceable and continuous adverse possession under the statute of limitations of five years. The facts in evidence show that the land was purchased by the county, acting through its quasi trustees, the board of supervisors, for the purpose of erecting thereon a county hospital, and using the land for purposes connected therewith. The hospital had been established thereon for about eight years when the defendant's grantor took possession of and fenced the portion of the land in controversy, which up to that time had been uninclosed, and the defendant's possession by herself or grantors has been since that time, for about fifteen years, peaceable and continuous. A deed to the land was made to the plaintiff in 1863 by one Freeman, and duly recorded, and a quitclaim deed was also made from the same grantor to the defendant's grantor, one Sill, in 1867.

The whole controversy seems determinable by ascertaining whether or not the land was dedicated to a public use when the hospital was erected thereon. If it was dedicated to a public use, then under the decision of the appellate court in Hoadley v. San Francisco, 50 Cal. 276, it could not be subjected to the operations of the statute of limitations. If it was not so dedicated it would be subject, as lands ordinarily held by a municipality are, to the running of the statute. San Francisco v. Calderwood, 31 Cal. 588; Hoadley v. San Francisco, supra. Was it devoted or dedicated to a public use? It was purchased for the purpose of building a county hospital on a portion of it, and using the balance of it for the necessities of the hospital. For eight years all the land was necessary for, and was used for, the purpose of maintaining the hospital, before the defendant's entry and possession. The hospital was not removed from the land until within about a year of the institution of this action. The defendant contends that the dedication to a public use was never made, because, as she alleges, the county had the right of revoking the use of the land for county purposes, and that no dedication to a public use can be effectual unless it be irrevocable. The case of San Francisco v. Canavan, 42 Cal. 553, is cited as conclusive upon the point. That case was not one in which the facts were as in this case, and we do not think that by the term "irrevocable," as there used, it was intended to say, where a municipal corporation has devoted land to a public use, that because it is within the power of that body to dispose of the land in some other way, if it shall choose, the power of disposition being limited by statute, such dedication to a public use can never be made. The term "irrevocable," as it originally came to be used, was ordinarily applied to a private individual who had dedicated land to a public use in such a way that he had reserved no right to reclaim it. But in the case of a county which buys land for a public use, and devotes it to that purpose, we cannot see any reason to declare that the dedication is incomplete because the county may have the power given by statute afterwards to discontinue the use, and apply the land to another public use, or sell it in a statutory and limited way. Pol. Code, § 4046, subd. 10. If this was the rule, then it might be applied to county roads, for the county may abandon the use of them, and the dedication may be said in that sense to be revocable. Id. § 2681. Yet such roads are dedicated to the public use, as well as streets in a city, and the statute of limitations will not run against it. People v. Pope, 53 Cal. 450; Visalia v. Jacob, 65 Cal. 456, 4 Pac. Rep. 433.

The question, then, recurs: Did the board of supervisors, acting for the county, apply this land to a public use? Hospital buildings are public buildings. Pol. Code, § 4046, subd. 9. If a public building be erected upon land belonging to the county by the proper authorities, and it be devoted to the uses necessary to the character of the building and the purpose for which it is erected, it would seem as if the land was dedicated or put to a public use. Court-houses, jails, and hospitals are put upon the same footing by the statute, supra, are called "public buildings," and they are such to all intents and purposes. It will not do to say that the land on which they stand, or which is appurtenant and necessary thereto, is not dedicated to a public use. To hold otherwise would be to leave county jails, hospitals, court-houses and other public buildings, and the ground on which they stand, at the mercy of careless or corrupt county officials and rapacious trespassers, in collusion, perhaps, with such officers. This is contrary to public policy. Judge Dillon, in his work on Municipal Corporations, (volume 2, § 533, p. 674,) says: "The author cannot assent to the doctrine that, as respects public rights, municipal corporations are within ordinary limitation statutes. It is unsafe to recognize such a principle." The appellate courts of Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Rhode Island, and Louisiana hold to this view, and it seems to have been approved by the supreme court of California in Hoadley v. San Francisco, supra. As we understand the decisions of California, they place the non-running of the statute of limitations upon the ground that the public is in the use of the land, and that while in such use a trespasser may neither erect a nuisance thereon, nor acquire a right to hold the land based upon a supposed grant to the land from the owner. Hoadley v. San Franciso, supra; People v. Pope, supra. In reference to dedications to public use, it was said by the supreme court of the United States, in City of Cincinnati v. White's Lessee, 6 Pet. 440: "There is no particular form or ceremony necessary in the dedication of land to public use. All that is required is the assent of the owner of the land, and the fact of its being used for the public purposes intended by the appropriation. This was the doctrine in the case of Jarvis and Dean, already referred to, with respect to a street, and the same rule must apply to all public dedications." "The law applies to them rules adapted to the nature and circumstances of the case." Id. 434. "All public dedications must be considered with reference to the use for which they are made." Id. 437. After diligent search no case has been found in the books presenting the same state of facts as this record shows. We see no reason why the use of county land for court-houses, jails, county hospitals, and other public buildings may not be placed upon the same footing as being public places. Public policy requires that such protection should be given to public rights. We therefore advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; HAYNE, C.

In re CARPENTER'S ESTATE. (No. 12,911.)

INSANITY—EXPERT AND OPINION EVIDENCE.

1. Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1870, subd. 10, allows the opinion of an intimate acquaintance of an alleged insane person to be given on the question of his sanity. To establish testator's sanity proponents offered the opinion of W., who testified that he had known testator 12 years, and intimately for 10 years. He conversed with testator frequently during the last 4 years of his life, and met him frequently in the city of witness' residence, and talked with him on business. He met testator on the latter's ranches at 3 different times, at his (witness') office 12 or 15 times, saw him on business at another city, and twice during his last illness, but never saw him at his home. Held, that the witness was competent to testify as to his opinion, and, the evidence being closely balanced, it was prejudicial error to reject his testimony.

2. A witness may not give his conclusions as to whether there was a change in the mental condition of testator, but he may state facts with reference to such change.

3. It is improper, and prejudicial to proponent, to refer to the conduct of a testator in bequeathing his property to the children of his business partner, and excluding his brothers and their children, whom he had not seen for 35 years, and who were living at a great distance from him.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county; A. VAN R. PATERSON, Judge.

Carter & Smith and S. D. Woods, for appellants. Amos H. Carpenter, for respondents.

MCFARLAND, J. This is a contest over the will of Charles W. Carpenter, deceased. Special issues were submitted to a jury, who found that the will was not procured to be made through fraud exercised by any one, and was not procured to be made in the form in which it was made through undue influence exercised by any one, and was executed and attested according to law; but the jury also found that the deceased, at the time of the execution of the will, was "of unsound mind," was "incompetent to make a will," and did not have "sufficient mental capacity to comprehend fully," etc. Thereupon the court entered an order revoking the will (which had previously been admitted to probate.) The proponents, executor of the will, and devisees and legatees, appeal from said order, and also from an order denying a new trial.

The issue upon which the contest was determined was the testamentary capacity of the deceased. Some witnesses were examined on both sides as to their opinions of the mental sanity of the deceased, on the ground that they were intimate acquaintances, within the meaning of subdivision 10, § 1870, of the Code of Civil Procedure; and it could not be correctly said that, outside of those opinions, there was sufficient evidence to justify the finding of the jury. The principal witness on that point for the contestants was George M. Hurlburt, and he was, indeed, about the only witness on that side who expressed a positive opinion that the deceased was insane, or of unsound mind. Appellants contend very strenuously that there was no sufficient showing of Hurlburt's intimacy with the deceased, under the section of the Code above mentioned, to warrant the court in allowing him to give his opinion. While the showing of intimacy was not very strong, still there was considerable evidence to that point, and we cannot hold that the court erred in admitting the testimony; but we are satisfied that the court did err in refusing to allow the witness of the appellants, H. W Weaver, to give his opinion of the mental sanity of the deceased. The evidence of his intimacy with the deceased was much stronger than that of the intimacy of Hurlburt; and the two rulings were inconsistent. The preliminary testimony of Weaver was as follows: "I live in Stockton. Have lived here sixteen years. I know C. K. Bailey, and I knew Carpenter in his life-time. I became acquainted with Carpenter in 1875. I became intimately acquainted with him about 1877. From 1880 to the time of his death I conversed with him quite frequently. I met him in the city of Stockton and on Bailey & Carpenter's ranches. I know three ranches,—the home ranch, the ranch on the plains, and the ranch in the mountains. I never saw him on the plains ranch. I met him on the home ranch twice,—once in 1879 and once in 1881. In 1879 I saw him a few minutes. I stopped a few minutes. I was on business. In 1881 it was about the same. I stopped there as I was passing by. Stopped there and saw him. I saw him but a few moments at the mountain ranch. It was in 1882 or 1883. I was there two or three days. I had two or three conversations with him at that time. He was shearing sheep, and we had some conversation about shearing,—about the condition of his sheep. Then one evening he came up to our camp, and we had a general conversation with him. Conversed on general subjects. I met him in my office in Stockton quite frequently, and conversed with him generally on business matters. I saw him twice during his last sickness. The first time I talked with him five or ten minutes; the second time I asked him how he was. That was about all the conversation I had with him. I met him in Sacramento. He was a witness there in a case in which I was an attorney. The case never came to trial. I examined him in regard to what the nature of his testimony would be. Examined him on what his knowledge of the case would be. I met him a dozen or fifteen times in my office; once at the ranch in the mountains; twice on the ranch. I also met him frequently, a half a dozen times, on the streets of Stockton, and talked to him. I met him once at the house of Mr. Schmidt, and conversed with him. I always stopped and talked with him when I met him on the street. I talked to him ten or fifteen minutes when he was shearing sheep. I never was at his place where he lived, except in the mountains. I never was at his abode, you may say, except in the mountains at one time." The witness, having then said that he had an opinion as to the mental condition of the deceased, was asked to state that opinion, and the reasons for it. Respondents objected because sufficient intimacy had not been shown. The court sustained the objection, and appellants excepted.

In People v. Pico, 62 Cal. 53, People v. Levy, 71 Cal. 623, 12 Pac. Rep. 791, and People v. Fine, 19 Pac. Rep. 269, it was said that the determination of the question whether a witness was an acquaintance within the meaning of the Code was addressed to the discretion of the court below, and that, "there being no abuse" of the discretion, the appellate court would not interfere. But in all those cases the evidence had been admitted; and the language used was not in a case where, after a sufficient showing of the statutory qualification, the testimony of the witness had been rejected. The distinction between those cases and the one at bar is obvious. A jury, in determining the doubtful and delicate question of a man's sanity, not having had the opportunity of personal observation, should have the benefit of everything offered within the range of legal evidence. It was said in the case of Estate of Toomes, 54 Cal. 509, that, "whatever may be the rule as to the admission of improper testimony, the exclusion of proper testimony is always ground for reversal." Perhaps that is too strong a statement of the rule; but it is certainly true that the exclusion of proper testimony, which is evidently material and important, and might probably have changed the result, is a ground for reversal; and we are satisfied that the offered testimony of Weaver was proper, and also that in the state of the evidence it was in a high degree material and important. For this error, therefore, the judgment must be reversed, and a new trial granted. We will not undertake to discuss all the other points made in the case, but will notice one or two.

1 We think that the instruction No. 27, given at the request of the respondents, had better be omitted or greatly modified. If a man, by his will, should disinherit his wife or children, or perhaps other near relations with whom he was intimate, and for whom he had shown great affection, the will would perhaps, by common consent, and may be in law, be called "unnatural." But in the case at bar the testator was a bachelor, and had neither father nor mother living. He had left his early home in Vermont in 1849, when only 20 years old, and had spent nearly all his life in California. During that time he had but little, if any, intercourse with his collateral kin in the Eastern states; and, under these circumstances, it was for the jury to say if the willing of his property to the children of his business partner here, instead of his brothers and their children in the Eastern states, was unnatural. The use of the word "unnatural" in the instruction was, we think, improper and prejudicial.

2. We think, also, that the court erred in refusing to allow the witness Montgomery to testify whether or not there had been any change in the mental condition or capacity of the deceased, provided the witness was asked for facts about the change, and not for a conclusion. A marked change in a man's habits of thought is strong evidence of his mental unsoundness, and the absence of such change is evidence of the contrary.

3. The affidavits presented by appellants make a strong case for a new trial, upon the ground of newly-discovered evidence; but if that were the only ground for a new trial we would not feel warranted in holding that the court erred in denying it.

4. The instructions asked by the parties, and given or refused, number over 80, and, with the instructions given by the court of its own motion, cover about 50 pages of the transcript. We have not observed any material errors, except as above noticed, but, as the case is reversed on other points, we have not undertaken to critically examine the whole mass of instructions given and refused, and this opinion must not be taken as a determination of the correctness of the rulings of the court in the matter of instructions. It is to be hoped that if there shall be another trial of the case counsel may be able, in asking instructions, to put their views of the law with reasonable brevity, and in a digestible form. Orders appealed from reversed, and new trial granted.

AFFLERBACK v. McGOVERN. (No. 11,930.)

REPLEVIN—COMPLAINT—SALE TO ADMINISTRATOR.

1. A complaint in a suit to recover personal property, alleging a cause of action existing more than four years before the suit, and not at that time, is bad.

2. Where an administrator pays and satisfies a judgment in favor of the estate against a third party, and takes a bill of sale of personal property to himself, as administrator, from the third party in consideration of such payment, the sale is to him personally, and the reference to him as administrator is descriptive of the person.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; M. A. EDMONDS, Judge.

J. W. Harding, for appellant. J. C. Bates, for appellee.

WORKS, J. The respondent brought this suit against the appellant to recover certain personal property, consisting of live-stock and a wagon. The complaint avers that the plaintiff was the owner, and entitled to the possession, of the property on the 12th day of August, 1880, and the complaint was not filed until the 15th day of December, 1884. There was no demurrer to the complaint, but the point is made in this court that it does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. A complaint to be good must show a cause of action in favor of the plaintiff, and against the defendant, existing at the time the action is commenced. This complaint does not show this, but, if it states a cause of action at all, shows that it existed more than four years before the commencement of the suit, and for that reason the complaint is clearly bad. There is nothing in the complaint to show that at the time the action was commenced the plaintiff had any ownership or right to possession of the property, or that the defendant had possession of it wrongfully.

It is further claimed that the verdict of the jury in favor of the plaintiff is not sustained by the evidence. The facts, as disclosed by the evidence, and upon which the plaintiff relies, are in substance as follows: The plaintiff was the administrator of the estate of Cord Pope, deceased, on the 11th day of August, 1880, and at that time the defendant was indebted to the estate upon a judgment, and executed to the plaintiff, as administrator of said estate, a bill of sale for a large amount of personal property, including the property in controversy here. On the following day the plaintiff, in his individual capacity, executed to the defendant a lease of this same property for the term of one year. It is claimed by the plaintiff that the bill of sale was an absolute conveyance of the property in satisfaction of the judgment due the estate, and so it appears to be upon its face, while the defendant claims that the bill of sale was executed as a mere security for the payment of the debt, and that the lease back was made upon an express verbal agreement between the parties that the defendant should hold the property under the lease, and pay the rent, which was to be applied in satisfaction of the judgment, and, upon the judgment being so satisfied, the property was again to be his. Subsequently to the execution of these instruments it was found that the defendant owned but a one-half interest in the property, the other one-half being owned by one Jean Sere, as a partner of the defendant. In a litigation between Sere and the defendant, involving the title to the property, Sere was determined to be the owner of a one-half interest therein, and the property here in controversy was ordered to be sold. Execution had issued, and the property was about to be sold. While the property was in that situation, the defendant, acting with the attorney for the plaintiff, purchased from Sere his interest in the property in order to avoid the sale upon execution, and furnished to the plaintiff's attorney the sum of $225 to be paid therefor. The attorney of the plaintiff made the purchase of the property, and took a bill of sale from Sere to the plaintiff. There is no evidence showing that this bill of sale to the plaintiff was made with the consent of the defendant, and it is an admitted fact that the purchase money was paid by him. The defendant testifies positively that the bill of sale was made to the plaintiff without his knowledge or consent, and the only evidence to the contrary is that of the attorney for the plaintiff, who testified as follows: "Question. Were you authorized to do that by your client, McGovern? Answer. Was I authorized to do what? Q. To take the bill of sale of Sere's half interest in this property to Afflerback, instead of making it to McGovern. Did McGovern authorize you to do that? A. In effect, he did. The sheriff had succeeded in getting a part of this property, and the other part was concealed from the sheriff, and upon my demand McGovern delivered the other part to me as agent of Afflerback, and the next day or two brought me this $225, and paid me for Sere's interest." This testimony wholly fails to show any authority given by the appellant for the taking of this bill of sale to the plaintiff instead of himself.

These three written instruments—the bill of sale to the plaintiff as administrator of Cord Pope, the lease from him individually to the appellant, and the bill of sale from Sere to the respondent—are the only evidences of title in the respondents, and we think they wholly fail to show a right of recovery on his part. The first bill of sale, admitting it to be an absolute conveyance of the property, vested the title in the estate of Cord Pope, and not in the respondent. The second bill of sale, having been made to him without authority from the appellant, who paid the purchase money for the property, vested no title in him that he can assert as against the appellant. Admitting that an administrator may sue in his individual name to recover property belonging to the estate, it is conceded here that at the time this suit was brought the appellant had ceased to be the administrator of the estate of Cord Pope, and for that reason no cause of action existed in him.

We think, for the reasons stated, the verdict of the jury was not sustained by the evidence. Other questions are made upon the instructions, but the view we take of the merits renders it unnecessary to consider them.

The point is made by the respondent that we cannot consider questions made upon the statement, for the reason that the notice of intention to move for a new trial is not set out therein; but we have held in a late case that it is not necessary to bring the notice of intention to move for a new trial to this court. Pico v. Cohn, 20 Pac. Rep. 706, (opinion filed March 13, 1889.) The judgment and order denying a new trial are reversed, and the cause remanded.

We concur: BEATTY, C. J.; PATERSON, J.

ON PETITION FOR REHEARING.

In bank.

WORKS, J. The petition for rehearing is denied, but upon a more careful examination of the bill of sale from the defendant to the plaintiff, for the property in controversy, we are of the opinion that it should be construed as being a bill of sale to him, individually, and not as administrator. The reference to him should be regarded as descriptive of the person. Therefore, if it be made to appear on a second trial, as claimed in the petition for rehearing, that the plaintiff paid and satisfied the judgment held by the estate, and the bill of sale was given in consideration of such payment, it had the effect to vest the title to the property in him, if all other things necessary to pass title to personal property were performed.

We concur: BEATTY, C. J.; SHARPSTEIN, J.; PATERSON, J.; THORNTON, J.; MCFARLAND, J.

PEYRE v. PEYRE. (No. 11,834.)

DIVORCE—ALIMONY AND COSTS.

1. Civil Code Cal. § 136, providing that in an action for divorce, if relief be denied the plaintiff, the court may direct that the husband maintain the wife or children, does not authorize an allowance of permanent alimony in such a case upon the mere allegations by defendant of her husband's cruelty, without proof.

2. Under Civil Code Cal. § 137, authorizing alimony pendente lite to be granted to enable the wife to maintain or defend the action, temporary alimony and reasonable attorney's fees may be required, and no proof is necessary to assist the court in fixing the amount of the fees, or to show that the husband has property with which to pay the amount ordered to be paid.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court; T. H. REARDEN, Judge.

Action by Jean Peyre against Annie Peyre for divorce. Relief denied to plaintiff, who was ordered to pay permanent alimony and counsel fees. Plaintiff appeals.

Langhorne & Miller, for appellant. E. P. Cole and R. Johnson, for appellee.

BELCHER, C. C. Plaintiff and defendant were husband and wife. Plaintiff commenced an action for divorce on the ground of defendant's habitual intemperance. Defendant, by her answer, denied the charge made against her, and as a separate defense alleged that while she was sick plaintiff, with intent to make her worse, compelled her to drink some mixture concocted by him, and that after she had taken it she became so ill that she was unable to leave her bed, "and while she was ill the plaintiff caused her to be removed to a hospital for inebriates, and had her imprisoned therein without her consent for the period of one week; that there was no reason or cause for the act of plaintiff, but that he did so to compel defendant to leave him, and he has forced her to leave and abandon her home, and to seek the protection of friends." It is then alleged that defendant has no means to defend the suit or on which to live, and that plaintiff is worth the sum of $3,000. The prayer is for judgment in her favor, and that plaintiff be compelled to pay her alimony and counsel fees. The cause was tried, and findings filed stating, in effect, that defendant had not been guilty of habitual or any intemperance whatever. Thereupon judgment was entered, denying the plaintiff's prayer for a divorce, and requiring him to pay defendant "permanent alimony in the sum of $20 per month, payable in advance on the first day of each and every month hereafter, beginning on the 1st day of April, A. D. 1886, and the further sum of $20 attorney's fees." From this judgment plaintiff appealed, and has brought the case here on the judgment roll. He now asks that that part of the judgment which awards alimony and counsel fees be reversed, on the ground that it is wholly unsupported by any findings of fact.

1. The judgment, in so far as it gives alimony, was evidently based upon the supposed authority of section 136 of the Civil Code, which reads as follows: "Though judgment of divorce is denied, the court may, in an action for divorce, provide for the maintenance of the wife and her children, or any of them, by the husband." That section was before the court for consideration in Hagle v. Hagle, 68 Cal. 588, 9 Pac. Rep. 842, and 74 Cal. 608, 16 Pac. Rep. 518. In the former case the trial court found, among other things, that while there was no sufficient cause for a divorce the husband's conduct towards his wife was cold, harsh, and disagreeable, making it unpleasant for her to live with him; that the marriage was an unhappy one from the beginning; that there was no love between the parties, and no probability that they would ever live together again as husband and wife; and that, under the circumstances as shown, $25 per month was a reasonable sum to be provided by the husband for the maintenance of the wife. Judgment was accordingly entered, denying a divorce, and requiring the husband, until the further order of the court, to pay to his wife for her maintenance the sum of $25 per month. And this judgment was affirmed on appeal. In the last case it was held that the courts of this state have no authority to grant a divorce a mensa et thoro, or to compel a husband to support his wife while she is living separate and apart from him, against his will and consent, without any statutory ground for an absolute divorce, or any statutory ground for her absence from his home. And speaking of section 136, supra, the court said: "The objects of the provision evidently are to enable the court in a proper case to aid in a restoration of domestic harmony, to prevent the breaking up of the family,—especially where there are children of tender age and delicate health,— and to require penurious husbands to furnish decent support for their wives, and for the care and education of the children, where the parties have no cause for divorce on statutory grounds, or where the innocent party has condoned the offense." In view of these decisions we think the court erred in granting to defendant permanent alimony. The affirmative defense set up in the answer was deemed to be denied, and there is nothing in the record showing that any proof was offered in support of those allegations, or tending to show that the parties were not living together, or that defendant then needed, or would need, alimony for her support and maintenance. If such proofs were offered the court should have found the facts so that it could be seen that the relief granted was necessary and proper.

2. Section 137 of the Civil Code provides that "when an action for divorce is pending, the court may, in its discretion, require the husband to pay as alimony any money necessary to enable the wife to support herself or her children, or to prosecute or defend the action." Under this section the court was authorized to require the plaintiff, by an order entered for that purpose, to pay the defendant temporary alimony, and a reasonable attorney's fee. And no testimony was necessary to determine what the amount of the fee should be. "The court could determine from its own experience and from the facts and circumstances of the case, as they appeared to it from the pleadings and other papers and proceedings, what was a reasonable fee." Llamosas v. Llamosas, 62 N. Y. 618; Estate of Dorland, 63 Cal. 282. Nor was it necessary to appear that plaintiff had money or property with which to pay the amount ordered to be paid. "The allowance may be based upon his earnings or his ability to earn money." Eidenmuller v. Eidenmuller, 37 Cal. 364. We conclude, therefore, that the judgment, in so far as it awards permanent alimony, should be reversed, and that in all other respects it should stand affirmed.

We concur: FOOTE, C.; HAYNE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment, in so far as it awards permanent alimony, is reversed, and in all other respects it is affirmed.

TENDER.

In a suit to recover money paid for land, where plaintiff acquired no title to the land actually purchased, but received a deed to another lot, it was not necessary for him to tender a conveyance before suit.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county; JOHN W. ARMSTRONG, Judge.

Taylor & Holl, for appellant. Beatty, Denson & Oatman, for respondents.

WORKS, J. This is an action to recover money paid as a part of the purchase money for real estate for which the plaintiff claims he got no title. There was a nonsuit granted by the court below on the ground that the plaintiff had received a deed for the property, and, the title having vested in him, he must tender a reconveyance of the property before he could recover back the money paid by him. But the evidence shows, beyond any question, that the property deeded to the plaintiff was not the property purchased by him, but of lots in a different block, and that immediately upon discovering the fact he declined to go further with the trade, and did not take the deed, although it had actually been placed in his hands. This was not a delivery of a deed for the property the plaintiff had purchased, and vested no title in him. It was not necessary, therefore, that he should have tendered a conveyance of the property before bringing this action. Judgment reversed.

NEW TRIAL—DISCRETION.

Granting a new trial for the insufficiency of the evidence to support the findings of fact is discretionary, and such an order will not be reversed unless it clearly appears that the trial court abused its discretion.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; F W. LAWLER, Judge.

Action by the Pacific Rolling-Mill Company against the Telegraph Hill Railroad Company to foreclose a lien for materials supplied. Trial by the court, and judgment for defendant, which was set aside by the court, and a new trial granted. Defendant appeals.

Olney, Chickering & Thomas, for appellant. T. Z. Blakeman, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. C. This action was brought to foreclose a lien for materials furnished by plaintiff, and used in the construction of defendant's cable railroad. The complaint alleged that the materials were sold and delivered by plaintiff to defendant. The answer denied this, and alleged that the road was constructed by one Fazackerley, under a contract by which he, for an agreed price, was to, and did, perform all the labor and furnish all the materials necessary therefor at his own cost and expense. The findings and judgment were in favor of defendant, a new trial was asked for and granted, and the appeal is from that order. The motion for a new trial was based upon the alleged insufficiency of the evidence to justify the decision, and upon errors in law occurring at the trial; but it does not appear upon what ground it was granted.

We think the order must be affirmed. It is settled law in this state that motions for new trial on the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the decision are addressed to the sound legal discretion of the trial court, and that when such motions are granted the orders will not be reversed on appeal unless it clearly appears that there was an abuse of discretion. Phelps v. Mining Co., 39 Cal. 410; Pierce v. Schaden, 55 Cal. 406; Pico v. Cohn, 67 Cal. 258, 7 Pac. Rep. 680; Breckenridge v. Crocker, 68 Cal. 403, 9 Pac. Rep. 426. We see no manifest abuse of discretion here. Without stating particularly what was proved, we think it enough to say that there was evidence tending to sustain the plaintiff's contention. In view of this evidence the court may have thought that it erred in making its findings, and that the ends of justice would be promoted by a new trial. We advise that the order appealed from be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNE, C.; FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the order appealed from is affirmed.

DREYFUSS et al. v. GILES. (No. 12,430.)

FORECLOSURE OF MORTGAGES.

Under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1500, a suit may be brought by the holder of a mortgage to enforce the same against the property subject thereto, where all claim against other property has been waived in the complaint, even after settlement and final distribution of the estate.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Nevada county; J. M. WALLING, Judge.

J. I. Caldwell and Cross & Simonds, for appellants. Gaylord & Searls, for respondent.

WORKS, J. This is an action to foreclose a mortgage. The complaint alleges the death of the mortgagor, the settlement of the estate, the distribution of the mortgaged property to his daughter, an only heir, and the sale of the mortgaged property by her to the defendants in this action. It is also averred in the complaint that the mortgage was not due at the time the estate was closed, and final distribution made, and was not presented as a claim against the estate. The complaint expressly waives all claims against any other property of the estate except the lands described in the mortgage. In their answer the defendants plead the settlement and final distribution of the estate as a bar to the plaintiff's right to recover, and this is the only question made on this appeal. It was not necessary for the plaintiffs to present their mortgage as a claim against the estate, and their failure to do so, and the settlement and distribution of the estate, was no bar to their right to foreclose the mortgage. Code Civil Proc. § 1500; Bank v. Connell, 65 Cal. 574, 4 Pac. Rep. 580. It is evident the appeal in this case was taken for delay. Order and judgment appealed from affirmed, with 10 per cent. damages.

Mortgages—Construction—Payment—Estoppel.

1. S. and K. owned leasehold property; S. owned similar property in severalty; and K. owned personalty,—all which they mortgaged to plaintiff to secure a joint debt. Afterwards S. mortgaged his interest therein to plaintiff to secure a further loan. The first mortgage authorized plaintiff to enter on the premises, and apply the rents and profits in satisfaction of the debt in case of default in any of the payments. The second mortgage authorized the plaintiff to collect the rents during its continuance, and to apply them to the interest of the debt, or to the taxes, insurance, etc., and the residue, if he should desire to do so, to the reduction of the principal. Held, that the first mortgage only made it optional with plaintiff to collect the rents in case of default in payment of installments, and did not bind him to apply them to the payment of the first debt, and that he could apply them to the debt secured by the second mortgage.

2. If, with the knowledge and consent of K., the rents and profits of the land were applied to the second mortgage, he would be thereby estopped from objecting to such application.

3. The first mortgage contained a clause allowing plaintiff to purchase one-third interest in the leasehold property owned by S. and K., by paying one-third of the cost of erecting the building thereon. He elected to purchase it, and gave the mortgage a credit of a sum less than one-third of the amount stated in his complaint for foreclosure. The court did not find what the cost was, but allowed the credit as given by plaintiff, and rendered judgment accordingly. Held error.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; T. H. Rearden, Judge.

Action by Antoine Borel against Lena Kappeler and others to foreclose a mortgage. Judgment for plaintiff and defendants appeal.

M. B. Malville and E. D. Sawyer, for appellants. Sidney V. Smith, for appellee.

Works, J. The appellant Joseph Scheerer was the owner of a leasehold interest in a lot of land, and the owner of the buildings thereon, and he and Lawrence Kappeler, the decedent of the other appellants, were the owners of a leasehold interest in a certain other lot of land, and the said Kappeler was the owner of certain personal property. They joined in a mortgage on all of this property, real and personal, to the respondent, to secure him for money to be advanced by him, and used to construct a building on the lot held by said parties jointly. The respondent advanced, under the mortgage, as found by the court, the sum of $52,512.89. The appellant Scheerer, after the execution of the mortgage above mentioned, gave his own mortgage to the respondent on both of said lots of real estate for the sum of $15,000. The joint mortgage of Scheerer and Kappeler contained this clause: "Said Scheerer and Kappeler agree that out of the rents derived from the lease first above mentioned there shall be paid to said Borel, from and after the 1st of January, 1877, and from thence until all the moneys due under this agreement are paid, the sum of $300 per month in said gold coin on account of the indebtedness secured thereby; and that, in case of any default in such payment, said Borel shall have the right to enter upon the premises described in such lease, and to demand all rents due said Scheerer and Kappeler, or either of them, and to apply the same to the satisfaction of such indebtedness." The second mortgage, given by Scheerer alone, contains this covenant: "That during the continuance of said mortgage the plaintiff shall have the right to collect all rents of the buildings erected on said land, and to apply the same, after a deduction of a commission of two and a half per cent. for collection, to the payment of all interest due plaintiff, and of all sums paid by the plaintiff for rent of said land, under said lease, or taxes, or assessments, or insurance as aforesaid, and, then, at his option, in reduction of the principal amount of said note." The complaint contains the following allegation. "That, at the time of the execution of said mortgage of Scheerer to plaintiff, said Kappeler was fully aware of all its provisions and of the facts of its execution, and that said $15,000 was lent to said Scheerer by plaintiff, and said mortgage given by said Scheerer to plaintiff at said Kappeler's express request, and for said Kappeler's benefit, and that it was then fully understood and agreed between said Kappeler and plaintiff that the plaintiff should receive all rents of said buildings, and apply them as in said mortgage provided, and that from that time until his death said Kappeler was fully aware that plaintiff was receiving said rents, and was applying them as in said Scheerer's mortgage provided, and fully assented thereto." And the court finds as follows: "That at the time of the execution of said mortgage of Scheerer to plaintiff said Kappeler was fully aware of all its provisions, and of the fact of its execution, and that said $15,000 was lent to said Scheerer by plaintiff, and said mortgage given by said Scheerer to plaintiff at said Kappeler's express request, and for said Kappeler's benefit, and that from that time until his death said Kappeler was fully aware that plaintiff was receiving said rents, and was applying them as in said Scheerer's mortgage provided." It was also provided in said first mortgage that respondent should have the privilege of buying an undivided one-third interest in the lease owned by said parties, by paying one-third of the cost of the building thereon. The court finds that he elected to buy said one-third interest, and under an agreement between the parties gave the mortgagors credit on the first mortgage for the sum of $17,504.30. After the execution of the second mortgage by Scheerer the respondent applied the rents collected by him to the payment of said second mortgage alone. The court below rendered a decree foreclosing both mortgages, allowing the credits, for rents collected, on the separate mortgage of Scheerer. The defendants appeal.

The main contention of the appellants is that under the covenants in the two mortgages the rents collected should have been applied by the court to the joint mortgage of the parties, which would, with other payments, have fully satisfied the same. We cannot agree with counsel as to the construction to be placed upon the covenants in the two mortgages. The first did not bind the mortgagee to collect and apply the rents. He was authorized to do so upon failure of the mortgagor to make the payments called for. Independent of the second mortgage, he could have sued and collected the amount due on the first mortgage without attempting to collect or apply the rents. Therefore, when he collected and applied the rents to the second mortgage, he did not violate the terms of the first, or deprive the appellants of any of their rights thereunder. Besides, it was expressly alleged in the complaint, and found by the court, that the application of the rents was made with the knowledge and consent of Kappeler, which should estop the appellants from contesting the right of the mortgagee to so apply the same.

Again, it is contended that the amount for which the respondent gave credit on the first mortgage, on account of his purchase of a one-third interest in the property, was less than it should have been. This is placed upon the assumption that the amount to be credited was, by the terms of the mortgage, to have been one-third of the cost of the building, and that the cost of the building was $59,534. The complaint shows the cost of the building to have been $59,534, and the question whether the proper credit was given was directly put in issue by the answer. The court fails to make any finding on this issue, and for this failure the cause will have to be reversed. If the building cost the amount shown by the complaint, the credit given by the respondent, on account of his purchase of the one-third interest in the property, was too small, and the judgment, so far as it includes the difference between the one-third of the amount credited and the amount he should have given credit for and the interest thereon, is erroneous. It is claimed that certain items were improperly included in arriving at the amount due on the mortgages. But we cannot enter upon this inquiry in the absence of the evidence, as the record does not affirmatively show that such items were included, or that the amount found was not the actual amount due, independent of such items, except as above stated. Judgment reversed, and cause remanded.

EJECTMENT—EVIDENCE—DECLARATIONS OF COMMON GRANTOR.

In ejectment, involving the boundary of lands of coterminous owners, it is error to exclude the declarations of the common grantor, made while the owner of both tracts, as to the location of the line between them.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county; J. G. SWINNERTON, Judge.

Action by Peter G. Sharp against John M. Blankenship to recover land. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals.

J. B. Hall and W. L. Dudley, for appellant. F T. Baldwin and J. C. Campbell, for respondent.

MCFARLAND, J This is an action of ejectment to recover a strip of land lying along the boundary line between two coterminous owners. The verdict and judgment were for defendant. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment and from an order denying a new trial. Plaintiff owns a tract of land which is generally described as the south-east quarter of section 26, according to a plan of survey, called the "Weber Survey," of a grant called the "Campo de los Franceses," and defendant owns the south-west quarter according to the same survey, the two tracts adjoining each other in practically the same manner in which such subdivisions under United States government surveys adjoin. The main issue in the case was, where is the true boundary line between said two quarter sections? Both parties hold under Charles W. Weber, their common grantor, who procured said survey to be made, and to whom the grant was patented. At the trial the plaintiff offered, by witnesses, to prove that said Weber, before he conveyed to defendant, and when the owner of all the land, did, while he was on said land, point out certain posts and points as being on the line between said quarter sections, and made certain declarations concerning the boundaries thereof. To this testimony defendant objected as incompetent, irrelevant, and hearsay. The objection was sustained, and plaintiff excepted. This ruling was clearly erroneous. It is the established law that in a case of a disputed boundary line, which is in doubt, the declarations of a grantor at or before the time of the sale and conveyance are admissible against both him and the parties claiming under him, (Code Civil Proc. § 1849; Stanley v. Green, 12 Cal. 148; McFadden v. Wallace, 38 Cal. 51; McFadden v. Ellmaker, 52 Cal. 349;) and it would be useless to argue that the offered evidence was not material and important. For this reason the judgment must be reversed.

Most of the other points made by appellant go to the sufficiency of the evidence to justify the various findings of the jury, and that said findings are contradictory; but it is not necessary to discuss these points, as a new trial must be granted for the reason above stated. (It may be remarked that the special issues, and the instructions asked, were unnecessarily numerous and long, and that each party seems to have tried the case upon the theory that he would lose, and should therefore set every possible trap for a reversal.) We see no objection to the evidence of the survey of 1878 and the acts and declarations of plaintiff in regard to it. The instructions given at request of plaintiff were very full, and, those having been given, we see no error in the refusal to give instruction c, asked by plaintiff, or in giving instructions 2 and 7, asked by defendant. Instructions a and b, asked by plaintiff, were refused, of course, because they referred to certain acts and declarations of Weber, and the testimony on that subject had been ruled out. Perhaps on another trial some instruction on that subject may be proper. Judgment and order reversed, and a new trial granted.

APPEAL—PRACTICE—RECORD.

Where the evidence introduced on a murder trial is not made part of the record on appeal, an alleged error, committed by the court in reading to the jury a case decided by the supreme court, saying that the case reported "was in many respects similar to the one at bar," is not sufficient to cause a reversal of the conviction, as the defendant might, under the facts of the case, have been benefited, instead of prejudiced, by the remark.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Yuba county; PHILIP W. KEYSER, Judge.

W. G. Murphy and M. C. Barney, (Grove L. Johnson, of counsel,) for appellant. Geo. A. Johnson, Atty. Gen., for the People.

SHARPSTEIN, J. Appellant was tried on a charge of murder, and convicted of manslaughter. He appeals from the judgment, and his contention here is that the court erred in its charge to the jury. The alleged error consists in the reading by the court of the opinion of this court in People v. Munn, 65 Cal. 211, 3 Pac. Rep. 650, and stating to the jury that that case "was in many respects like the one at bar." Whether this statement was correct we have not the means of verifying, as the evidence is not before us. In the case of People v. Munn the appellant had been convicted of murder in the second degree, and this court held that the facts did not warrant his conviction of a higher offense than manslaughter; and it seems to us that the object of the court in reading the opinion in that case to the jury in this case was to impress on their minds that the defendant in this case should not be convicted of any higher offense than manslaughter, and not, as appellant's counsel contends, that he should be convicted of manslaughter. The reading of that case had better have been omitted. The practice of reading cases to juries is a dangerous one, and we advise against it. In this case the appellant may have been benefited, and not prejudiced, by it. In the absence of the evidence we cannot determine which, and therefore cannot reverse the judgment. Judgment affirmed.

CASE v. MANUFACTURERS' FIRE & MARINE INS. CO. (No. 11,652.)

INSURANCE—CONDITIONS OF POLICY—ARBITRATION—EVIDENCE—AMOUNT OF LOSS.

1. An insurance policy for $2,000 provided that the insurer should be liable in case of loss for such proportion as the policy bore to the whole insurance; that the loss should be paid in sixty days after proof of loss; and also provided for arbitration in case of dispute. Plaintiff had other insurance to an equal amount, and his proofs showed a loss of $2,000. Held, that after defendant's right to arbitrate, if he had one, had passed, plaintiff could not prove a loss of more than $2,000, or recover more than $1,000.

2. But a clause in the policy that, "in case of differences touching any loss or damage after proof thereof has been received in due form, the matter shall, at the written request of either party, be submitted to impartial appraisers, whose award in writing shall be binding on the parties," not providing for the number of appraisers or the mode of their selection, is too vague to give defendant a right to demand arbitration, and plaintiff's refusal of such demand does not deprive him of the right to sue on the policy, or to prove the full amount of his loss, even though it is more than stated by him in the proofs.

3. On plaintiff's calculation, his loss did not amount to more than $3,300. One of his witnesses placed the loss at $3,000. Plaintiff's clerk testified that he usually had a stock worth $5,000; and another witness testified that three weeks before the fire it was worth $5,000, but that during that time large amounts of goods had been sold, and little purchased. Witnesses for defendant put the value of the stock at much less than $4,000. Held, that a finding of $4,000 loss was not warranted.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. F. SULLIVAN, Judge.

Action on insurance policy by George A. Case against the Manufacturers' Fire & Marine Insurance Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

John A. Wright and T. Z. Blakeman, for appellant. Van Ness & Roche, for respondent.

BEATTY, C. J. This is an action on a fire insurance policy for $2,000, issued by the appellant to Alexander Pam, and by him assigned, after loss, to the respondent. The property insured was a stock of goods in a store at Riverside, Ariz., which was totally destroyed September 12, 1884. There was other insurance on the same goods to the amount of $2,000, making the total amount of insurance thereon $4,000. By the terms of its policy the appellant was to be liable in case of loss for only such proportion thereof as its insurance bore to the whole amount of insurance. In other words, it was liable for one-half of any loss on the goods insured, not exceeding $4,000. The plaintiff had judgment in the superior court for the whole amount of the policy, with interest and costs. Defendant appeals from the judgment and from an order denying it a new trial.

As the order appealed from must be reversed on the grounds hereinafter stated, it will be necessary, in view of the further proceedings in the superior court, to pass upon several of the points urged in support of the appeal. These depend mainly upon the following clauses of the policy in suit: "The loss to be paid sixty days after due notice and proofs of the same shall have been made by the assured and received at the office of the company, in accordance with the terms and provisions of this policy." "In case of differences touching any loss or damage after proof thereof has been received in due form the matter shall, at the written request of either party, be submitted to impartial appraisers, whose award in writing shall be binding on the parties as to the amount of such loss or damage." Shortly after the fire, Pam, the insured, gave the defendant notice of the fire, and within a reasonable time furnished the requisite proofs of loss in due form. In these formal proofs he put the total amount of his loss at $2,000. Counsel for respondent claims that this statement of the amount of the loss was a mistake due to his ignorance as to the correct manner of filling out the blank forms furnished by the defendant, and this claim certainly derives some support from the fact that the total value of the goods immediately preceding the fire was stated in the same proofs to have been $5,000, and they were, as we have said, totally destroyed. He also in the same proofs stated the amount of his claim against the defendant to be $2,000, the full amount of the policy. But whether due to mistake or not, the fact remains that in the formal proofs delivered to the defendant Pam stated plainly and unequivocally that his total loss was $2,000. The defendant did not within 60 days after proof of loss make any demand for arbitration as to the amount of loss or damage, but a short time after the expiration of that period, and before the commencement of this action, did make such demand in writing. In this state of the case, the superior judge, in ruling upon defendant's motion for a nonsuit and in instructing the jury, decided two propositions which constitute the principal grounds of controversy between the parties. He held in effect: First. That this action is maintainable, notwithstanding it was commenced after defendant's demand for arbitration, and without compliance with such demand. Second. That the plaintiff could be allowed to prove a loss to the extent of $4,000, and thereupon recover the full amount of the policy, notwithstanding his statement in his formal proofs that his total loss was but $2,000. The appellant contends that both these propositions are erroneous, and, as they are necessarily involved in any future trial of the case, we will briefly consider them.

We think it clear that if the formal proofs had stated a total loss of $4,000 or over, and defendant had failed to demand arbitration within the 60 days, at the expiration of which the loss was, by the terms of the policy, to become payable, this would have amounted to a waiver by the defendant of its right to make such demand, and the plaintiff would have been entitled, notwithstanding his refusal to arbitrate, to prove the whole amount of loss so stated. The necessity of an appraisement was not absolute upon any construction of the policy. It was not a condition precedent to the right of action, unless demanded. The most that can be said is that either party could demand arbitration within a reasonable time, but, if not so demanded, it was waived. It is not necessary to decide what would, under the circumstances of this case, have been a reasonable time within which to make the demand, if the amount of the loss had been correctly stated in the proofs. It is sufficient to say that a demand made for the first time, after the expiration of the full period of 60 days, or, in other words, after the loss had become payable and a right of action had accrued, would have been too late. And we think it equally clear that if the plaintiff in this action had confined his demand to an amount justly proportioned to the statement of his total loss, his refusal to arbitrate would have been no ground for denying his right to recover, even admitting defendant's right to an arbitration, if seasonably demanded. But the case in fact is like neither of the cases supposed. The plaintiff did not state a loss equal to that which he has been allowed to prove, and he does not confine his demand to one-half of the amount of the loss stated. The question, therefore, which the case presents (assuming, as we do, for the present that the defendant had a right under the policy to demand arbitration as to the amount of the loss, provided he made such demand within a reasonable time after receiving the formal proofs) is this: whether the plaintiff could practically deprive the defendant of such right by stating a loss of $2,000, and, after the time for demanding arbitration had passed, proving twice that amount. It is obvious that if the insured under a policy containing a stipulation to the effect supposed should, in his proofs, state a total loss clearly within the actual amount, the insurer would not be likely to demand arbitration, and, if his failure to make the demand were held to be a waiver of the right, and it should at the same time be held that the insured could, in an action on the policy, prove any amount of loss, however large, the result would be to deprive the insurer of all benefit of the stipulation. This, of course, could not be done indirectly any more than it could be done directly, and it follows that on the assumption of defendant's right to an arbitration—which its counsel claim and the judge of the superior court seems to have conceded—it was error to hold that the plaintiff could prove a loss of more than $2,000, or recover from defendant more than $1,000. We do not wish to be understood that in so holding we are sustaining the contention of appellant that the insured is estopped from proving the actual amount of loss by the mere fact that he has understated it in his proofs. We put our decision upon the ground that in the case supposed the insurer has acted upon the statement,—that he has relied upon it,—and refrained from exercising a right which otherwise he would have exercised, and that he would be injured by allowing the insured to prove a greater loss than he has stated.

But the respondent contends that the defendant, under a proper construction of the policy, never had any right to demand arbitration as to the amount of loss. It is in view of this contention that our observations on the points thus far discussed have been qualified by the statement that what is said is based upon the assumption that defendant had such right. But we think the assumption untenable. The stipulation in the policy upon which the defendant relies is too vague and indefinite to be allowed any validity. It fixes no number of appraisers; it provides no mode of selection. "Either party might withhold its or his assent to the appraiser or appraisers suggested by the other, or the company might suggest one number of appraisers, and the assured another number. In either case, and in others that might be supposed, no appraisement could be made." Williams v. Insurance Co., 54 Cal. 445. It is true that in the case cited the language we have quoted was used with reference to a stipulation substantially equivalent to those which in the more recent decisions of this court have been held to make an arbitration a condition precedent to a right of action on the policy, but it is also to be observed that in all those cases the stipulation relied on was far more certain and definite in its terms than the one in question here. In Adams v. Insurance Co., 70 Cal. 200, 11 Pac. Rep. 627, the provision was for two appraisers, to be mutually chosen by the parties, who, in case of disagreement, were to choose a third, a majority of whom could make a binding award. In other words, the stipulation provided for the number of appraisers, the exact method of selecting them, and the manner of making an award, all of which is totally wanting here. What is said of the case last cited is equally true of the case of Dry Dock Co. v. Assurance Co., 66 Cal. 253, 5 Pac. Rep. 232, and neither case can be considered authority for holding the provision of the policy under consideration to be effective. We hold, on the contrary, that it is of no force. We think that if an insurance company desires to secure to itself the right to the liquidation of damages through the intervention of arbitrators or appraisers, it must definitely provide at least for the number of arbitrators, and the mode of their selection. Mark v. Insurance Co., 24 Hun, 565, affirmed, 91 N. Y. 663. From this view it follows, of course, that the plaintiff here can maintain his action, notwithstanding his refusal to arbitrate; and that, since the defendant has lost no right or advantage by plaintiff's understatement of the amount of his loss, if, in fact, it was understated, there is no reason why he should be denied the right to prove the full amount of the actual loss. Therefore, the rulings of the superior judge on these points, though put upon a ground that we consider untenable, were not, in fact, erroneous, or injurious to the appellant.

But we think that the contention of the appellant that the evidence was insufficient to prove a loss of $4,000 is correct. We have carefully examined this evidence, and we think it shows, without any substantial conflict, a loss of less than $4,000. The plaintiff's principal witness on this point was his assignor, Pam, whose method of arriving at the value of the stock of goods on hand at the time of the fire was to deduct from the total amount of his sales up to the date of the fire the assumed percentage of his profits, and then to deduct the remainder so ascertained from the invoice price of all the goods he had purchased. He had carried on business during the latter part of 1883, and had taken up stock and made an inventory January 1, 1884. The figures show exactly what was the amount of his sales and what of his profits during 1883, and that his gross profits during that year were less than 39 per cent. of the invoice price of his goods. He testifies that his gross profits were larger in 1883 than they were in 1884, but when he comes to figure out the value of his stock of goods at the time of the fire, according to the method stated, he has to assume a profit of 60 per cent. in order to bring out his estimate of $5,810. Taking the percentage of gross profits which he made the previous year, and which he testifies was larger than he made in 1884, and applying it to the known amount of purchases and sales in 1884, it shows that he had on hand less than $4,000 worth of goods at the date of the fire, and of these nearly $800 worth were at a distant mining camp, and were not destroyed. Making every allowance in his favor by the additions of freights and so forth, he did not, on his own basis of calculation, lose more than $3,300. Another of plaintiff's witnesses (Verdugo) put the value of Pam's stock at $3,000. Pam's clerk, Gotthelf, says he usually had a stock worth $5,000; and Steinfeld says that three weeks before the fire it was worth $5,000. But it clearly appears from the books that for several weeks before the fire large amounts of goods were being sold, and scarcely anything purchased. Gotthelf does say in his deposition that he places the value of the goods destroyed at $5,000, but this particular answer was not responsive to the interrogatory, and defendant's motion to suppress it ought to have been sustained. There was no other testimony to sustain a finding of $4,000 loss, and the witnesses for the defendant—apparently fair, capable judges, and with good opportunities and sufficient motives to observe the condition and value of the stock—put it at a very much lower figure. In short, the verdict is in this particular without any substantial evidence to support it, and is evidently the result of prejudice or mistake. For this reason the defendant was entitled to a new trial, and the order denying it must be reversed.

There is nothing in the remaining assignments of error that calls for particular notice. The order overruling appellant's motion for a new trial is reversed, and the cause remanded.

SHARP v. HOFFMAN et al. (No. 12,571.)

WATERS AND WATER-COURSES—WITNESS—CROSS-EXAMINATION—APPEAL—REVIEW—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. Plaintiff sued for damages for deprivation of water. It appeared that he and defendants were riparian owners, his land being further down the stream. It was the general custom in the vicinity to divert water for irrigation, and for 20 years defendants had used all, or nearly all, the water of the stream, and plaintiff had used the surplus. For the years during which he complained that he had been wholly deprived the water-supply was low, and insufficient for defendants' needs. He made no complaint, for the reason, as he stated, that one of the defendants informed him that they had bought the water-right. Held, that a verdict for plaintiff should be set aside as contrary to the weight of evidence, as he was only entitled to the surplus after defendants were supplied, and in the years complained of there was no surplus.

2. Since by Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 2048, a witness may be asked, on cross-examination, as to any matter bearing directly or indirectly on any portion of his testimony in chief, a witness for plaintiff, who has testified concerning the stream of water in controversy, that he knew where it crossed a certain lane, may be asked if it was not from the fact that the creek did cross at that point, and washed sand on plaintiff's land, that the controversy between him and defendants arose, as the question tends as well to test the witness' knowledge as to the facts stated by him on direct examination, as also his credibility.

3. Under the same rule a witness who states that plaintiff's grantor claimed half the water of the creek may be asked if said grantor did not tell witness that he had sold the water to one of the defendants, as the question bears on the character and extent of plaintiff's predecessor's interest to the water in dispute.

4. The charge of the court to a jury is a decision upon the law of the case, and must be excepted to at the time it is given, or error therein will not be noticed.

In bank. Commissioners' decision. Appeal from superior court, Lassen county; M. MARSTELLER, Judge.

Action by J. P. Sharp against S. Hoffman and L. Hicks for the wrongful diversion of water. Verdict for plaintiff, which was set aside, and he appeals.

Spencer & Raker, for appellant. Goodwin & Davis and W. N. Goodwin, for respondent.

GIBSON, C. Action for damages for wrongful diversion of water. Verdict and judgment for plaintiff. Defendants moved for and obtained an order granting a new trial, from which plaintiff appeals. The new trial was granted upon two grounds: the insufficience of the evidence to justify the verdict, and of errors of law that occurred at the trial, and which were duly excepted to by defendants. Both plaintiff and defendants are riparian proprietors on Parker creek, in Lassen county; the lands of plaintiff lying below those of defendants. The creek is a small natural stream, fed by snow on the mountains at its source, and has each year a variable and diminishing flow of from several hundred inches, measured under a four-inch pressure, in the early spring-time, to a small quantity about the 1st of July. The gravamen of plaintiff's action being the deprivation of water for irrigation during the irrigation seasons in the years 1883, 1884, and 1885, whereby he suffered loss, it is incumbent upon him to show by satisfactory evidence (Code Civil Proc. § 1835) a right to use of the waters of the creek during each of such seasons, an interference with such right, and a consequent injury. Referring to the record upon these points, it appears that during the trial the question of riparian proprietorship was eliminated by an admission to the effect that during the time both parties claimed that their respective rights to the water were acquired irrigation in the neighborhood of the farms of plaintiff and defendants was necessary, and that it was the general custom of the farmers in such neighborhood to divert by means of dams and ditches the waters of streams to irrigate their farms; that defendants had for 20 years used all, or nearly all, of the waters of the stream, and whatever water the plaintiff had obtained prior to 1883 was surplus water, or what water was left after defendants' ditches were supplied; that for the three irrigating seasons that he (plaintiff) received no water, and during which seasons the water supply was low and insufficient for the usual requirements of defendants, he made no complaint, offering as an excuse for his silence, which is an immaterial one, that he had theretofore been told by one of the defendants that such defendant, with his co-defendant, had purchased the water-right for themselves, and that he (plaintiff) believed and was deceived by such statement. If the plaintiff was and is entitled to the use of the surplus water of the stream only,—which we do not decide,—and during the seasons complained of the water was insufficient for the customary use of defendants, who had a prior right to use it, the plaintiff could not have been injured by deprivation of water that he was not entitled to use. Under such a showing the court below might well say as it did, in deciding the motion for a new trial: "I am thoroughly convinced that the weight or preponderance of evidence is clearly against the justness and correctness of the verdict, and the same not only should but must be set aside."

Appellant contends that while a trial court may grant a new trial for insufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict, it cannot grant such a motion upon the ground stated by the trial court in this case, but it is well settled that "it is within the province of the superior court to grant a new trial where in its opinion the verdict is contrary to the weight of evidence. Bauder v. Tyrrel, 59 Cal. 99; Irving v. Cunningham, 58 Cal. 306. And this court will not interfere with its discretion in so doing, except in extreme cases, or except in cases where it is apparent the court below has proceeded upon an erroneous hypothesis." Bennett v. Hobro, 72 Cal. 178, 13 Pac. Rep. 473.

On cross-examination the witness Fry, called for plaintiff, was asked: "You stated in your direct examination that when you went there Thompson [through whom plaintiff deraigns title] claimed half of the water in Parker creek. Now, do you recollect, in talking about this water matter at the time you lived there, of Mr. Thompson telling you about selling Mr. Hoffman the water of his place?" Objected to as not in cross-examination. Objection sustained. Defendants except. The cross-question of witness Jellison, also called for plaintiff, was asked: "You say you know where the water crossed the lane near Buntingville. Now, was it not because it did cross the road there and wash sand on Sharp [plaintiff] that gave rise to this dispute?" Objected to by plaintiff as immaterial and not in cross-examination. Objection sustained. Defendants except. The object of cross-examination is to test the credibility, knowledge, and recollection of a witness as to his testimony on direct examination. (1 Greenl. Ev. § 446;) and a witness can be, on cross-examination, interrogated as to any matter which has a bearing directly or indirectly upon any portion of his testimony on direct examination. Code Civil Proc. § 2048. The testimony sought to be elicited from witness Fry tended to test his recollection as to the character and extent of the claim of plaintiff's predecessor in interest to the water-right in dispute, and that from witness Jellison, to test his knowledge of his direct testimony, and his credibility as a witness, and should have been allowed.

To repel the assault made upon the instructions to the jury, it is sufficient to say that a careful examination of the transcript, which is so arranged as to prevent an expeditious examination of it, fails to show that the instructions to the jury, or any of them, were excepted to. The charge of a court to a jury is a decision made by the court during the trial, that the law thus declared must be applied by the jury to the facts established by the evidence; and such decision, to be reviewable upon a motion for a new trial, or upon appeal, must be excepted to when it is made. Id. § 646.

The explanation of appellant's counsel of his reflection in his brief upon the trial judge is hardly sufficient. We can easily conceive of a case where counsel in the heat of argument, during the excitement incident to a trial, might exceed the bounds of propriety and be excusable, but find it more difficult when counsel, after the excitement of the trial has passed, and the asperities it may have engendered been smoothed by the hand of time, deliberately, in the quietude of his chambers, pens in his brief that which is a reprehensible breach of the duty he owes to the court, and has sworn to perform. We think the order appealed from ought to be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For reasons given in the foregoing opinion the order is affirmed.

BURTON v. BURTON et al. (No. 12,955.)

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS.

1. In an action to have certain land adjudged to be the property of the estate of a decedent, brought against the widow and others as holders of the legal title, it appeared that the title had come to decedent by mesne conveyances from P., who was the original grantee from the Mexican government, and that after the death of decedent a patent was issued by the United States to his widow and children. The theory of the case, as established on a former appeal, was that the widow and children took the patent as representatives of the estate of decedent. Held, that whether there was or was not any consideration for a deed by P. to the widow, executed before the issuance of the patent, to "confirm the claim of title to the heirs of" decedent, was not material, as the widow took as trustee for the estate.

2. In such equitable action it is not an abuse of discretion for the court, after having determined the issue submitted to it, to refuse to take the entire administration away from the usual probate jurisdiction, and to proceed to settle the estate and close the administration.

3. Although findings of fact and of law should be separately stated, the mere fact that one finding is placed under the wrong heading will not justify a reversal.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; JAMES A. GIBSON, Judge.

Chapman & Hendrick, Collier & Haines, and Welborn, Parker & Stevens, for appellants. Conklin & Hunsaker and H. L. Titus, for respondent.

MCFARLAND, J. This action was brought to have it adjudged and decreed that a certain tract of land known as the "Rancho Jamul" is the property of the estate of Henry S. Burton, deceased, and subject to the administration thereof, and that the legal title thereto held by either of the defendants is held in trust for said estate, etc. The defendant Maria A. Burton (widow of said deceased) admitted all the allegations of the complaint, and set up by way of cross-complaint that she was entitled to a certain particularly described part of said rancho as a homestead, which had been set apart to her by the probate court. The defendants Leach and Capron denied most of the averments of the complaint, set up certain special defenses, and prayed that plaintiff take nothing by the action, and that their title to the premises be forever quieted as against the plaintiff. The court, sitting without a jury, rendered judgment for plaintiff against Leach and Capron, but awarded the defendant Maria A. Burton her homestead. Leach and Capron appeal, as against both plaintiff and defendant Maria A. Burton, from orders denying a new trial.

The case was before this court on a former appeal from a judgment in favor of the present appellants. McDonald v. Burton, 68 Cal. 445, 9 Pac. Rep. 714. On that appeal nearly every question in the case was determined in favor of the respondents herein, and against the appellants herein, and we shall not enter again upon the discussion of the matters thereby definitely settled. The former appeal, it is true, was from the judgment alone, and the decision on appeal was based mainly on the findings; while the present appeal, being from an order denying a new trial, presents the question of the sufficiency of the evidence to support the findings. And consequently the arguments of appellants are addressed mainly to the point that the evidence does not justify a large number of the findings. The findings are numerous, and the evidence voluminous, and it would serve no useful purpose to review the evidence here in detail. It is enough to say that in our opinion there is sufficient evidence to support each finding of the court. This being so, there is no substantial difference between the case as presented now and as presented at the former appeal, except as hereinafter mentioned. On the former appeal it appeared that a certain deed, executed by Pio Pico to the defendant Maria A. Burton, was without consideration, while on the present appeal that want of consideration does not affirmatively appear, and counsel for appellants contend that this difference is material. But we do not think so. Pico was the original grantee of the rancho from the Mexican government, and his agent, Foster, sold it to certain parties, through whom the title came to Henry S. Burton, deceased. Pico ratified the sale, and never afterwards claimed the property. While said Burton was prosecuting proceedings in the United States courts to procure a patent he died. Afterwards his widow, Maria A. Burton, defendant herein, and his children, Nellie and Henry H. Burton, heirs of said deceased, were substituted on the record as claimants for the patent. In due time a patent issued to said last-named persons, "widow and heirs of H. S. Burton, deceased." Now, the whole theory of this case, as established on the former appeal, is that the widow and children took the patent, not in their individual capacity, but as representatives of the estate of Burton, deceased, and that the rancho continued to be the property of said estate. Now, when Pico made his deed of the rancho, above noticed, to Maria A. Burton, (which was made before the patent issued,) he made it, as the court finds, "to confirm the claim of title 'to the heirs of Gen. Henry S. Burton;'" and, whether Pico executed the deed with or without consideration, Mrs. Burton took it in her representative capacity and as trustee for the estate. The point that the complaint does not state a cause of action, if it could be raised on a motion for new trial, was settled on the former appeal.

The contention of appellants that the court erred in ruling out certain evidence rests upon the proposition that in this equitable action the court not only had jurisdiction, but was bound by its duty to settle the whole estate of Henry S. Burton, deceased; to pass upon all disputed claims against it; to examine and adjudicate the accounts of all its administrators; and to proceed to the final distribution of the estate, and the winding up of the entire administration. When, during the administration of an estate, it is necessary to call in the aid of a court of equity to accomplish some particular thing, it is, perhaps, a doubtful question whether such court has the power to take the entire administration away from the usual probate jurisdiction, and it is not necessary here to decide that question. Certainly it has not been settled that in all such cases the court must assume such jurisdiction. The purpose of the bill in the case at bar was to have it adjudged that the Rancho Jamul is the property of the estate of Burton, deceased, and subject to the administration thereof; and the court, after having determined that issue, cannot be held to have abused its discretion because it did not proceed to settle the estate and close the administration. It had the right, under the facts of this case, at least, to allow those matters to reach their natural termination in the tribunal and proceeding in which they were pending.

The finding on the issue of the statute of limitations was sufficient. Findings of fact and of law should, of course, be separately stated, but the mere fact that one finding was placed under the wrong heading would be a very feeble reason for the reversal of a judgment; and in other respects we think that the findings are amply full and responsive to all the material issues. We see nothing to invalidate that part of the judgment which awards to the respondent Maria A. Burton, her homestead. Her right to the homestead is substantially the same as it was at the former appeal. The orders appealed from are affirmed.

KAHN v. BOARD OF SUPERVISORS OF THE CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO. (No. 11, 765.)

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—PUBLIC IMPROVEMENTS—MANDAMUS.

1. Act Cal. April 1, 1872, (St. 1871-72, p. 911,) passed to establish a street in San Francisco, provided (section 5) that, on petition to the mayor by the owners of a majority in frontage of the property described in such act, "as said owners are or shall be named in the last preceding annual assessment roll for the state, city, and county taxes," for the opening of said street, the board constituted by the act to carry it into effect should proceed. Held, that the signatures to the petition of persons other than those to whom the property was assessed on the last preceding assessment roll could not be counted in order to make up the owners of a majority of the frontage.

2. Nor could the signatures of executors, administrators, and agents be counted, in the absence of evidence of their authority to sign the petition.

3. Nor could the signature of a homestead and railroad corporation, made by its president and secretary, be counted, in the absence of evidence that such officers were authorized to affix the signature, or that that duty appertained to their offices.

4. On application, by a holder of bonds issued for improvements made under the act, for mandamus to compel the city to levy a tax for the payment of the bonds, the facts that, on presentation of the petition to the mayor, he certified that it was signed by the requisite property owners, and that the county court affirmed the report of the board of the proceedings taken by it under the petition, do not estop the city to deny the sufficiency of the petition.

In bank. Petition for mandamus by Leopold Kahn against the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco.

D. M. Delmas and A. L. Rhodes, for petitioner. George Flournoy, Jr., City and County Atty., (Philip G. Galpin, of counsel,) for respondent.

THORNTON, J. This is an original proceeding in this court, asking for a writ of mandate to compel the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco to levy a tax for the payment of interest on the Montgomery avenue bonds. The action is brought by the holder of several of the bonds mentioned, and the levy sought to be ordered is to be made on a certain district of land situate in the city and county aforesaid, described in the fourth section of an act of the legislature of this state, approved the 1st of April, 1872, passed for the purpose of opening and establishing a public street in the city and county of San Francisco, to be called Montgomery avenue, etc. St. 1871-72, p. 911. For the purpose of opening and establishing the street, a strip of land was described in the first section of the act, to be taken to that end. By the fourth section of the act, the district on which the cost of opening the street was to be assessed was fixed and described. The street improvement above mentioned was to be carried out through the agency of a board of public works, which was created by section 19 of the act, and consisted of the mayor, the tax collector, and the city and county surveyor of the city and county of San Francisco. This board so constituted was authorized, empowered, and directed to perform all and singular the duties enjoined by the act upon the board of public works. It was prescribed by the fifth section of the act that, whenever the owners of a majority in frontage of the property described in section 4, "as said owners are or shall be named in the last preceding annual assessment roll for the state, city, and county taxes, shall petition the mayor of said city and county, in writing, for the opening of Montgomery avenue, according to the provisions of this act, the board of public works * * * shall proceed to organize by the election of a president." Upon this organization having been made, the board was required to proceed to the work designated in the statute. In section 6 of the act it was provided that the "board shall also proceed to ascertain and determine, and separately state and set down, in a written report, a description of the several subdivisions and lots of land included in the district defined in section 4 of this act, following, when possible, the descriptions and deeds and other instruments filed with said board; and opposite to such description shall set against each lot or subdivision the sum or amount in which, according to the judgment and determination of said board, the said lot or subdivision has been or will be benefited by reason of the taking and opening of said avenue relatively to the benefits therefrom accruing to the other lots or subdivisions respectively within said district. Said board shall also set against each lot or subdivision as aforesaid the names of the owners, occupants, and claimants thereof, so far as the same can be ascertained conveniently by said board. The said board shall adopt a general map or plan of the said Montgomery avenue, and of the lands herein declared to be benefited thereby; and it shall also adopt a map or maps of each block or piece of land taken for said avenue, and also the property injured thereby, and also each lot and subdivision of land liable to be assessed to pay the costs and expenses of opening said avenue as the same are defined in this act. Such report, as soon as the same is completed, shall be left at the office of said board daily, during ordinary business hours, for 30 days, for the free inspection of all parties interested, and notice that the same is so open for inspection for such time and such place shall be published by said board daily for 20 days in two daily newspapers printed and published in said city and county." It is provided by section 7 that "any person interested in any piece or parcel of land situated within the district defined and described in section 4 of this act, or in any of the lands taken for said avenue, or in any improvements damaged by the opening of said avenue, feeling himself aggrieved by the action or determination of the said board, as shown in said report, may, at any time within the 30 days mentioned in section 6 of this act, apply by petition to the county court of the city and county of San Francisco, setting forth his interest in the proceedings had before said board, and his objections thereto, for an order on said board requiring it to file with said court the report of said board, and such other documents or data as may be pertinent thereto, in the custody of said board, and used by it in preparing said report. Said court is hereby authorized and empowered to hear said petition, and shall set the same down for a hearing within 10 days from the date of the filing thereof; and the party filing said petition shall, on the day he files the same, serve a copy thereof on at least one of the members of the board of public works, and said board may appear, by counsel or otherwise, before said court in response to said petition. Said board may file a written answer to said petition with said court. Testimony may be taken by said court upon said hearing, and the process of the court may be used to compel the attendance of witnesses and the production of books or papers or maps in the custody of said board or otherwise. It shall be in the discretion of said court, after hearing and considering said application, to allow said order or deny the same; and, if granted, a copy thereof shall be served on said board, and it shall proceed to obey the same according to the terms of the order to be prescribed by the court; but in case no such petition shall be filed with said county court within the time above limited for the filing thereof, the said report shall be presented by the said board to the said county court, with a petition to the court that the same be approved and confirmed by the court."

The section (seventh) then proceeds to declare that the court mentioned above shall have power to approve and confirm said report, or refer it back to the board with directions to alter or modify the same in the particulars specified by the court, and the board shall thereupon proceed to make such alterations and modifications, and, when so made, the county court should approve or modify the report. By the same section an appeal was allowed to this court within a specified time by any party dissatisfied with said report, or any part thereof, who shall have filed a petition to the county court as above provided. After the passage of the act above mentioned, a petition in writing was presented to the mayor of the city and county for the opening of Montgomery avenue. This petition was signed by several thousand persons who were owners of frontage of the property described in section 4, above referred to, as said owners were named on the assessment roll referred to in section 5 of the said act. On the presentation of this petition to the mayor, he made and attached it to a certificate that it had been signed by the names of a majority in frontage of the property, as required by the act of 1872. This certificate bore date on the 19th day of June, 1872, and on the next day the board of public works was organized by the officials above named. This board subsequently proceeded to the performance of the duties required by the act, made up the report required by the sixth section, which remained in the office of the board for the period of time required by the act, for the free inspection of all persons interested, and notice that the report was so open for inspection was published as required by the said sixth section. On the 2d day of November, 1872, the report was presented to the county court above named, with a petition to said court that it do approve and confirm said report, and, no objections then appearing to the report, it was on the 14th day of November, 1872, approved and confirmed.

It is contended that the proceedings taken by the board of public works, and had in the county court, were without jurisdiction and void, for the reason that the names of a majority in frontage of the property described in section 4 of the act of 1872, required by section 5 of the same act, did not sign the petition to the mayor of the city and county of San Francisco. That a petition signed by a majority of the owners designated above was necessary to give the board of public works jurisdiction to organize and proceed under the act, we have no doubt. This point was fully considered and determined in Mulligan v. Smith, 59 Cal. 206. This ruling we approve and adhere to. We also approve of the ruling made in the case cited, that the mayor was not charged with the duty of determining whether the petition was signed by the required majority, and that his decision to that effect did not conclude or estop any one from disputing and showing that, in fact, the petition was not signed by the required majority. The question whether the petition was in fact signed by such majority is here presented for decision. We have examined the evidence and weighed the arguments on this question, and are of opinion that the petition was not signed by such majority as the provisions of the act required. The learned counsel for the petitioner has presented in an elaborate brief his view of the question. He estimates the entire frontage of the district to be 424,096 feet, one-half of which is 212,048. The majority required in this view would be 212,049 feet. According to the contention of the learned counsel, the owners of 212,965.7¼ feet of frontage did sign the petition. But there are included in this contention of counsel certain signatures which will be found in the record on pages 147, 148. These signatures are set forth in a table designated by the letter "G," printed on the pages of the record just above given. This table sets forth the signers of the petition whose names are other than those to whom the property was assessed on the assessment roll mentioned in the fifth section of the act of 1872. It will be observed that the act (section 5) requires that the petition to the mayor shall be signed by the "owners of a majority in frontage of the property described in section 4 of this act, as said names are or shall be named in the last preceding annual assessment roll for the state, city, and county taxes." The requirement of the above is that the same persons who are assessed on the assessment roll designated by the act shall sign the petition. This is the nature of the legislative requirement, and the courts are not at liberty to disregard it. We are bound to heed this legislative mandate, and the plain and manifest meaning of the language employed inhibit us from holding that the signers whose names are set forth in Table G are such as are required by the act referred to. These signers, which are included in the view of petitioner's counsel, and which go in his contention to make up the majority required, represent 6,050¾ feet, and deducting these from the number of signers, according to his calculation, the result would be that the number of feet signed for would fail of a majority by over 5,000,—5,132.5½.

The signatures by executors, administrators, and agents, counted to make the majority by petitioner's counsel, must also be excluded. We hold that they must not be counted for the reasons given in the opinion of Mr. Justice McKee, in Mulligan v. Smith. In relation to these signers of the petition, the following language, which we adopt, is used in the opinion: "Executors and administrators are but the legal personal representatives of the decedents whom they represent. They are but agents of their constituents, created by law, whose duties and powers are prescribed by law. Whatever they do must be done according to law, and within the authority of the law; for the acts of an agent are binding only when done within the scope of the authority conferred upon him. In any transaction in which executors or administrators pretend to act as such, they cannot create any liability on the estate of which they are the representatives. They have no power to charge, or incumber, or sell and convey, the real property of the estate, unless authorized by the law under which they are acting. In favor of such an act there is no legal presumption. If it purports to be done by authority, the authority should be produced. The signatures of the executors, administrators, and agents to the petition were, therefore, ineffectual as signatures of the frontage for which they signed."

We are also of opinion that the signature of the North San Francisco Homestead & Railroad Association, the frontage of which amounted to 41,510.7, should be stricken out. This was signed for by the president and secretary, as we are convinced by the evidence, without competent authority. In the face of the evidence in the record, we cannot presume that the parties signing had authority so to sign. We see no ground in the evidence for presuming that the president and secretary of the corporation had authority to affix the signature of the corporation to the petition. The affixing a signature to such a paper as the petition was no part of the duties devolved on the president and secretary of the corporation. No such duties appear by the evidence to have appertained to the officers mentioned. Under these circumstances, the power to authorize the affixing of the name of the corporation to the petition rested with the board of directors, as managing agents of the corporation, to be exercised by their direction. We are of opinion that, in any view which we are justified in taking of the question, the petition was not signed by the owners of the majority of the frontage, as required by the act of the legislature.

But it is argued that the county court having decided, as it did, that the required majority of owners had signed the petition, such determination is conclusive on all parties concerned and cannot be again controverted. This point was made and decided by this court in Mulligan v. Smith, supra, and we do not feel inclined to disturb that decision. It is unnecessary to discuss the question again, as we are satisfied with the conclusion there reached, and are willing to adhere to the ruling there made. We cannot see that it should make any difference in our rulings on the questions just passed on that the action in Mulligan v. Smith was brought against a property owner and tax-payer by a purchaser at a sale made for non-payment of the tax claimed under the provisions of the act of 1872, while here the action is brought by a bondholder. The question of jurisdiction was to be alike looked to by the tax-payer and the bondholder, and the same facts were to be examined by each. The same record was to be considered by bondholder and tax-payer. If the facts did not show jurisdiction as to the tax-payer, we cannot see how they showed jurisdiction as to the bondholder. The legislature intended that, in every case, the jurisdiction to exercise the powers conferred by the act of 1872 should depend on the existence of the jurisdictional fact, viz., that the petition was signed by the required majority of owners; and, if the petition was not so signed, the board of public works should have no jurisdiction to proceed. Nor should this jurisdiction be held to attach, whatever court may have ruled that the petition was signed by a majority, when, in fact, it was signed only by a minority, of the owners designated by the statute. Jurisdiction exists in the superior court to grant letters of administration on the estate of a deceased person. When its power to grant such letters is invoked, the court must necessarily pass on the question of the death of the party whose estate is sought to be administered. The court by its grant of letters necessarily decides that such party has died. But, should the party be in fact alive, its judgment is not conclusive that he is or was dead. It being made to appear to the court that the person alleged and held to be dead is, in fact, alive, the judgment of the court is void, and must be so held. Such is the decision of this court in Stevenson v. Superior Court, 62 Cal. 60. In deciding that case it was said, in the opinion of Ross, J.: "Administration may lawfully be had upon the estate of a dead man, but not upon that of one in life. Until death occurs there is no 'subject-matter' over which it is possible for any court to exercise jurisdiction. It is true that the court of probate, before issuing letters of administration, must first determine affirmatively the question of death; but, notwithstanding such determination, the fact that the supposed intestate is alive may still be shown, and, when shown, establishes the nullity of the entire proceedings." In this Justices McKinstry, Sharpstein, Morrison, and McKee concurred. So in this case it should be held that jurisdiction of the subject-matter vested in the board of public works when the required petition was presented. If no such petition was presented, though the county court held that such a petition was presented, the jurisdiction did not attach.

The foregoing remarks show that the city is not estopped by action of the mayor, or by judgment of the county court. This question is thoroughly discussed by Field and Sawyer, JJ., in Liebman v. City and County of San Francisco, 11 Sawy. 147, 24 Fed. Rep. 705, where the same conclusion is reached. We refer particularly to the able opinion of the justices mentioned in the case cited. The case of Lent v. Tilson, 14 Pac. Rep. 71, is in accord with these views. There the initial step to give jurisdiction was the adoption by the board of supervisors of a resolution authorizing the work to be done, by expressing their judgment that such work would be expedient, and, in addition, the publication of the resolution as prescribed by the act of the legislature under which the proceeding was taken. This was done. The act was in this respect complied with. In the case before us the act was not complied with, for the required petition was not filed. In the case cited, as the act had been complied with, and jurisdiction attached for executing the work, we cannot see how the taxpayer was injured, conceding that the county court had jurisdiction to determine conclusively the fact that the resolution required had been adopted and published. Conceding that the determination of the county court in this case was prima facie evidence that a proper petition had been presented, still it was not conclusive. The facts as to jurisdiction were open to the examination of the bondholder, and it was incumbent on him to inquire into them, and ascertain whether the requirements of the act had been followed. We cannot regard the petitioner, who is a holder of bonds issued under the act of 1872, as exempt from the obligation to ascertain whether the bonds were issued in compliance with the act of 1872. A purchaser of bonds is bound by the law under which such bonds were issued, and the law informs him that the bonds impose no obligation unless issued in accordance with law.

The application for the writ must be denied. So ordered.

We concur: Beatty, C. J.; Works, J.; Sharpstein, J.; McFarland, J.

Jennings v. Bank of California. (No. 11,629.)

Corporations—Transfers of Stock—Liens.

1. A corporation has power to prescribe in a certificate of stock that such stock will not be transferred on its books until the payment of all indebtedness due the corporation by the person in whose name the stock stands on the books, though the terms on which stock may be transferred are prescribed by statute.

2. When the stockholder accepts a certificate containing such a condition without objection, and thereafter borrows money from the corporation, a bank, he assents to the condition, and the bank has an equitable lien on the stock for the amount due it.

3. The fact that the condition was inserted in the certificate by the president, cashier, and secretary of the bank, without authority of the board of directors, is immaterial as against the borrower, as such officers will be presumed to have authority to arrange the terms of the loan.

4. A reorganization of the bank, and the adoption of by-laws providing that certificates of stock "shall be transferable by indorsement and delivery thereof, the transfer to be complete and binding upon the bank only when recorded upon the books of the bank," is not a waiver of the stipulation in the certificate or of the lien created thereby.

5. The fact that there was no usage from which such a lien could arise is no defense to its enforcement, where it does not appear that there was any usage against it.

6. The facts that the bank's cashier testified that "if a party is in good standing, we don't question his right to a transfer," and that the stockholder was allowed a large overdraft, do not show that the loan was made on his personal credit alone, so as to waive the lien on the stock.

7. Under Civil Code Cal. § 324, providing that a transfer of stock by indorsement, and delivery of the certificate, "is not valid, except between the parties, until the same is entered on the books," an assignee of the certificate takes subject to the bank's equity, and, as the condition is sufficient to put him on inquiry, he is not a bona fide purchaser.

8. When such assignee gives the bank no notice of the transfer, the lien extends to advances subsequently made by the bank to the assignor.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; T. H. Rearden, Judge.

Newlands, Allen & Herrin, for appellant.

Lloyd & Wood, for respondent.

Hayne, C. Action for damages for the refusal of the defendant to make a transfer upon its books of certain stock to the plaintiff. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. The material facts are as follows: In 1879 one Bowman became the owner of certain stock in the bank, and this stock was transferred to him upon the books of the corporation. The certificate was as follows: "No. 131. This is to certify that A. W. Bowman, of San Francisco, is the proprietor of sixty-seven shares of the capital stock of the Bank of California, which is transferable only upon the books of the bank, personally or by attorney, upon the surrender of this certificate, after compliance with the conditions printed on its back. San Francisco, October 21, 1879. S. FRANKLIN, Secretary. THOMAS BROWN, Cashier. WILLIAM ALVORD, President." The condition referred to in the body of the certificate was as follows: "No transfer of the stock described in this certificate will be made upon the books of the bank until after the payment of all indebtedness due the bank by the person in whose name the stock stands on the books of the bank, except with the written consent of the president or cashier." There was no by-law of the corporation, nor any resolution of the board of directors, authorizing the insertion of such a condition in the certificate; but from the time of the organization of the bank, in 1864, such a condition was always inserted, although the bank had never refused to make transfer by reason of the indebtedness of a stockholder, except in the present instance. It does not appear, however, that occasion for such refusal had ever arisen. Bowman received the stock without objection. He was a depositor of the bank at the time, and on May 4, 1883, was indebted to the bank on overdrafts in upwards of $80,000. On that day he transferred his stock to the plaintiff for value, and indorsed and delivered the certificates to him. No notice of this transfer was given to the bank until October 16, 1884, when the plaintiff demanded a transfer of the stock to him upon the books. In the mean time the bank continued to pay the quarter-yearly dividends to Bowman, and to lend him money on overdrafts. On October 13, 1884, which was two days before the notice of the transfer, Bowman owed the bank $98,786. This indebtedness was subsequently reduced to $30,394.75, which sum remains due. The bank refused to transfer the stock to the plaintiff upon its books until Bowman's indebtedness to it was discharged.

1. As between Bowman and the bank, we think that the latter had an equitable lien upon the stock for the sum due to it. The counsel for the respondent makes several points in this regard.

(a) It is argued that the terms upon which shares of stock may be transferred are prescribed by the statute, and that the corporation had no power to annex other conditions. So far as the power of corporate legislation is concerned, this may be conceded, and it may be assumed for the purpose of the case that a corporation could not make a by-law which would operate in and of itself to create a lien upon the stock for the indebtedness of the stockholder. But the power to legislate is one thing, and the power to contract is quite another. In the language of Angell: "What may be bad as a by-law, as against common right, may be good as a contract; since a man may part with a common right voluntarily of which it would be impolitic and unjust to deprive him by a by-law passed without his assent, or, perhaps, knowledge, by those who might not know or would not consult his individual interests." Ang. Corp. (8th Ed.) § 342. And to say, as is said by the learned counsel, that no additional limitation can be added by contract in a particular case, seems to us to be going altogether too far. No statute has been called to our attention which prohibits a corporation like the defendant from lending money on its own capital stock, and, in the absence of such a prohibition, we think that such a loan is not ultra vires. If this be so, it cannot be doubted that, if the authorized officers of the bank had taken the certificate in pledge for the indebtedness, the bank would have had a lien thereon, and, having such a lien, could not be compelled to transfer the stock until the indebtedness secured by the lien had been discharged; and we can see no difference in principle between the case put and one where the loan is made upon an agreement that the stock shall stand upon the books as security for the indebtedness. The only possible difference is in the kind of security taken, and this does not affect the question.

Then was there a contract for an equitable lien? We think that such a contract must be implied from the conduct of the parties. We do not say that the mere acceptance by the stockholder of the certificate without objection would constitute a contract, in the absence of subsequent dealings with reference thereto. It is not necessary to express an opinion upon such a case; but we think that the acceptance, without objection, of the certificate containing such a condition, and the subsequent borrowing of money from the bank without anything to exclude the idea that the condition was to be binding, amounts to an assent to it, so far as the particular loan was concerned, and that a contract is to be implied that the stock was to stand upon the books as security for the loan. "An implied contract is one, the existence and terms of which are manifested by conduct," (Civil Code, § 1621,) or, in the language of a learned writer, "is inferred from the conduct, situation, or mutual relations of the parties, and enforced by the law on the ground of justice." (Metc. Cont. 4.) In the present case every consideration of justice leads to the implication of an agreement for security. The stockholder knew from the conditions of the certificate of the terms upon which he could borrow money from the bank. With such knowledge, he borrowed the money without raising any objection to the terms, and we think that he must be held to have assented to them and to be bound by them; and the result of the contract so made is the creation of an equitable lien in favor of the bank. In Waln v. Bank, 8 Serg. & R. 89, which was an action like the one before us, there was no by-law or written regulation of the board giving a lien upon the stock, but the court held that a lien arose from the borrowing of money from the bank with knowledge of its usage in that regard, and said: "A course of dealing, a usage, an understanding, a contract, express or implied, is the law of the parties and a law to them, provided they are not repugnant to the charter or the laws of the land. * * * The understood notice to Mr. Waln, his continuing to deal with the bank, with full knowledge of this term and condition, is equally binding on him and the present plaintiffs as if it were a written regulation, a by-law, a provision in the charter, or clause inserted in the very certificate of stock. The bank had an undoubted right to say to any stockholder, 'We discount your note; but, remember, until it is paid, we shall hold your stock in security. You shall not be permitted to transfer it until you pay us.' * * * Call this answer of the bank what you please,—lien, set-off, legal or equitable, pledge, retainer, stoppage, course of dealing, general undertaking, usage, contract, express or implied,—it is a bar, in law and equity, to this action." The case of Vansands v. Bank, 26 Conn. 144, is precisely in point. That, like the present case, was an action for damages for the refusal to transfer stock upon the books of a corporation. It was conceded that no lien upon the stock was given to the bank, either by the by-laws or the charter or by statute. The certificates of stock, however, contained a condition, like that in the case before us, to the effect that the transfer upon the books should be subject to the indebtedness of the stockholder. The court held that the acceptance of such a certificate without objection, and a subsequent loan by means of the discount of a note, effected a contract which created an equitable lien for the amount of the indebtedness. And STORRS, C. J., delivering the opinion, said: "To consider it otherwise than as an agreement would be to disregard the plain intention of the parties, which courts will always, if possible, carry into effect, and to sanction the perpetration of a fraud on the defendants. Smith having received the certificate proffered to him by the defendants with that restriction, neither he nor his assignee should be permitted to deny his assent to it, and that would be sufficient to constitute an agreement."

(b) It is urged that the fact that there was no by-law, and no action by the board of directors, is fatal to the existence of an agreement or lien; in other words, that the action of the president, cashier, and secretary, in putting such a condition in the certificate, was unauthorized. But, so far as the contract between the borrower and lender is concerned, we think that this is immaterial. It might, perhaps, be argued that the fact the condition was inserted in every certificate of stock since the organization of the bank shows that the proceeding was sanctioned by the board, although there was no formal authorization of it; for under such circumstances it cannot be supposed that the board was ignorant of it. But, waiving this, the officers from whom Bowman obtained his loan must be held to have had authority to arrange the terms of the loan. The officers who transact the ordinary business of a corporation are presumed to have authority to do all acts which are usual and incidental thereto. McKiernan v. Lenzen, 56 Cal. 63, 64; Donnell v. Lewis Co. Bank, 80 Mo. 171; Reynolds v. Collins, 78 Ala. 97; Case v. Bank, 100 U. S. 455. And the authority to arrange the security upon which a loan is to be made is certainly incidental to the making of the loan itself; so that, even if the party who obtained the loan could raise a question as to the authority of the officers with whom he dealt, it must be held that there was ample authority, so far as the particular case is concerned.

(c) It is contended that the bank, by its by-laws, subsequently adopted, modified the force of the stipulation contained in the certificate. This contention is based upon the fact that the bank reorganized under the Code, and adopted by-laws which, after providing for the issuance of certificates of stock, declare that "these certificates shall be transferable by indorsement and delivery thereof, the transfer to be complete and binding upon the bank only when recorded upon the books of the bank," and do not provide for any lien such as is claimed here. But we see nothing in this which forbids the contract for a lien upon particular shares to secure a loan to a stockholder, or which requires a transfer of the shares, notwithstanding the existence of such a lien. It would have been an unnecessary precaution to have added to said by-law the words "but no such transfer shall be made in cases where the bank acquires by contract a lien upon the stock." As we have stated above, the lien is independent of the by-laws, and there is nothing in them which forbids the acquirement of a lien in the manner specified.

(d) It is said that there was no usage from which a lien could arise; that, as a matter of fact, the bank never insisted upon any lien upon a shareholder's stock, except in this single case. But, while we have cited a case to show that a contract could arise from dealing with reference to a known usage, as being an analogous case, we have not placed the matter upon the ground of usage. Our opinion proceeds upon the proposition that the acceptance of the certificate of stock containing the condition in question, and the subsequent borrowing of money, without anything to exclude the idea that the condition was to govern, creates an implied contract from which an equitable lien arises. This was the ground of decision in the Connecticut case, which expressly states that it did not proceed on the ground of usage. We should reach the same conclusion if this had been the only certificate and transaction of the kind which had ever occurred. Nor can it be said that there was any usage against such a transaction; for, while this was the only instance in which the lien was sought to be enforced, it does not appear to have been necessary to insist on it in any other case. For aught that appears to the contrary, the other shareholders may have all been able to discharge their indebtedness, if any existed, and may have in fact done so.

(e) It is argued that the bank waived its lien by lending money upon the personal credit of the stockholder; but there is nothing in the record which shows that the advances were made upon personal credit alone. The findings do not so state. It appears from the statement on motion for new trial, that the cashier said in the course of his testimony: "If a party is in good standing, we don't question his right to a transfer. We waive it by transferring. We do not pretend to claim the right to refuse a transfer against a shareholder in good credit." This is the only thing which we find in the evidence in relation to the matter. It certainly does not show that the advances in this case were made on personal credit alone; for, aside from any other reason, it does not appear that the shareholder was "in good credit." This cannot be inferred from the mere fact that he was allowed a large overdraft; for it may be that this was allowed in view of the lien upon the stock. It may be that his credit was not good enough for so large an advance without taking into consideration the security upon the stock, and, unless it appeared that the advances were made on personal credit alone, or on some other security, without reference to the stock, there would be no waiver. See, generally, Bank v. Laird, 2 Wheat. 390.

2. The assignee of Bowman is not protected by the rule as to bona fide purchasers for value. Without considering the question as to the negotiability of certificates of stock, it is sufficient to say, in the first place, that, as against the bank, the plaintiff was not the assignee of the legal title. The Code provides that the transfer by indorsement and delivery of the certificate "is not valid, except between the parties, until the same is entered upon the books," etc. Civil Code, § 324. As against the bank, therefore, the assignee took a mere equity, which must yield to the superior equity of the defendant. Vansands v. Bank, 26 Conn. 153, 154; Taylor v. Weston, 20 Pac. Rep. 62; Stebbins v. Insurance Co., 3 Paige, 361; Bank v. Laird, 2 Wheat. 393; McCready v. Rumsey, 6 Duer, 582. In the next place, the condition in the certificate was sufficient to put the plaintiff upon inquiry. The case of Bank v. Bank, 63 Cal. 362, is not in conflict with this. There no condition was embodied in the certificate, and the by-law relied upon was not referred to therein or printed thereon. Nor is the plaintiff in any better position as to advances made after the transfer; for, according to the terms of the certificate, the indebtedness secured was that "of the person in whose name the stock stands on the books of the bank," and the plaintiff gave no notice of the transfer, but allowed his assignor to continue to draw the dividends and to act as owner. The equities of the bank were specially set up in the answer, and constitute an equitable defense to the action. The findings contain all the material facts. We therefore advise that the judgment and order be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to enter judgment for the defendant.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; GIBSON, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order are reversed, and cause remanded, with direction to the court below to enter judgment for the defendant.

GAGE et al. v. DOWNEY et al. (No. 12,377.)

In bank. On application for rehearing. For former opinion, see 19 Pac. Rep. 113.

Glassel, Smith & Patton and Henry T. Gage, for appellants. Levi Chase, Bicknell & White and O'Brien & Morrison, for respondents.

BEATTY, C. J. The rehearing is denied. The sentence "all the land set apart as a homestead to Warner and wife with other land is included in the patent to Warner" is stricken from the opinion. As to the defense of the statute of limitations, which it is claimed is found in favor of defendants, in our opinion, no adverse possession is found by the court in the finding referred to. The case in this respect is similar to Packard v. Johnson, 57 Cal. 182, where it was held that adverse possession was found, the court remarking as to the finding that, "while the facts found tended to prove adverse possession, yet the facts did not necessarily constitute adverse possession." It will be observed that the action was commenced against all the defendants, except the Merchants' Exchange Bank of San Francisco, within five years after the patent was issued, and so was in time. The statute of limitations did not then run against such defendants. As to the bank, as stated above, there is no finding of adverse possession by it.

APPEAL—REVERSAL.

Where, in a suit on a street assessment, the judge finds the assessment void for want of sufficient publication of "notice of intention," which conclusion and judgment are conceded by respondent to be erroneous, and there is no reason to suppose the evidence would be different on a second trial, the court on reversing the judgment will remand the case, with instructions to render judgment for plaintiff.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; NOBLE HAMILTON, Judge.

These were two suits by the Oakland Paving Company against Bagge and others to recover on street assessments. Judgments for defendants, and plaintiff appeals.

Henry Vrooman, J. C. Martin, and C. T. H. Palmer, for appellant. E. F. Preston, for respondents.

FOOTE, C. In both of the above-styled causes the questions involved are the same, and a decision as to one is conclusive as to the other. The appeals were taken by the plaintiff from judgments rendered in favor of the defendants, and are here upon the judgment roll alone. There was no motion for a new trial in the court below. Upon the first call of one of the cases, respondents, who had not then filed any points or authorities, offered to allow the judgment to be reversed, and the cause to be remanded for a new trial. To this appellant would not consent, and filed additional points and authorities, urging a reversal of the judgment, and that the court below be directed to enter a judgment in its favor on the findings. This is resisted by respondents, on points and authorities filed in one of the causes, urging that the judgment should be reversed and cause remanded for a new trial. The action was upon a street assessment. The court below, from the findings, drew the conclusion of law that the city council of Oakland never acquired jurisdiction to order the street work on which the assessment was made, because of the want of sufficient publication of "the notice of intention."

This conclusion and the judgment are conceded by the respondents to be wrong upon the findings. The charge of fraud set up in the answer was abandoned, as the findings show, and there seems to be no question as to the regularity and sufficiency of the other proceedings subsequent to the publication of the "notice of intention," as was found by the court below. There is no reason whatever to suppose that the evidence upon the question as to how the publication was made would be different on a retrial from what it was before. The causes in hand are very similar to that of Dyer v. Chase, 57 Cal. 284, where the court below found that the board of supervisors had not acquired jurisdiction to order the work, but it also found all the facts as giving jurisdiction to the board. The appellate court reversed the judgment, with directions to the court below to enter a judgment for the plaintiff upon the findings, as prayed for in the complaint. And this was done within the rule laid down by the appellate court in Schroeder v. Versicherungs Gesellschaft, 60 Cal. 467, citing and affirming Griffin v. Marquardt, 17 N. Y. 28, "that extreme caution ought to be exercised in refusing new trials where judgments are reversed. The discretion of the appellate court should be exercised in that direction only in cases where it is plain, either from the pleadings or from the nature of the controversy, that the party against whom the reversal is pronounced cannot prevail in the suit." We think, therefore, that the judgments should be reversed, and the causes remanded, with directions to the court below to render judgments for the plaintiffs upon the findings, as prayed for in the complaint.

We concur: HAYNE, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgments are reversed and the causes remanded, with directions to the court below to render judgments for the plaintiffs upon the findings, as prayed for in the complaint.

PEOPLE v. STEPHENS. (No. 20,492.)

LIBEL—CRIMINAL PROSECUTION—FORMER JEOPARDY.

Under Pen. Code Cal. § 687, providing that "no person can be subjected to a second prosecution for a public offense for which he has been prosecuted and convicted, or acquitted," an acquittal on an indictment for libel contained in a certain article, published at a certain time, in a certain paper, is a bar to a subsequent prosecution for libel contained in the same article, published at the same time, in the same paper, though the defamatory words alleged are not the same. MCFARLAND, J., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; H. K. S. O'MELVENY, Judge.

C. C. Stephens and G. Wiley Wells, for appellant. George A. Johnson, Atty. Gen., for the People.

SHARPSTEIN, J. Appellant was tried and convicted of libel, upon an information which alleged that he published of and concerning one Horace Bell that "it was a common report, at the time his wife went crazy, that it was because that, just subsequent to confinement, she detected him in flagrante delicto with a female negro servant." In addition to the plea of not guilty, the defendant pleaded once in jeopardy and former acquittal. On the trial the defendant offered to prove by competent evidence that he had been indicted, tried, and acquitted upon a charge of libel based upon the publication of the same article upon which the information in this case is based. To the introduction of such evidence the prosecution objected on the ground that it was incompetent, immaterial, and irrelevant. The objection was sustained, and the defendant excepted. The question presented by this exception is whether there may be as many prosecutions for libel maintained upon a single article, published in a single issue of a newspaper, as there are false and defamatory statements concerning a single individual in such article. So far as we know, this question has not heretofore arisen, or been passed upon by any court, in a case of libel. "No person shall be twice put in jeopardy for the same offense" is the language of the constitution. The Penal Code provides that "no person can be subjected to a second prosecution for a public offense for which he has once been prosecuted and convicted or acquitted." Pen. Code, § 687. The only question in this case is whether the second prosecution is for the same offense as the first. If so, it cannot be maintained. The first prosecution was for a libel contained in an article published by the defendant in a newspaper. The second prosecution is for a libel contained in the same article, and published in the same issue of the same newspaper as the first. The words alleged to be defamatory are not the same in both informations. If they were, the case would be a plain one. But the publication in both cases was one and the same act. "The act which is the essential element in the wrongs, slander, and libel is a wrongful publication of language." Townsh. Sland. & Lib. 121. The essential element of the offense was the same act in both cases. In Reg. v. Elrington, 9 Cox, Crim. Cas. 86, COCKBURN, C. J., said: "It is a fundamental rule of law that out of the same facts a series of charges shall not be preferred." Bishop says: "To give our constitutional provision the force evidently meant, and to render it effectual, 'the same offense' must be interpreted as equivalent to the same criminal act." 1 Bish. Crim. Law, § 1060. "The state cannot split up one crime, and prosecute it in parts. A prosecution for any part of a single crime bars any further prosecution based upon the whole or a part of the same crime." Jackson v. State, 14 Ind. 327. In State v. Lewis, 2 Hawks, 98, the first indictment was for the burglary accomplished by the actual commission of the larceny; and the conviction on it was for the larceny only. The second indictment was for the robbery, and it was held to be barred by the first. In State v. Cooper, 13 N. J. Law, 361, it was held that a defendant could not be convicted and punished for two distinct felonies growing out of the same, identical act, and when one is a necessary ingredient in the other, and the state has selected and prosecuted one to conviction. By the same act, and with the same intent, F. took a horse, wagon, and harness, the property of H. Two indictments were found against F. One for stealing the horse, the other for stealing the wagon and harness. On the trial for stealing the horse, F. pleaded not guilty, and was acquitted. This acquittal was held to be a good plea in bar against the indictment for stealing the wagon and harness. Fisher v. Com., 1 Bush. 211.

To an information charging the prisoner with having in his possession a forged bank-note or bill of the Troy Bank, with intention to alter and pass the same, and to defraud the said bank of Troy, he pleaded a former information filed against him for having in his possession a bank note of the Mechanics' Bank, with the intent to alter and pass the same, and to defraud said Mechanics' Bank. Upon which last information, the plea averred, trial had been had, the prisoner had been found guilty, and judgment thereon impended. To this plea there was a demurrer, and the court adjudged the plea sufficient. The court said, among other things, that the act of possessing the several notes was one and the same offense, as much as the act of stealing a number of articles at the same time and place, and the information might have specified each note which the prisoner had in his possession, as was done in the several cases cited in King v. Sutton, Cas. t. Hardw. 372. "Had that been done," said the court, "it would hardly be claimed that there could have been several punishments. The offense, then, is one and the same offense." State v. Benham, 7 Conn. 414. The whole matter published might have been set forth in the information, and, if it had been, no one would claim that there might have been several punishments, or that the acquittal on the trial of that information would not be a bar to a subsequent information for any defamatory matter contained in the article. The law does not permit a single individual act to be divided, so as to make out of it two distinct, indictable offenses. Drake v. State, 60 Ala. 43. Although, when a man has done a criminal act, the prosecutor may carve as large an offense out of the transaction as he can, yet he is not at liberty to cut but once. Here the essential ingredient of the offense was the publication of an article containing several alleged libels. There was but one criminal offense, and that cannot be split up and prosecuted in parts, without violating the rule of law "that a man shall not be twice vexed for one and the same cause." "There is," said PIERPOINT, C. J., in the case of State v. Smith, 43 Vt. 324, "considerable conflict in the authorities upon this subject, but we think the rule is now well established that, when one offense is a necessary element in and constitutes an essential part of another offense, and both are in fact but one transaction, a conviction or acquittal of one is a bar to the prosecution for the other." We think the court erred in not admitting the evidence offered to prove a former acquittal of the offense charged in the information in this case.

The other alleged errors are not, in our opinion, entitled to much consideration. The more serious of them are not well founded in fact. Under the circumstances, we do not feel called upon to discuss them seriatim. Judgment and order reversed.

We concur: BEATTY, C. J.; WORKS, J.; THORNTON, J.; PATERSON, J.

MCFARLAND, J. dissent. I do not think that appellant had any defense under the pleas of "once in jeopardy" and "former acquittal." If a man in one part of his newspaper says that a certain person is a thief, and, in another part, that he killed his mother, the two libels are just as distinct as are the crimes of larceny and matricide. Putting the two things under one head-line, or "article," makes no difference. If the two libels should appear in the same issue of the newspaper, there would be an identity of time of publication; but they would be distinct in every other respect. That identity of time would no more make the two libels one than would a unity of time alone make a joint tenancy at common law.

CURDY v. BERTON. (No. 11,949.)

WILLS—TRUSTS.

Testatrix gave by will all her money and property in France to one B., to be distributed "according to private instructions I give him." At the same time she verbally instructed B. to distribute the property among certain relations in France. B. carried out his instructions. Held, in a suit by an heir to whom nothing had been left to have it declared that B. held the property in trust for all the heirs, and for an accounting and distribution, that, though the laws of California require a will to be in writing, yet equity would charge the legatee with a constructive trust in favor of the beneficiaries intended by the testatrix, and B. properly distributed the property in accordance with the instructions given him which he at the time promised to fulfill.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JOHN HUNT, Judge.

Action by Frank Curdy against G. A. Berton, executor of Francis Berton, deceased, to declare a trust, and for an accounting. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals.

D. M. Delmas, for appellant. D. W. Douthitt and Smith, Wright & Pomeroy, for respondent.

MCFARLAND, J. Madeline Curdy died February 9, 1877, in Alameda county, Cal. She left a will duly executed, in which, after bequests to several persons, including the plaintiff herein, there occurs the following: "I give in trust to Francis Berton, now Swiss consul in San Francisco, all the moneys I possess in France, and principally my share of the Italian rentes deposited in the banking-house of Messrs. Hentsch, Lutscher & Co., of Paris, to be distributed according to the private instructions I give him." Berton was present when the will was made, and wrote it for the testatrix at her request; and at the time of the making of the will she verbally instructed him to distribute said property or its proceeds to certain relations and others in France, other than the plaintiff herein, and gave him an order for said property. The facts in proof show that he at least impliedly agreed to accept the trust. After her death, and before the commencement of this action, said Berton faithfully distributed said property in accordance with the said instructions of said testatrix. This action is brought by plaintiff, a brother of the deceased, and one of her heirs-at-law, to have it decreed that Berton held the legal title to said property in trust for the heirs of said deceased, for an accounting, and for the payment to him of his proportionate share of said property, with interest, profits, etc. Francis Berton died during the pendency of the action, and his executor, George A. Berton, was substituted as defendant. The court gave judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying a new trial.

Upon the main point in the case the position of appellant is, in brief, that, as the statute law of this state requires a will to be in writing, therefore, "where a testator devises property in trust to be applied to such uses as the testator has verbally specified to the devisee, the trust attempted to be created by parol fails, and the devisee takes the property in trust for the heirs of the testator." The contention of respondent is, in brief, that, independent of the statute of wills, where a testator bequeaths property in trust to a legatee without specifying in the will the purposes of the trust, and at the same time communicates those purposes to the legatee orally, or by unattested writings, and the legatee, either expressly or by silent acquiescence, promises to perform the trust, and the trust itself is not unlawful, there a court of equity will raise a constructive trust in favor of the beneficiaries intended by the testator, and will charge the legatee as a constructive trustee for them, upon the ground that the legatee will not be countenanced in perpetrating a fraud by encouraging the testator to make a bequest which would not otherwise have been made, and then refusing to execute his promise. We think that respondent's view of the law, as above stated, is correct. There are some cases which support the proposition of appellant, notably, the case of Olliffe v. Wells, 130 Mass. 221; but the weight of authority and the better reason are the other way.

Obviously, the clear intention of the testatrix, as expressed in the written will, was that the property in question should not go to plaintiff. He, however, says, in effect: "True, the property was not to come to me. It was given to Berton upon the understanding, between him and the testatrix, that it was to go to the benefit of certain other persons; but, as they cannot establish their rights as beneficiaries, according to the statute of wills, Berton must be held to be my trustee, against the intention of the testatrix. I stand upon what I claim to be the dry law." Evidently, in a doubtful case, no just impulse would move a court to lean towards a proposition involving such consequences; and, as the question is an open one in this state, we are at liberty to follow those authorities, and that line of reasoning which appear to us to be most in consonance with the true principles of equity and justice.

We find in the Case of O'Hara, 95 N. Y. 403, a very full statement of the considerations which, in our opinion ought to govern the decision of the case at bar. In that case the testatrix, by her will, practically disinherited her relations in favor of strangers, giving the bulk of her estate to three legatees, who were her lawyer, her doctor, and her priest. The will was attacked by the heirs, on the ground of want of testamentary capacity and undue influence. As there was considerable evidence to support these charges, the legatees finally, to establish some reasonable explanation of a diversion of the estate to strangers having influence from confidential relations, showed that they were not to have any beneficial interest in the estate, but were to devote it entirely to certain charitable uses, according to instructions given them by the testatrix at the time the will was made. It appeared, however, that these charitable uses were in direct violation of the statute law of the state. The heirs at law then began an action in equity to establish a trust, which, failing as to the intended beneficiaries on account of illegality, should result to them. The legatees then, although intending to carry out the wishes of the testatrix, stood upon their rights under the terms of the will, which upon its face gave them the property absolutely; denied that they had accepted any trust, or that any could be proven by extrinsic matter lying outside the will; and insisted that the property was theirs absolutely. The question thus presented was, in substance, the one presented here. The only difference is that in the O'Hara Case the instructions were in writing, while in the case at bar they were oral. But neither in the argument of counsel, nor in the opinion of the court, was there any distinction made between written and oral instructions or promises. The principles announced applied equally to both. There was no claim that the letter of instructions came within the rule that an extraneous paper may be incorporated into a validly executed will by a direct reference to it in the will itself. There was no reference whatever in the will to the letter. The court in the O'Hara Case, after stating that "the proof is uncontradicted that the testatrix made the residuary devise and bequest in its absolute and unconditional form in reliance upon a promise of the legatees to apply the fund faithfully and honorably to the charitable uses dictated in the letter of instructions," proceeds to discuss the question whether or not one of the legatees, McCue, expressly promised to accept the trust. After reviewing the evidence (which was somewhat contradictory) on that point, the court says; "Where, in such case, the legatee, even by silent acquiescence, encourages the testatrix to make a bequest to him, to be applied by him to the benefit of others, it has all the force and effect of an express promise. Wallgrave v. Tebbs, 2 Kay & J. 321; Schultz' Appeal, 80 Pa. St. 405. If he does not mean to act in accord with the declared expectation which underlies and induces the devise, he is bound to say so, for his silent acquiescence is otherwise a fraud. Russell v. Jackson, 10 Hare, 204." The court then proceeds to state the principles which should determine the main question under discussion, as follows: "If, therefore, in her letter of instruction the testatrix had named some certain and definite beneficiary, capable of taking the provision intended, the law would fasten upon the legatee a trust for such beneficiary, and enforce it, if needed, on the ground of fraud. Equity acts, in such case, not because of a trust declared by the testator, but because of the fraud of the legatee. For him not to carry out the promise by which alone he procured the devise and bequest is to perpetrate a fraud upon the devisor, which equity will not endure. The authorities on this point are numerous." (Here follows a long list of cases.) "The circumstances in these cases were varied and sometimes peculiar, but all of them either recognize or enforce the general doctrine. It has been twice applied in our own state. Brown v. Lynch, 1 Paige, 147; Williams v. Fitch, 18 N. Y. 546. In the last of these cases the making of a bequest to the plaintiff was prevented by an agreement of the father, who was next of kin, to hold in trust for the plaintiff; and the English cases were cited with approval, and the trust enforced. All along the line of discussion it was steadily claimed that a plain and unambiguous devise in a will could not be modified or cut down by extrinsic matter lying in parol, or unattested papers, and that the statute of frauds and that of wills excluded the evidence; and all along the line it was steadily answered that the devise was untouched; that it was not at all modified; that the property passed under it, but the law dealt with the holder for his fraud, and out of the facts raised a trust ex maleficio, instead of resting upon one as created by the testator. The character of the fraud which justifies the equitable interference is well described in Glass v. Hulbert, 102 Mass. 40. It was said to consist 'in the attempt to take advantage of that which has been done in performance or upon the faith of the agreement, while repudiating its obligation under cover of the statute.'" The other parts of the opinion discuss the question whether, as the charitable uses could not be enforced, because forbidden by the statute, the legatees could be held as trustees for the heirs, but that question does not arise in the case at bar.

We have thus referred at length to the O'Hara Case because it contains a lucid statement of the principles which apply to the case at bar, and for the additional reason that in the opinion of the court and the briefs of counsel nearly all the authorities bearing upon the question are cited. We also refer especially to the case of Williams v. Vreeland, 32 N. J. Eq. 135, which declares the doctrine above stated; and in the notes to which are collated extracts from about 40 different cases, all of which are confirmatory of said doctrine. See, also, Hooker v. Axford, 33 Mich. 453; In re Fleetwood, L. R. 15 Ch. Div. 594; In re Boyes, L. R. 26 Ch. Div. 531; and Riordan v. Banon, 10 Ir. Eq. 469. The cases cited will show that it is immaterial whether the instructions given by a testator are oral or in writing. Indeed, in the opinion of the court in the O'Hara Case, (above quoted,) where the phrase "lying in parol, or unattested papers" is employed, the word "parol" is evidently used in its usual meaning, as synonymous with "verbal" or "oral," and not in its broader meaning of "not under seal." The California cases of De Laurencel v. De Boom, 48 Cal. 581; Estate of Shillaber, 74 Cal. 144, 15 Pac. Rep. 453; and Estate of Brooks, 54 Cal. 475,—while in harmony with the principles above stated,—are not directly to the point involved in the case at bar. Our conclusion is that the court below correctly decided that Francis Berton, deceased, properly distributed the property in France, in accordance with the instructions given him by the testatrix when the will was made, and which instructions he, at that time, agreed to carry out. Of course, the case must be distinguished from one where a testator, intending to give certain property directly to a certain person, for that person's sole benefit, fails to designate in the will either the property or the person. In such a case no question of trust could arise. These views make it unnecessary to determine the other two points made by respondent: (1) That the order for the property in France, given by the testatrix to Berton at the time the will was made, constituted a transfer of the property in præsenti; and (2) that the action was barred by the statute of limitations. The judgment and order are affirmed.

WALLACE v. MAPLES et ux. (No. 12,896.)

SET-OFF—VENDOR AND VENDEE—EJECTMENT.

1. Plaintiff agreed to convey certain land on payment to her of certain sums annually, as rent, and the taxes and assessments, and on the breaking and sowing of a portion of the land, and the payment of a gross sum at the end of the term. It was conceded in ejectment for the land that defendants had failed to pay the water assessments. Held, that it was no excuse for such failure that the water company was indebted to one of defendants, such claim being no set-off to the assessment against plaintiff.

2. The tender of all that was due, and payment into court, would not avail where defendants failed to break and sow the land, as required by the contract.

3. Evidence of what defendants had instructed their men to do if the weather changed, when the land, being dry, was not in condition to be plowed, was incompetent.

4. A question to defendants as to whether they had performed all the conditions of the contract was properly excluded, as calling for a conclusion.

5. The fact that defendants had made improvements on the land would not defeat recovery in ejectment.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Tulare county; W. W CROSS, Judge.

A. B. Hunt and P. D. Wiggington, for appellants. A. N. Drown and Oregon Sanders, for respondent

WORKS, J. This is an action in ejectment. The defendants answered, denying the allegations of the complaint; and, by way of counter-claim, set up an equitable title to the land in controversy. The answer discloses about this state of facts: The respondent was the owner of five separate tracts of land. She leased four of these tracts to the appellant T. W. Maples for the term of four years, in consideration of which he agreed, in the contract of leasing, that he would sow certain named quantities of the land in certain designated crops, and pay certain assessments that were expected to be made against the respondent by certain water companies for water used on the land, and pay the state and county taxes. At the same time, the respondent executed to both of the appellants, who are husband and wife, an agreement to convey to the wife the other tract of land, above mentioned, on certain conditions to be performed. It was stipulated in said last-named contract: "Provided, always, that said parties of the second part shall and do yearly, on or before the last day of each year of said period, pay to said party of the first part the sum of $584, lawful money of the United States of America, and pay and discharge, as the same becomes due and payable, all state, county, and school-district taxes that may be levied or assessed upon said land during the period they occupy the same under this agreement; and provided, also, that the said T. W. Maples, one of said second parties hereto, shall, at all times, well and truly perform all the stipulations, promises, and agreements on his part contained in that certain written farming contract bearing even date with these presents, wherein the party of the first part hereto is the party of the first part, and said T. W. Maples is the party of the second part, and not otherwise." And upon said conditions being complied with, and the sum of $5,840 paid, the respondent bound herself that she would on the 1st day of October, 1888, convey the property to the wife by a good and sufficient deed. The appellants took possession of this last-named tract of land under said agreement to convey, and this action is to recover the possession thereof. The appellants alleged in their counter-claim that they had fully complied with the terms of the said contract on their part. Whether they had or not was the question litigated in the case. It was found against them by the court below. A new trial was denied, and they appeal. The main contention of the appellants is that the findings of the court, that the appellants had not complied with the terms of the "farming contract," as it is termed, in that the land was not cultivated as provided for, and the assessments for water and the taxes were not paid, are not sustained by the evidence. There was evidence sufficient to warrant the court in finding that the appellant T. W. Maples failed, without sufficient excuse, to break and sow a large part of the ground. It is conceded that the water assessments were not all paid. It appears that the appellant paid the greater part of the assessments, and he seeks to avoid the effect of a failure to pay the balance by showing that the water company was at the time indebted to him in a sum sufficient to make up the amount. But, conceding this, it furnished no excuse for a failure to pay an assessment which was against the respondent, not him, and against which his claim was not an offset. He should have paid the assessment and looked to the companies for the amount due him from them. As it was conceded that the respondent was the owner of the legal title to the property, the appellants were bound, in order to prevent a recovery, to make out a complete equitable title, and the right to possession thereunder. Blum v. Robertson, 24 Cal. 141; Love v. Watkins, 40 Cal. 565; Willis v. Wozencraft, 22 Cal. 615. This they failed to do.

It is urged that, as to the failure to make the payments referred to, time was not of the essence of the contract, and that, as it appears that the money was tendered soon after, and was tendered and paid into court, with the answer, this was sufficient. But, if this be conceded, it cannot aid the appellants' case, as the failure to comply with the contract in respect to the cultivation of the land could not be thus remedied, and such failure was sufficient to defeat their equity. There was evidence on the part of the appellants tending to show that a part of the land was not broken because of the extreme dry weather. The appellant T. W. Maples was asked this question in that connection: "What were your instructions, provided the rains should come, as to planting that land after that?" This was objected to, and the objection was sustained. We see no error in this ruling. The appellant was allowed to show that the season was a very dry one, as a reason for his having failed to plow the ground. What his instructions to his men were, in case the weather should change, was immaterial. The court also sustained an objection to this question: "State whether or not you have performed all the conditions and covenants mentioned in Exhibit 2." The ruling was right. The question called for a conclusion. It was asking the witness to decide a question that was for the court alone to determine from the facts proved. The appellant also offered to prove that the respondent had, before and after the making of the agreements above mentioned, verbally promised to let him have money to carry out the farming contract, and the evidence was excluded. There was no error in this ruling. The promise was not a part of the contract in controversy, nor did it appear to have been made upon any consideration. Therefore evidence to prove it was immaterial and irrelevant. There is objection made to a ruling of the court sustaining an objection to a question to the appellant, whether he did certain work "with regard to building ditches or conveying water upon the land," but the transcript does not show any such ruling by the court. It is contended that certain other findings of the court were not sustained by the evidence, but we think there was evidence to support them. Error is assigned on the ruling of the court against the right of the appellant to prove the indebtedness of the water companies to him, as an excuse for the failure to pay the balance of the assessments. For the reasons above stated, we think the ruling was correct. The fact that the appellants had sowed alfalfa and planted fruit trees on the land could not defeat a recovery in this action, it appearing that they had failed to make good their equitable title by a performance of their part of the contract. Willis v. Wozencraft, 22 Cal. 613, relied upon by the appellants, is not to the contrary, as in that case it was not claimed that the defendant had failed in any respect to comply with his contract, nor was the question of improvements involved in the case. Certain special issues were submitted to a jury, and answered in favor of the appellants. The court disregarded these findings, and rendered findings of its own in favor of the respondent. The legal title of the respondent having been admitted, the matter to be tried was purely equitable, and, being so, the findings of the jury were not binding on the court. Freeman v. Stephenson, 63 Cal. 499; Sweetser v. Dobbins, 65 Cal. 529, 4 Pac. Rep. 540. We think there was evidence sufficient to sustain the action of the court in disregarding the findings of the jury and rendering findings in favor of the respondent. Judgment and order affirmed.

McDONALD v. HANLON. (No. 11,832.)

UNLAWFUL DETAINER.

1. Civil Code Cal. § 821, provides that one to whom real property has been transferred or devised on which rent is reserved, or to whom such rent is transferred on default, shall be entitled to the same remedies as his grantor and devisor. Defendant was in possession of land under one G., the owner in fee, as tenant from month to month. G. rented to plaintiff in præsenti for five years, who never went into possession, but raised the rent, and notified defendant, who neither attorned to plaintiff nor paid the rent. Held, that plaintiff was a "successor in estate" of the landlord, and could sue in unlawful detainer, under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1161, subd. 1.

2. The lease being in præsenti, it was immaterial that plaintiff did not enter into possession.

3. Under Civil Code Cal. § 1111, providing that grants of rents are good without attornment, none was necessary by defendant.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. F. SULLIVAN, Judge.

Joseph Kirk, for appellant. Thomas E. Curran and S. B. McKee, Jr., for respondent.

HAYNE, C. Action of unlawful detainer. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. The defendant was in possession of the property as tenant from month to month under one Gallagher, who was the owner in fee. In this condition of affairs Gallagher made a lease in præsenti to the plaintiff for five years. The defendant did not attorn to the plaintiff, and the latter never entered into possession, but gave notice to defendant raising his rent, and, no rent having been paid, gave the three-days notice, and commenced the present action to have defendant removed from possession, and for the increased rent. No objection is made to the sufficiency of the notices. The sole point relied on to reverse the judgment is that the plaintiff is not the "successor in estate" of the landlord, within the meaning of subdivision 1, § 1161, Code Civil Proc.; and that if the plaintiff has any right he cannot resort to this kind of proceeding, but must pursue his ordinary remedies. We do not think that the point is well taken. A lease or estate for years is an estate in real property. Civil Code, § 761. And it is expressly provided that "a person to whom real property is transferred or devised, upon which rent has been reserved, or to whom any such rent is transferred, is entitled to the same remedies for the recovery of rent, for non-performance of any of the terms of the lease, or for waste or cause of forfeiture, as his grantor or devisor might have had." Id. § 821. No attornment by the defendant was necessary, (Id. § 1111,)[1] and, inasmuch as the lease to plaintiff was one in præsenti, the fact that he did not enter into possession is immaterial, (Potter v. Mercer, 53 Cal. 672.) We therefore advise that the judgment be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is affirmed.

HOFFMANN v. SUPERIOR COURT. (No. 20,479.)

WRIT OF REVIEW—RECORD.

Where the affidavits on which a petition for review is based state facts different from those in the record, the latter will prevail, and the affidavits will not be received to contradict, add to, or amend, the same, which can be done only by an application to the court below to correct the record.

In bank. Application for writ of review to the superior court, city and county of San Francisco; EUGENE R. GARBER, Judge.

J. B. Southard and N. S. Wirt, for petitioner. J. D. Page, Dist. Atty., for respondent.

PATERSON, J. The petitioner was convicted of a misdemeanor in the police judge's court of the city and county of San Francisco, and appealed to the superior court. The record shows that on March 10th the judgment appealed from was affirmed by the superior court, and that on March 15th, for good cause shown, the remittitur which had been issued in the case was recalled, and by stipulation in open court, on the part of the people by the district attorney, and on the part of defendant by her attorney, B. F. Napthaly, Esq., the cause was again submitted to the court for decision upon the statement on appeal, both parties expressly waiving a jury trial, and consenting that the cause might be tried by the court; that on the same day the defendant was tried by the court and found guilty as charged; that a motion for a new trial was made on various grounds, among others because the trial was had in the absence of defendant and of counsel employed by her; that on June 9th a motion for a new trial was denied, and on June 11th the court sentenced petitioner to pay a fine of $250, with the usual statutory alternative. The petitioner bases her application for a writ of review upon an affidavit in which she claims that the superior court granted a new trial on the 7th day of March, and that on the following day her counsel demanded a jury trial, which was refused; that on the 10th day of March, at the opening of court, her counsel appeared and again demanded a jury; that the court again refused the demand for a jury, and, against the objection and exception of counsel, immediately vacated and annulled the order granting a new trial, made on March 7th, and affirmed the judgment of the police court without allowing petitioner an opportunity to produce her witnesses. She claims, therefore, that all orders subsequent to the order alleged to have been made on the 7th of March are void, and that she is entitled to a new trial,—a jury trial.

It is sufficient to say that the record sent to us, and certified by the clerk, shows an entirely different state of facts from that set forth in the affidavits. We cannot receive the affidavits to contradict, add to, or amend, the record; for the latter imports absolute verity. If the minutes do not correctly show the proceedings had in the court below, an application should be made in that court to correct the same. It appears from the record that the petitioner had the benefit of a new trial after the judgment was affirmed. She certainly cannot complain of this. It further appears that she was represented by counsel, who stipulated with the district attorney that the case might be tried by the court without a jury. Here, again, the record is conclusive. Whether Napthaly was her attorney, authorized to represent her in that case, is not open to inquiry here. Nevertheless it appears that that question was raised on a motion for a new trial, and the order denying a new trial is, in effect, an adjudication that the record which recites that she appeared by her attorney is correct. The application for a writ of review is denied.

STONE v. McCANN, Judge. (No. 13,294.)

HOMESTEAD—APPRAISEMENT.

Petitioner, a judgment creditor, applied to the court for the appointment of appraisers to value land claimed as homestead, giving the notice, etc., required under Civil Code Cal. §§ 1245-1254. The court gave the homestead claimant five days to answer the petition. Held, in an application for mandamus to compel the court to proceed to a hearing forthwith, that, the Code making no provision for an answer, the five days' delay would be treated as a reasonable continuance to allow claimant to prepare for a hearing, and the writ would be denied.

In bank. Application for mandamus to compel F. J. McCann, judge of the superior court, Santa Cruz county, to proceed to the hearing of a petition by Frank M. Stone for the appointment in the matter of a claim of homestead.

Frank M. Stone, pro se.

PATERSON, J. The petitioner alleges that he recovered judgment against one Card in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, and procured an execution thereon to be levied by the sheriff of Santa Cruz county upon certain real estate situated in said county, upon which the wife of said Card had filed a claim of homestead; that, thereafter, he filed with the clerk of the superior court of the county of Santa Cruz a petition duly verified, setting forth the facts above stated, and the further fact that the homestead claim by Mrs. Card exceeds in value the sum of $5,000, and praying for the appointment of appraisers to appraise the value of the property and determine whether or not the land clained as a homestead could be divided without material injury; that due notice was given the homestead claimant of the filing of said petition, and the time of hearing thereon; that, on the day appointed for the hearing, the court allowed the homestead claimant five days in which to answer the petition, and refused to hear any testimony until such answer was filed. Upon these facts, and the provisions of sections 1245-1254 of the Civil Code, petitioner asks for a writ of mandate commanding the respondent to immediately proceed to a hearing of the petition for the appointment of appraisers. Under the provisions of the Civil Code for the appraisement of a homestead, no demurrer or answer to the petition is authorized. If the petition sets forth the facts required by the provisions of section 1246, and a copy thereof, with notice of the time and place of the hearing, has been served upon the homestead claimant at least two days before the hearing, it is the duty of the judge, upon proof thereof, to appoint three disinterested residents of the county to appraise the value of the homestead. We do not perceive, therefore, the object of the court in allowing time to answer the petition. In such cases, if the petition does not state the facts required by the statute, the court should refuse to entertain it; but if it does state the requisite facts, no plea should be allowed. The court should proceed as directed by the statute. The court and counsel for the homestead claimant seem to have proceeded upon the theory that an issue of fact might be framed and tried as in an action at law. This would lead to delays not contemplated by the statute—findings, motion for new trial, etc. No such procedure is authorized by the Code. Of course, the homestead claimant is entitled to a hearing; that is the object of the statute in requiring a notice; but no pleadings on the part of the claimant are necessary. If there is a judgment valid on its face, and the court finds that the execution has been levied on a homestead which appears to be of a greater value than $5,000, he cannot be injured until the court acts upon the report of the appraisers. When that report is filed, a time should be fixed for the hearing, due notice thereof given to the claimant, and the questions whether the homestead exceeds in value the sum of $5,000, and whether it can be divided without material injury, should be determined upon the evidence produced by the parties. These two questions are the only ones involved in the inquiry. They are the issues, and the only issues, and they are provided for by statute. No answer is necessary to raise them. They are the same in all cases under the provisions of the statute. Treating the order of the court allowing five days to answer as a mere continuance of the hearing, however,—and so it may be considered,—the writ herein prayed for should not be issued. The court was not compelled to hear the application of the petitioner immediately. The claimant was entitled to a hearing as well as the petitioner, and the court was clothed with the discretion to allow a reasonable time in which to prepare for the hearing. Five days was not an unreasonable delay. Furthermore, the time granted —the five days' time in which to answer— has expired. We must presume that the court will now, unless there be reason for further delay, proceed to a hearing. The writ, therefore, should not issue. We place our refusal to issue the writ, prayed for, upon the ground that the court did not abuse its discretion in continuing the hearing for five days, and regard the order allowing an answer to be filed as of no consequence. Application for the writ denied.

BANK OF BRITISH NORTH AMERICA v. CAHN. (No. 11,625.)

BANKS AND BANKING—STATUTES—REPEAL BY IMPLICATION.

Act. Cal. April 1, 1876, provided that each banking company should file with the recorder of the county wherein its principal office was, certain sworn statements, showing the amount of capital employed by it, and the condition of its assets and liabilities, which statements should be published semi-annually in a local newspaper. Any bank failing to comply with these provisions was debarred from suing in any court of the state. Acts 1877-78, p. 740, created a board of bank commissioners, whose office was to be at San Francisco, and whose duty it was to investigate and report upon violations of the banking law. All banks were required to report to them semi-annually upon the state of their business, and these statements were to be preserved and kept for inspection. No mention was made of filing statements in the recorder's office, or of publishing them in newspapers. All inconsistent acts were repealed. Held, that there was no inconsistency in the acts, and that the former was not repealed by the latter.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; F. W. LAWLER, Judge.

Action by the Bank of British North America against Israel Cahn, a stockholder of the Pacific Jute Manufacturing Company, to recover money loaned by plaintiff to the last-named corporation. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals.

Sidney V. Smith, for appellant. Jarboe, Harrison & Goodfellow, for respondent.

FOOTE, C. The plaintiff, a banking corporation, loaned a large sum of money to another corporation, in which the defendant was a stockholder. A portion of that sum remaining unpaid, the plaintiff brought this action to recover from the defendant, as a stockholder in the corporation which had borrowed the money, his proportionate share of the indebtedness. An answer was filed, alleging, by way of defense, that the plaintiff had not complied with the provisions of an act of the legislature of the state of California, approved April 1, 1876, entitled "An act concerning corporations and persons engaged in the business of banking." The delinquency of the plaintiff being stated to consist in its failure "to publish in a newspaper, or any newspaper, or to file in the recorder's office of the city and county of San Francisco, or in the office of any recorder, a sworn statement, or any statement, of the amount of capital actually paid into said corporation, or into such banking business," and that at all those times the plaintiff had further failed to so publish or file for record "a sworn statement, or any statement, of the actual condition and value of its assets and liabilities, or where said assets are situated." The plaintiff demurred to the answer as not showing facts sufficient to constitute a defense. The demurrer was overruled, and a trial had by the court without a jury. The findings of fact are to the effect that all the allegations of the complaint and answer are true. The conclusion of law is that defendant is entitled to judgment in his favor. From the judgment made and entered in the premises this appeal is taken.

The appellant contends for a reversal of the judgment on the ground that the act of April 1, 1876, with which the plaintiff did not confessedly comply, and by section 3 of which it was debarred from the right to maintain its action, is repealed by the act creating a board of bank commissioners, (St. 1877-78, p. 740,) the point made on this contention being that "when a later statute covers the whole ground of a former one, the latter repeals the former." In Railway Co. v. U. S., 127 U. S. 409, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1194, Mr. Justice FIELD says: "When there are two acts or provisions of law relating to the same subject, effect is to be given to both, if that be practicable. If the two are repugnant, the latter will operate as a repeal of the former to the extent of the repugnancy; but the second act will not operate as such repeal merely because it may repeat some of the provisions of the first one, and omit others, or add new provisions. In such cases the later act will operate as a repeal only where it plainly appears that it was intended as a substitute for the first act. As Mr. Justice STORY says, it 'may be merely affirmative, or cumulative, or auxiliary.' Wood v. U. S., 16 Pet. 342-363." The legislature, in passing the later act, evidently had the question of repeal under consideration, and gave expression to the extent of its intention in that regard, in section 21 of the act, which shows the repeal of the former acts, only to be "in so far as they are inconsistent" with the provisions of the later act. The provision for publication in each particular country, provided for in the act of 1876, is not inconsistent with any of the provisions of the "act creating a board of bank commissioners," etc., of March 30, 1878. There is nothing in section 9 of the act last passed which is inconsistent with the provisions of section 1 of the act of 1876, in reference to filing in the recorder's office of the county where the principal office of the corporation may be situated, a sworn statement of the amount of capital actually paid into such corporation, and the publication of the same in January and July in at least one newspaper published in the county, etc. Nor are the provisions of section 2 of the same act, requiring publication in a newspaper and filing in the recorder's office a "sworn statement of the actual condition and value of the assets and liabilities," and where situated, of the "corporation" or "persons doing a banking business in this state," repealed by section 9 of the act of 1878, which requires a report twice in each year, in January and July, to be made to the "bank commissioners." Nor is section 3 of the act of 1876, which denies to such corporations or persons as shall fail to comply with the provisions of the act the right to "maintain any action or proceeding in any court of this state" until they shall have filed the statements provided for and otherwise complied with the act, inconsistent with any of the provisions of the latter act. The last act is evidently not a substitute for the first act, the main purpose of which was to afford information to all concerned in the immediate locality especially of the condition and standing of banking corporations and persons engaged in such business. The later act provides a supervision of all "banks, saving banks, savings and loan societies, or other society, association, company, or institution," etc., by the state, through a board of bank commissioners. It requires, among other things, thorough investigations into the affairs of banks, banking corporations, etc., by officers appointed for that purpose. If the commissioners, upon examination, ascertain that a bank is violating any of the provisions of section 11 of the later act, they shall communicate with the attorney general, and have the remedies applied which the section, supra, authorizes. The report and statements to be made by such corporations or associations are to be made to the bank commissioners, for their information, that they may the better be enabled to perform the functions and duties appertaining to their office, and the more effectually protect the interests of those dealing with such institutions. The first act, as we have before seen, was not so broad in its nature. It was for the benefit mainly of those locally interested, by bringing the necessary information to their immediate attention and knowledge, by local publication and recording. The provision in the former statute, relating to filing statements in the recorder's office, and publishing the same in a newspaper published in the county where the principal office of the corporation is situated, etc., is not to be found in the later statute, nor is any mention made of it. By section 1 of the later act the office of the commissioners with whom the statements are to be filed is in San Francisco, and by section 15 of the same act such statements are to be kept on file there for public inspection. This certainly is no substitute for the recording of such statements in the recorder's office of the proper county, as contained in the act first passed. The first act provides for local publication, also; the second act does not, and provides no substitute for such publication. Our conclusion is that there is no repeal of the first act by the second in the respects contended for, and we advise that the judgment be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C., GIBSON, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is affirmed.

LORD v. DUNSTER. (No. 13,084.)

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—CONSTRUCTION—ELECTIONS—CONTESTS—RES ADJUDICATA.

1. Before the adoption of Const. Cal. 1879, art. 6, § 4, which gives the supreme court jurisdiction of appeals in a number of cases at law, and other cases, special proceedings not being therein enumerated, the same provisions were substantially contained in the constitution of 1863. Under this constitution it was repeatedly held that an appeal to the supreme court would lie from judgments in special proceedings, and after the adoption of the constitution of 1879 these rulings were frequently followed. Code Civil Proc. § 1126, allows an appeal from the superior court to the supreme court in election contests. Held, in view of the length of time during which the courts and legislature had construed the constitution as allowing appeals from judgments in special proceedings, that the section mentioned was constitutional.

2. In a contested election for sheriff, defendant had been certified as elected by a majority of 58 votes. The recount made under direction of the court showed no material change, except in one precinct, where it showed a difference, in favor of contestant, of 132 votes out of a total vote of 315. This result was announced on Saturday, and on Monday, before a decision was made, defendant moved a continuance, and presented the affidavit of the three commissioners of election at that precinct, stating that steps were being taken to discover the authorship of the fraud. Accompanying it was a certificate signed by more men, who claimed to have voted for defendant, than the recount showed him to have received votes; and the affiants alleged that they could procure many more signatures, and the personal attendance of these voters, all whom had stated that they would swear that they voted for defendant. It was impossible to have procured the attendance of these witnesses without an adjournment of the case. Held, that the court erred in refusing an adjournment.

3. Such evidence is competent on the issue as to whether the officers conducting the election were guilty of fraud; as the fact that the ballots were changed after they were cast tended to disprove the inference of fraud, arising from the result of the recount.

4. A dismissal of a prior contest, before citation was served on defendant, is not a retraxit, and is no bar to a subsequent contest.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Nevada county; J. M. WALLING, Judge.

Contest by George Lord for the office of sheriff of Nevada county, to which G. W. Dunster had been declared elected. Judgment for contestant, and defendant appeals.

Thomas S. Ford, Crittenden Thornton, and F. H. Merzbach, for appellant. Fred Searles and George L. Hughes, (H. L. Gear, of counsel,) for respondent.

PATERSON, J. Plaintiff and defendant were candidates for the office of sheriff of Nevada county at the general election held in November, 1888. The returns, as canvassed by the board of supervisors, showed that Dunster had received a majority of 80 votes, and a certificate of election was issued to him. This proceeding was commenced by plaintiff to contest the election and cancel the certificate of defendant on the ground that the judges of election in several precincts had, through negligence and malconduct, made incorrect returns, and had counted and tallied votes for Dunster which had been cast for Lord. A special session of the court was ordered for December 27, 1888, a citation was issued and served, and defendant answered, denying specifically the allegations of plaintiff's statement of contest, and pleading a former judgment in a proceeding commenced by plaintiff for the same relief and on the same grounds. The trial commenced on December 27th, was continued to Friday, December 28th, concluded on Saturday, December 29th, and taken under advisement until Monday, December 31st. Upon the convening of court on Monday morning a motion for continuance was made, which we shall consider further along. At the threshold of our consideration of the appeal, respondent makes an objection, challenging the jurisdiction of this court, and claiming that there is no warrant in the constitution for an appeal from the superior court on this or any other contested election case; that it is a "special proceeding," not included in the "cases at law" of which this court is given appellate jurisdiction by the constitution, and that the act of the legislature providing for an appeal in cases of this kind (section 1126, Code Civil Proc.) is void. He concedes that "the mere classing of a civil action under the head of special proceedings in the Code is not absolutely determinative of jurisdiction, * * * and that, unless it can be shown that an election contest is a special case in its essential nature as distinguished from any case at common law, or remedy known to its frame-work, objection to the jurisdiction of this court cannot be sustained." In support of his contention that it is a special statutory proceeding as distinguished from a "case at law," and particularly as distinguished from the common-law writ of quo warranto, he cites, among others, the following cases: Dickinson v. Van Horn, 9 Cal. 207; Saunders v Haynes, 13 Cal. 152; Dorsey v. Barry, 24 Cal. 449; Casgrave v. Howland, Id. 457; Norwood v. Kenfield, 34 Cal. 332; Keller v. Chapman, 34 Cal. 635; Houghton's Appeal, 42 Cal. 56; Bixler's Appeal, 59 Cal. 554.

It must be admitted that the decisions bearing upon the question what are special cases and proceedings are "incongruous mixtures of opinion." Thus, when the authority of the county court to hear and determine a case of this kind under the constitution of 1862 was challenged on the ground that it was a "case at law" within the meaning of article 6, § 6, the court decided that the proceeding was not according to the course of the common law, but gave new rights and remedies, and was a "special proceeding" over which the county court had jurisdiction, (Saunders v. Haynes, supra;) and this construction was followed through a long line of cases without dissent, and as long as the county court existed. When the jurisdiction of the supreme court was challenged on the ground that it was "a special proceeding," and not included in "cases in equity," "cases at law," or "cases arising in the probate court," to which the appellate jurisdiction of the supreme court was limited under the constitution of 1862, the court held, basing its conclusion largely upon the rule of construction, contemporanea exposito est fortissima in lege, that it was the intention of the people to give an appeal from judgments of the county court in such cases, and that the supreme court had jurisdiction. Knowles v. Yates, 31 Cal. 82. This case was followed in Day v. Jones, 31 Cal. 261, and approved in Railroad Co. v. Galgiani, 49 Cal. 140. So far as the appellate jurisdiction of this court in contested election cases is concerned, the law as laid down in Knowles v. Yates has stood unquestioned until now, with the exception of some criticisms upon it in one of the concurring opinions in Houghton's Appeal, 42 Cal. 56, although about 20 of such cases have been before it. When the constitution of 1879 was framed and adopted, decisions in 10 of such cases had followed Knowles v. Yates into the reports of this court, and in none of them was the question of jurisdiction raised or considered. Under these circumstances, and in view of the fact that there is nothing in the language of the constitution of 1879 making the original jurisdiction of the superior court final or conclusive to any extent greater than was that of the county court in such cases, or restricting the right of appeal to this court, we do not feel called upon to say whether the reasoning of the court in Knowles v. Yates is sound. It is sufficient to say that the conclusion therein reached has been sanctioned by long acquiescence on the part of the legislature and the courts. It has been decided that "a contemporaneous exposition, even of the constitution of the United States, practiced and acquiesced in for a period of years, fixes the construction." 1 Kent, Comm. 465, note; Packard v. Richardson, 17 Mass. 143; Curtis v. Leavitt, 15 N. Y. 217; People v. Fitch, 1 Cal. 523; Civil Code, § 3535. When the framers of the constitution employ terms which have received judicial interpretation, and have been put into practice under a former constitution, so as to receive a definite meaning and application, it is safe to give them the signification which has been sanctioned by such interpretation, unless it is apparent from the language used that a more general or restricted sense was intended. In determining the meaning of a constitutional provision it will be presumed that those who framed and adopted it were conversant with the interpretation which had been put upon it under the constitution from which it was copied, and this is the rule even as to provisions taken from the constitutions of other states,—the judicial construction placed upon them in the states from which they are taken will be followed by the courts in the state which adopts them. Daily v. Swope, 47 Miss. 367; End. Interp. St. § 507. Under the constitution of 1863 the supreme court had appellate jurisdiction "in all cases in equity; also in all cases in law which involve the title, etc.; also in all cases arising in the probate courts." The constitution of 1879 gives it appellate jurisdiction "in all cases in equity except such as arise in justices' courts; also in all cases at law which involve the title, etc., [same as in constitution of 1863;] also in cases of forcible entry and detainer, and in proceedings in insolvency, and in actions to prevent or abate a nuisance, and in all such probate matters as may be provided by law." These provisions, so far as they affect the question before us, are the same in both constitutions. There is certainly nothing in the language to indicate any intention of limiting or restricting the right of appeal to any less number of cases than the court had jurisdiction of under the former constitution. The fact that four classes of cases are specially named in the latter, and only one in the former is immaterial. It is not the enumeration of cases which determine whether they are "special proceedings," but the nature of the remedy and the relief afforded. Neither Houghton's Appeal nor Bixler's Appeal were contested election cases, and the exigencies of this case do not require us to approve or disapprove what was said therein. We conclude, therefore, that we have no right to decline to exercise jurisdiction of the appeal.

The court erred in denying the motion for a continuance made on the opening of court Monday morning, and before a decision was made in the case. At the conclusion of the recount under the direction of the court, it appeared that Lord had received 2,114 votes and Dunster 2,056 votes, giving Lord a majority of 58 votes. No material change was made by the recount except in Boston Ravine precinct. The official returns of the board of supervisors gave Lord 140 votes in this precinct and Dunster 175 votes, a majority of 35 votes for Dunster. The recount of this precinct in court gave Lord 206 votes and Dunster 109 votes, a majority for Lord of 97 votes. Here was a difference of 132 votes in one precinct. In support of his motion to reopen the case, and for a continuance, defendant filed an affidavit signed by Wiley, Morateur, and Mulroy, in which it was stated that they had acted as members of the election board of said precinct; that, since the adjournment of the case on Saturday, a meeting of the citizens of Boston Ravine precinct had been held for the purpose of ascertaining who had perpetrated the fraud; that the citizens of the precinct were greatly surprised by the result of the recount, and in the interests of public justice wished to ascertain who has committed the fraud; that affiants were authorized to get the signatures of all persons who would certify that they had voted for Dunster, and that 139 voters of the precinct had signed a certificate to the effect that they had voted for Dunster for the office of sheriff; that, if granted further time they could obtain many more signatures to the certificate, and the personal attendance of all persons who had signed the certificate, to testify that they had voted for Dunster, as they had been informed that they would be required to give evidence in court of the facts therein stated, and all had expressed a willingness to swear to the same. Attached to the affidavit was the certificate signed by 139 voters, in which they stated that they had voted for Dunster at the general election held November 6, 1888. If the facts stated in that affidavit were true, if, in fact, 139 electors in that precinct voted for Dunster, he received a majority of all the votes cast in the county, and was elected, because it was proved during the trial that, in the entire county outside of Boston Ravine precinct, Lord had received 1,908 votes, and Dunster 1,947 votes. The showing was so strong, we think the court abused its discretion in refusing a continuance. A postponement was requested only until Wednesday, January 2d. Tuesday being New Year's day, and a legal holiday, the postponement, if granted, would have been for one day only. It was made clear to the court that some one had committed a gross fraud. Either the officers of election had been guilty of a felony in conspiring together to defeat the will of the people, or a correct canvass of the votes had been falsified by a felonious tampering with the ballots which were returned to the county clerk. As stated in Minor v. Kidder, 43 Cal. 236: "It is the wholesome purpose of the statute to invite inquiry into the conduct of popular elections. Its aim is to secure that fair expression of the popular will in the selection of public officers, without which we can scarcely hope to maintain the integrity of the political system under which we live. * * * The investigation proposed is one in which the public at large are deeply concerned. It necessarily involves a question of broader import than the mere individual claim of a designated person to enjoy the honors and emoluments of the particular office brought directly in contest. * * * The public interests imperatively require that the ultimate determination of the contest should in every instance, if possible, reach the very right of the case." As in divorce cases, a judgment cannot be taken by default. Searcy v. Grow, 15 Cal. 117. It cannot be said that no diligence had been shown when it appeared that the affiants had obtained the signatures of 139 electors between the adjournment of court on Saturday afternoon and Monday morning at 10 o'clock. It would have been impossible for the defendant to have issued and served 139 subpœnas without asking for a postponement. The trial commenced on Thursday and ended on Saturday.

The contention of respondent that the testimony proposed was not within the issues is not well taken. The case was tried upon the theory that the issue included the question whether the ballots had been altered. Counsel for appellant stated during the trial that he desired a full investigation of the case. The fact that the evidence of a change in the ballots would tend to show that some one had committed a fraud does not destroy its admissibility to disprove plaintiff's charge that the officers had been guilty of malconduct. The ballots on their face show that plaintiff's allegation that the officers of election had been guilty of malconduct was true; that the votes actually cast for Lord had not been counted by them. Evidence that the ballots had been changed after the officers counted them was proper in rebuttal of plaintiff's evidence. Other objections made to the continuance are equally groundless.

The dismissal of the prior contest was made by plaintiff's attorney before the citation was served upon defendant, and before any appearance was made therein. It did not operate, therefore, as a retraxit, and is no bar to this proceeding. Davenport v. Turpin, 43 Cal. 597; McCreary v. Casey, 45 Cal. 128. The appellant makes other points against the validity of the judgment, but we find nothing in them calling for a reversal. For the error in refusing to grant a continuance, however, the judgment must be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial. It is so ordered.

ROAD OVERSEERS—ELIGIBILITY.

Defendant was a resident of the town of A., incorporated under act Cal. 1856, authorizing the trustees, among other things, to lay out and repair streets, etc., and levy taxes for payment thereof, but not compelling them so to do. Pol. Code, § 2641, provides for dividing counties into suitable road-districts. Section 4102 provides that no person shall be a district officer who is not an elector of the district. Act 1883, relating to highways, (section 2,) provides that no incorporated town in which improvements in the streets are done under any law relating to street work shall belong to a road-district. Held, in a suit to contest defendant's eligibility as road overseer in a district including the town of A., that the burden was on contestant to show that the town of A., being incorporated, did work on the streets under a law relating to street work, and was therefore improperly included in such district; and, not having done so, it would be assumed that the town was properly included, and respondent was an elector in the district, and eligible.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Contra Costa county; JOSEPH P. JONES, Judge.

Proceeding by A. C. Wristen to contest the election of Peter Donlan as road inspector. Wristen appeals from a judgment for defendant.

Chase & Chase, for appellant. G. W. Bowie and W. S. Tinning, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. C. An election for road overseer in road-district No. 1 of supervisor district No. 5, in Contra Costa county, was held on the 6th day of November, 1888. The votes were afterwards canvassed by the board of supervisors, and the respondent was declared duly elected to the office. This proceeding was commenced to contest the respondent's right to hold the office, on the ground that he was, at the time of the election, a resident of an incorporated town, and therefore not eligible. The court found that at the time of the election respondent was a resident of the town of Antioch; that the town was incorporated and was within the said road-district; that respondent was an elector of the district, and was duly elected road overseer thereof; that there was no evidence that the board of trustees of the town, if there were any, ever laid out or accepted any streets or collected any taxes or money, and expended the same on any streets within the incorporation; and, as conclusions of law, that respondent was eligible to the office, and was entitled to hold the same. Judgment was accordingly entered dismissing the proceeding, and from that judgment the appeal is prosecuted, and rests on the judgment roll.

It is admitted that the town of Antioch was incorporated in 1872, under the provisions of the act passed in 1856, "to provide for the incorporation of towns." St. 1856, p. 198. By this act the town trustees were clothed with power, under proper ordinances to be enacted by them, to lay out, alter, keep open, and repair the streets and alleys of the town, and to levy and collect taxes, licenses, and fines, and use the money for such purpose; but there is nothing in the act compelling them to lay out, open, or repair any streets, or to levy or collect any taxes. Section 4102 of the Political Code provides that "no person is eligible to a district or township office who is not of the age of twenty-one years, a citizen of the state, and an elector of the district or township in which the duties of the office are to be exercised or for which he is elected." Section 2 of the act passed in 1883, amending the chapter of the Political Code on highways, provides that "all laws concerning roads and highways in conflict with this act, and all laws applicable to particular counties of this state concerning roads and highways, are hereby repealed: * * * provided, further, that nothing herein contained shall be deemed to authorize the levy or collection of a road poll-tax, or property road-tax, within municipalities existing under the laws of this state, wherein work and improvements upon the streets is done by virtue of any law relating to street work and improvements within such municipality, nor shall any such incorporated city or towns be by the supervisors of the county included or embraced in any road-district by them established under this act." St. 1883, p. 20. And section 2641 of the Political Code provides that "the board of supervisors of the several counties shall divide their respective counties into suitable road-districts." In view of the foregoing statutory provisions, the question is, was the respondent rendered ineligible to the office of road overseer because he was a resident of the incorporated town of Antioch? It is clear that he was not eligible to the office unless he was an elector of the road-district. Could the town be included or embraced in the district? Under section 2 of the act of 1883, above cited, no incorporated city or town, "wherein work and improvements upon the streets is done by virtue of any law relating to street work and improvements within such municipality," could be included or embraced in a road-district. But this clearly does not forbid—on the contrary, by implication, it expressly permits—the board of supervisors, in dividing a county into road-districts, to include in them incorporated towns in which no work is done upon the streets by virtue of any law relating to street work. Now, if Antioch was of the class of towns which could not be so included, the burden was upon the contestant to show that fact. But this, as we have seen from the findings, he wholly failed to do. We must assume, therefore, in the absence of any showing to the contrary, that the town of Antioch was rightly included in and made a part of the road-district, and that respondent was an elector in the district, and was eligible to the office of road overseer. The judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: FOOTE, C.; GIBSON, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is affirmed.

TAYLOR et al. v. OPPERMAN. (No. 11,954.)

CONVEYANCES TO WIFE.

Certain land was conveyed to a husband and wife. The former executed a quitclaim deed of the same to his wife. The wife died intestate, leaving a minor child. The father then conveyed the land to a third party. Held, that the conveyance to the wife by the husband vested her with the entire title, and the child had an interest in the land, as an heir of her mother, which was not divested by the later deed of her father.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; F. W. LAWLER, Judge.

A. D. Splivalo, for appellant. J. C. Bates, for respondents.

BELCHER, C. C. The facts involved in this case are as follows: In February, 1858, the then owner of certain real property in the city of San Francisco conveyed the same to Patrick Fay and Anne Fay, his wife, for the expressed consideration of $1,250. In January, 1864, the husband executed to the wife a quitclaim deed of the same property, and the deed contained this clause: "To have and to hold to her sole use, all and singular, the above mentioned and described premises, together with the appurtenances, unto the said party of the second part, her heirs and assigns, forever." The consideration expressed in the deed, and acknowledged to have been received by the party of the first part from the party of the second part, was $500. The parties lived together on the premises from the time of their purchase, in 1858, until December, 1870, when the wife, Anne Fay, died intestate, leaving her surviving her husband and four children, of whom the plaintiff, Emily Taylor, then five years of age, was one. Five months later, in May, 1871, Patrick Fay conveyed the premises to Christian Opperman by a grant, bargain, and sale deed, which expressed a consideration of $2,200. There was never any administration upon the estate of Anne Fay. In September, 1885, the plaintiffs, Emily Taylor and her husband, commenced this action against Christian Opperman, who has since died, to recover an undivided one-sixth part of the property, with rents and profits. The complaint alleged that the said Emily acquired title to the demanded interest by descent from her mother, and was the owner, and entitled to the possession, thereof. The answer denied her ownership, and set up the statute of limitations. The court gave judgment according to the prayer of the complaint, from which, and from an order denying a new trial, the defendant has appealed.

No point is made for appellant on the statute of limitations, and it seems, therefore, to be conceded, as we think it must be, that the court properly found that the action was not barred.

It is claimed, and this is the only point made, that under our laws all property conveyed to husband or wife, after their marriage, is presumed to be community property, and that this is so whether the property be conveyed by one of the spouses to the other, or by a third party to one or both of them. And it is said that the property in question, on being conveyed to Patrick and Anne Fay, in 1858, became their community property, and that the subsequent deed from him to her, in the absence of proof that it was intended as a gift, or that the consideration therefor was paid by her out of money belonging to her separate estate, did not change the character of the property or affect it in any respect. Attention is also called to the fact that the deed was a quitclaim; but there is nothing in that. Quitclaim deeds are as effectual to pass whatever title the grantor has as any other deeds. Graff v. Middleton, 43 Cal. 341; Frey v. Clifford, 44 Cal. 343; Rego v. Van Pelt, 65 Cal. 254, 3 Pac. Rep. 867. If appellant is right in his contention as to the deed of January, 1864, then the making of the deed was a perfectly idle and useless ceremony. It is true, as claimed, that when a stranger conveys property to a husband or wife the property is presumed to be community property; but the question is, does the same presumption arise when the husband conveys to his wife? A very similar case to this was once before the supreme court of Texas, where the law in relation to the property rights of husband and wife is almost the same as ours. In that case two lots of land were conveyed to John Farrell and his wife, and were community property. Subsequently Farrell executed a deed for the lots to his wife. The deed expressed a consideration of $100, but no consideration was in fact paid. Afterwards the wife died, leaving one child, who was the plaintiff in the action; and after the wife's death the husband sold and deeded the lots to the defendant in the action. The action was brought to determine the plaintiff's title, and recover the lots. The court said: "It is not questioned that, under our law, the husband may make a gift or grant of property to his wife by conveyance to her directly, without the intervention of trustees. It has been so held in repeated decisions. * * * In the absence of any evidence of intention outside of the deed, it must be taken as evidencing the intention which upon its face it imports; that is, to convey to the wife the estate of the husband in the property. It must have been intended to have some operation upon the estate of the grantor, and that must be taken to have been to change the estate from community into separate property of the wife, in the absence of evidence of any other or different purpose in the making of the conveyance. To deny it that effect would be to render the deed wholly inoperative and void. The grantor could have made an effectual conveyance to a stranger of the whole estate, and it is not perceived that there is any legal impediment to his conveying to his wife his interest, thereby investing her with the whole estate. * * * There can be, in this case, no presumption, as in the case of a purchase from a stranger in the name of the wife, that funds of the community were employed in making the purchase, and therefore it is community property. But the conveyance being of community property of the parties between whom the conveyance is made, prima facie, the presumption must be that it was intended to change its character from community to the separate property of the wife. The subsequent sale of the property by the husband cannot be deemed sufficient to rebut this presumption." Story v. Marshall, 24 Tex. 305. And in Platt, Prop. Rights Mar. Wom. § 34, the law is thus stated: "The prima facie presumption arising from a deed of the husband to the wife of community real property is that it was intended to change its character from community property to the separate property of the wife, and that the deed is effectual against a subsequent purchaser." In Burkett v. Burkett, 20 Pac. Rep. 715, it was held by this court that a declaration of homestead by a husband on his separate property vests a joint title thereto in himself and wife, and a subsequent conveyance of the property by him to his wife is valid, and passes a complete title to the wife subject to the homestead.

We think the law correctly declared in the Texas case above cited, and that the same rule should be applied here. We therefore advise that the judgment and order appealed from be affirmed.

CASTRO v. BARRY. (No. 11,855.)

QUIETING TITLE—PLEADING.

1. Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 738, provides that an action may be brought by any person against another who claims an estate or interest in real property adverse to him for the purpose of determining such adverse claim. Sections 3412, 3413, Civil Code, provide for the bringing of an action to cancel instruments which may be deemed a cloud upon title making an exception in the case of instruments void on their face. Held, that the two actions are different in purpose, and that the former action may be brought to determine any adverse claim whatever, and the plaintiff need not set forth the nature of defendant's claim.

2. In an action to determine an adverse claim plaintiff alleged that defendant's claim was founded on a mistake in the description of a deed, the description calling for the course "down the said slough north 72° west," when the course should have been "north 12° west." Held, that such allegation merely showed that defendant's claim was based on a harmless error of description, as the wrong course was controlled by the direction, to go "down the said slough" to a specified point, and hence defendant could not contend that the complaint was really one to reform a deed.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Monterey county; JOHN K. ALEXANDER, Judge.

Wm. H. Webb, for appellant. Geil & Morehouse, for respondent.

HAYNE, C. The complaint in this case alleged in substance that the plaintiff was the owner of certain real property; that the defendant claimed an interest therein adverse to the plaintiff; that such claim was without right; and that the defendant had no right, title, or interest whatever in the property. There were other allegations, which will be noticed below. The prayer was that defendant be required to set forth the nature of his claim; that it be adjudged to be void; and that defendant be enjoined from asserting it. The trial court found the above allegations to be true. Judgment was entered for the plaintiff, and the defendant appeals.

It is contended for the appellant, in the first place, that "an action to quiet title, or to remove a cloud from title, will not lie where the facts alleged, if true, would not legally affect the plaintiff's title." But in this the learned counsel overlooks the distinction between actions to determine adverse claims, which are provided for by the Code of Civil Procedure, and which in this state are commonly referred to as "actions to quiet title," and suits to have an instrument canceled, or adjudged to be void, which are usually called "actions to remove a cloud." Suits to have an instrument canceled or adjudged to be void were quite common in the old chancery practice, and constituted one of the applications of the principle quia timet. 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 701. This suit is preserved by the Civil Code, which has the following provision on the subject: "Sec. 3412. A written instrument, in respect to which there is a reasonable apprehension that if left outstanding it may cause serious injury to a person against whom it is void or voidable, may, upon his application, be so adjudged, and ordered to be delivered up or canceled. Sec. 3413. An instrument, the invalidity of which is apparent upon its face, or upon the face of another instrument which is necessary to the use of the former in evidence, is not to be deemed capable of causing injury, within the provisions of the last section." In this kind of action, therefore, it is expressly provided by statute that if the instrument is void upon its face, or when construed with another instrument with which it is necessarily connected, the relief will not be granted. This provision is the embodiment in statutory form of an old and well-settled rule of equity, and, as a matter of course, in order to obtain the relief, it is necessary that the complaint should state a case within the rule. In the language of SANDERSON, J., in Society v. Ordway, 38 Cal. 681: "In an action to remove a cloud there can be no question but that the facts which show the apparent validity of the instrument which is said to constitute the cloud, and also the facts showing its invalidity, ought to be stated." Suits to determine adverse claims, such as exist in this state, were not known to the old chancery practice, but were provided for by statute. The provision of the Code of Civil Procedure is as follows: "Sec. 738. An action may be brought by any person against another who claims an estate or interest in real property adverse to him, for the purpose of determining such adverse claim." Compare section 254 of old practice act, (Laws 1851, pp. 92, 93.) The distinction between the two kinds of action is clear. They are different not merely in form, (for we have no forms of action in the old sense,) but in purpose. In the former case the proceeding is aimed at a particular instrument, or piece of evidence, which is dangerous to the plaintiff's rights, and which may be ordered to be destroyed in whosesoever hands it may happen to be; while in the latter the proceeding is for the purpose of stopping the mouth of a person who has asserted or is asserting a claim to the plaintiff's property. It is not aimed at a particular piece of evidence, but at the pretensions of an individual.

The statutory action to determine an adverse claim is an improvement upon the old bill of peace. The statute enlarges the class of cases in which equitable relief could formerly be sought in the quieting of title. It is not necessary, as formerly, that the plaintiff should first establish his right by an action at law. "He can immediately upon knowledge of the assertion of such claim require the nature and character of the adverse estate or interest to be produced, exposed, and judicially determined, and the question of title be thus forever quieted." Curtis v. Sutter, 15 Cal. 262, 263. And see Stark v. Starrs, 6 Wall. 409. Nor is it necessary that the adverse claim should be of any particular character. As said by BALDWIN, J., delivering the opinion in Head v. Fordyce, 17 Cal. 151, the statute "does not confine the remedy to the case of an adverse claimant setting up a legal title or even an equitable title; but the act intended to embrace every description of claim whereby the plaintiff might be deprived of the property, or its title clouded, or its value depreciated, or whereby the plaintiff might be incommoded or damnified by the assertion of an outstanding title already held or to grow out of the adverse pretention." See, also, Horn v. Jones, 28 Cal. 204; Joyce v. McAvoy, 31 Cal. 287, 288. And the rule may be even more broadly stated, viz., that the action may be maintained by the owner of property to determine any adverse claim whatever, for, if the defendant, by his answer, disclaims all interest whatever, judgment may, nevertheless, be entered against him, though in such case it must be without costs. Code Civil Proc. § 739. Compare Brooks v. Calderwood, 34 Cal. 566, and Scorpion Co. v. Marsano, 10 Nev. 380, 381. The plaintiff, therefore, is not required to set forth the nature of the defendant's claim. People v. Center, 66 Cal. 562, 5 Pac. Rep. 263, 6 Pac. Rep. 481; Scorpion Co. v. Marsano, 10 Nev. 380, 381; Railroad Co. v. Oyler, 60 Ind. 392. The defendant must set forth his claim if he has one, in view of which the complaint may in one aspect be said to be a bill for discovery. The pleading is very simple, and it is well settled that the allegations above mentioned are sufficient. Rough v. Simmons, 65 Cal. 227, 3 Pac. Rep. 804; Heeser v. Miller, 19 Pac. Rep. 375. It is argued for the appellant, however, that the complaint contains something besides the allegations above mentioned; that it is really a complaint to reform a deed; and that, when so considered, both the complaint and findings are insufficient, because it is neither alleged nor found that the deed sought to be reformed embraced the property in controversy. The complaint, after the allegations above mentioned, proceeded to set forth the nature of the defendant's claim. It alleged that said claim was founded on a mistake in the description of a deed. The mistake was this: After reaching a post on the west bank of Moro slough, the description called for the following course, viz.: "Thence down the said slough north 72° west, 61.50 chains, to a stake in a small slough at a point known as the 'Bolsita,'" while it was alleged and found that instead of "north 72° west" the course should have been "north 12° west." Now, if it had appeared that the land in controversy was included in the deed as made, so as to pass thereby, the plaintiff could not have maintained an action under the statute to determine an adverse claim; for it has been held that a mistake in the description of a conveyance cannot be corrected in such an action. Brewer v. Houston, 58 Cal. 345. In such case the legal title would have passed by the conveyance; and the holder of a mere right in equity, to have the conveyance reformed, cannot maintain an action like the present against the holder of the legal title. Von Drachenfels v. Doolittle, 19 Pac. Rep. 518. But, according to the appellant's own statement, this does not appear, and we think that the contrary appears affirmatively; for the description contained in the deed made is given in the complaint and in the findings, and it appears therefrom that the mistake in the course is immaterial. The wrong course is controlled by the direction to go "down the said slough" to a specified point. Courses and distances yield to visible boundaries. Spring v. Hewston, 52 Cal. 442; Serrano v. Rawson, 47 Cal. 55; More v. Massini, 37 Cal. 436. It affirmatively appears, therefore, both from the complaint and findings, that there was nothing requiring reformation, and no basis for the defendant's claim. As above stated, it was not necessary for the complaint to set forth the nature of the defendant's claim. But the unnecessary allegations merely show that the defendant's claim was based upon a harmless error of description, and do not change the character of the action; and the judgment does not undertake to reform the deed, but merely quiets the plaintiff's title. We therefore advise that the judgment and order denying a new trial be affirmed.

We concur: FOOTE, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

McGRATH et al. v. HYDE. (No. 11,666.)

DEED—DELIVERY.

A husband signed and acknowledged a deed conveying land to his wife, stating to the notary before whom he acknowledged it that he wished to give the property to her. The wife testified that her husband put the deed on the table, told her what it was, and directed her to put it away, saying that it could be recorded at any time. She stated that she put the deed in the trunk, and at another time said that her husband did so. Their daughter corroborated her mother, and stated that her father said he would put it away for her mother, and that she could record it any time. An inmate of the house stated that she was in position to have heard any such conversation, if it had occurred, but that she neither saw nor heard anything of the deed, but her testimony was vague as to the continuousness of her presence. Held, that the deed was delivered.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JOHN F. FINN, Judge.

Action by Honora McGrath and James McGrath, her husband, to cancel a deed made by Michael Hyde to Ellen Hyde, his wife; the female plaintiff being the daughter and heir of Michael Hyde, who died after the deed was made. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals.

E. B. Holladay and S. W. Holladay, (Craig & Meredith, of counsel,) for appellant. M. Cooney, for respondents.

HAYNE, C. This was a suit to cancel a deed from a husband to his wife, upon the grounds that the grantor had not sufficient capacity to make it, and that it was not delivered. The trial court found that the grantor had capacity to make it, but that it was not delivered, and rendered judgment for the plaintiffs. The defendant appeals. We think that the finding that the deed was not delivered is not sustained by the evidence. The notary who drew the deed testified that he did so at the request of the grantor, without the intervention of any other party; that the grantor instructed him to draw the deed, and signed and acknowledged it before him, stating at the time that "he wished to give the property to his wife." The wife testifies that her husband came home one day, when the following occurred: "He puts a deed on the table, and I says to him, 'What is this?' and he says, 'It is a deed to you.' He says: 'Deeding the West Mission-Street property all to you,—especially to you.' So I picked it up, and I looked at the date, and I began to cry. I thought then sure he was going to die, because he deeded the property to me, and I called Mary's attention at the same time, and I said: 'Here, Mamie, look at this;' and then he says: 'It is not recorded, but it will do,' he says, 'any time, and say nothing now,' he said, 'but just put it away.'" The daughter testifies as follows: "I just came home from town, and father and mother were sitting at the table, and this was before them, and my mother was in tears, and I asked her what was the matter, and she said that father was just after deeding the property to her, and with that my father got up, and walked away, and I said: 'What of it?' Well, she said: 'Oh, he is going to die;' and I said: 'No; that is no reason he is going to die; it is best he should do it now.' Question. What was the position of the deed? Answer. It was lying on the table between them. Q. Did your father say anything? A. He said, after we had got through talking, he said: 'Give it to me, and I will put it in the trunk, and there is no need of recording it until afterwards;' and he said: 'You can have it recorded at any time.'" The memory of the mother was at fault as to who put the deed in the trunk. In one place she says that she did, and in another place that her husband did. The daughter says that her father put it in the trunk, and we assume that such was the fact. The only evidence against this was the testimony of one Maggie Murphy, who lived in the house, and testified that she saw the parties "every day at that time," and was in a position to hear if there had been much conversation, and that she neither saw nor heard anything of the deed at the time. But the testimony of this witness is so vague as to the continuousness of her presence, and as to why she "was in a position" to hear and see, that we think it amounts to nothing. From the whole testimony, we think that it appears without substantial conflict that the husband instructed the notary to draw the deed, signed and acknowledged it, stating that he intended to give the property to his wife; went home and threw it on the table, saying, in substance: "There is a deed of that property to you; put it away;" that the wife took it up, and looked at it, and, after some conversation to the effect that it was not necessary to have it recorded then, the husband put it away in his trunk. It further appears that the husband did not want it recorded then, alleging as a reason that he wished to make some improvements on the property, which we think shows nothing more than that he wished to appear to be still the owner of the property, so far as outsiders were concerned.

We think that this shows a delivery of the deed. Delivery is a question of intention. Hibberd v. Smith, 67 Cal. 554, 4 Pac. Rep. 473, and 8 Pac. Rep. 46. The term signifies any manifestation whereby the grantor makes known his intention that the deed is complete and is to take effect. It is not necessary that there should be any actual manual transfer of the instrument. In Touchstone it is said: "Delivery is either actual, i. e., by doing something and saying nothing, or else verbal, i. e., by saying something and doing nothing, or it may be both; and either of these may make a good delivery and a perfect deed." 1 Shep. Touch. *57. And it is well settled that no particular form of words is necessary to manifest the intention. In the language of RYAN, C. J., in Bogie v. Bogie, 35 Wis. 667, "there is no set ritual of delivery; that when a deed is executed, and the minds of the parties to it meet, expressly or tacitly, in the purpose to give it present effect, the deed is validly delivered; and that such meeting of minds may be gathered from acts or signs, words or silence, in multitudinous variety of circumstances." Now, we think that if after throwing the deed on the table, and saying to the grantee, "There is a deed of the West Mission-Street property to you; put it away," the grantor had done nothing further, but had left the paper there, it would have been entirely clear that there was a perfect delivery. Shelton's Case, Cro. Eliz. 7; Souverbye v. Arden, 1 Johns. Ch. *255. Was this manifestation of intention, which was complete and sufficient of itself, overcome by the fact that the grantor took the deed and put it in his trunk? We think not. The retention of the deed by the grantor is not conclusive. There may be a good delivery, although the grantor has never parted with the possession of the instrument. Hastings v. Vaughn, 5 Cal. 318; Ruckman v. Ruckman, 32 N. J. Eq. 261; Otis v. Spencer, 102 Ill. 627, 628; Newton v. Bealer, 41 Iowa, 334; Scrugham v. Wood, 15 Wend. 546; Bunn v. Winthrop, 1 Johns. Ch. *336; Souverbye v. Arden, 1 Johns. Ch. *240; Garnons v. Knight, 5 Barn. & C. 692; 4 Kent, Comm. 455. The case of Folly v. Vantuyl, 9 N. J. Law, 153, is very like the present. There the obligor executed a bond, and, holding it in his hand, said to the obligee: "Here is your deed; what shall I do with it? and added: "I will take care of it for you;" and had put it in his trunk. Held a sufficient delivery. See, also, Otis v. Spencer, 102 Ill. 622. In addition to the above it is to be remembered that in cases of a family settlement like the present the law presumes more in favor of delivery than in other cases. Bryan v. Wash, 2 Gilman, 568; Reed v. Douthit, 62 Ill. 352. Taking all the circumstances together, we think that the intention to pass the title was complete, and that the retention of the deed by the grantor was merely for its safe-keeping, which, considering the relation of the parties, was quite natural and proper. The other matters do not require special notice. We therefore advise that the judgment be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

Pehrson et al. v. Hewitt et al. (No. 12,518.)

Fraudulent Conveyances—Insolvency.

1. A bill to set aside certain "pretended confessions" of judgment, alleged to have been made by the debtor with intent to delay and defraud plaintiffs, creditors of the debtor, is bad on demurrer, where the facts are not set forth by which the court can judge whether such confessions are fraudulent or not.

2. Where a defendant confesses judgment for debts justly due, it is not fraudulent for the judgment creditors to agree to buy the property levied on under their executions, and give it to the execution debtor if they see fit.

3. Where an insolvent debtor applies for a discharge in insolvency, a court of equity cannot set aside the adjudication in insolvency nor dismiss the proceedings.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Shasta county; Aaron Bell, Judge.

Wiley & Dozier and F. P. Primm, for appellants. Clay W. Taylor and J. Chadbourne, for respondents.

Thornton J. The plaintiffs bring this action to have certain judgments, and the executions issued thereon, and the levies made under them, vacated and set aside; that an adjudication in insolvency may be vacated, and the proceedings dismissed; and for an injunction restraining certain defendants, etc., from selling certain property described in the complaint. The defendants contend that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and that, therefore, the judgment and order denying a new trial should be reversed. The defendants demurred to the complaint on the above-stated ground. The complaint sets forth that the defendant Hewitt was indebted to the several plaintiffs in several sums for divers matters; that they commenced actions against Hewitt in a justice's court to recover these amounts, and sued out writs of attachment, which were levied by the sheriff of the county upon the property of defendant Hewitt, set forth in the complaint; that before the commencement of these actions Hewitt filed in the same justice's court certain pretended confessions of judgment in favor of several defendants for certain amounts alleged to be due to each of the defendants, which confessions of judgment were accepted by the several defendants in whose favor they were made. Plaintiffs further allege that said pretended confessions of judgment were made by Hewitt and accepted by defendants with the intent and design of hindering, delaying, and defrauding the plaintiffs and other creditors of Hewitt by a combination among them, by which they were to levy executions upon all the property of Hewitt, and have the same sold for the amount of said confessions to said defendants, or some of them, and that after said sale had been made that Hewitt was to be placed again in full possession and control of the property for his own use and benefit, and fraudulently protected by such proceedings against the claims of plaintiffs, and thus rendering any judgments which plaintiffs might recover against Hewitt ineffectual. It is further averred that executions afterwards issued on the judgments above mentioned, and came into the hands of the defendant Eckels, who was a constable, and that the constable made a pretended levy under the said executions on the property above mentioned; that this levy was made and abandoned prior to the levy of the attachments of plaintiffs above set forth, and that since the abandonment the constable has never had possession or control of any of the property above referred to; that the constable pretends that the levies made by him are in full force, and that he is proceeding to sell said property under these levies. The defendant Hewitt is insolvent and was insolvent when he made the confessions of judgment above stated, and that in furtherance of the above stated agreement by defendants, and to carry out and complete the fraudulent scheme of defendants, did, on the 16th of March, 1886, file his petition in insolvency; that this petition was not filed in good faith, but for the wrongful and fraudulent purpose of defeating the attachment liens of plaintiffs, to the end that the pretended levies of the executions might hold the property, and a sale of the same might be made in such manner as to fraudulently cover it, and protect it from the claims of plaintiffs.

We see no element of fraud by defendants in the matters averred in the complaint. It is not averred that the debts for which the judgments were confessed by Hewitt, in favor of the several defendants, were not justly due by Hewitt to them. Styling the confessions of judgments "pretended," as was done by the plaintiffs in the complaint, did not show that they were so. The facts should have been set forth from which it would appear that they were pretended and simulated, and not real and genuine. There was no law in existence when the confessions were made which prevented Hewitt from confessing a judgment in favor of a bona fide creditor, and there is nothing alleged in the complaint which tends to show that the defendants were not honest creditors to whom Hewitt was justly indebted. The word "pretended" is a mere epithet, which, in the absence of facts showing the pretended character of the confessions or of the judgments, imports nothing impugning either the confessions or the judgments. It sufficiently appears that confessions of judgment were filed in the justice's court, that judgments were entered on them, and executions issued on the judgments. It is not sufficient to allege that confessions or judgments are fraudulent, but the facts showing that they are such must be averred, so that the court can perceive that such instruments are fraudulent. The facts showing the fraud must be made to appear by averment. See Kinder v. Macy, 7 Cal. 206; Harris v. Taylor, 15 Cal. 348; Meeker v. Harris, 19 Cal. 289, 290.

The debts for which the judgments were confessed being justly due by Hewitt, we see no fraud in the defendants agreeing to buy the property at the sale had on their executions, and, if they did buy it, giving it to Hewitt, if they elected to do so, To hold that they could not do so would be to hold that a man could not do what he chooses with his own property. The defendants, if they bought at the sale under execution, would pay their own money for the property bought, and when so bought and paid for it would belong to them, and they could do with it what they chose to do. They might give it away to Hewitt or any one else, or might destroy it if they saw fit. We cannot see how a court of equity can set aside an adjudication in insolvency or dismiss such a proceeding. It is averred that Hewitt was insolvent, and if so he had a right to apply for a discharge under the statutes in relation to insolvency. There can be no fraud in the pursuance of a remedy allowed by law. Hewitt, in applying for his discharge in insolvency, was taking the steps provided by law for having his property equitably and fairly subjected to the satisfaction of his creditors. Of this, no creditor has a right to complain. If he has no right to apply to be discharged from the claims of his creditors, they will have an opportunity of showing that, and preventing his discharge, in the insolvency proceeding. If the confessions of judgment made to defendants are prohibited by the insolvent laws, the assignee in insolvency can have them adjudged void, and on a proper proceeding they will be so adjudged, but no such proceeding is before us in this case. As the agreement made by defendants described above was free from fraud, we cannot see that the application in insolvency to carry out such arrangement could or would be fraudulent. We are of opinion that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and therefore the judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the court below to sustain the demurrer to the complaint, and for other proceedings according to law. So ordered.

ASSAULT WITH INTENT TO KILL.

In a trial for assault with intent to kill, where it appeared that defendant and one W. were near the person assaulted, and defendant knocked him down with a pistol, and told W. to stab him, which he did, and that two shots were fired, though it was not proven that defendant fired them, it was not error to admit testimony of the stabbing, and to allow the knife used to be shown to the jury.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. F. SULLIVAN, Judge.

Wells Whitmore, for appellant. G. A. Johnson, Atty. Gen., for the People.

MCFARLAND, J The defendant was charged with and convicted of the crime of an assault with intent to commit murder upon Ny Sam Ock, the assault being alleged to have been made with a pistol. The transcript contains only one ruling of the court, to which exception was taken. There are no points and authorities or briefs on file, and there is no ground for reversing the judgment, unless the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict, or the said ruling was erroneous.

1. The evidence was amply sufficient to support the verdict.

2. The ruling of the court excepted to was as follows: It was proven clearly that defendant and one Ung Wong approached or were near said Ock, when defendant drew a pistol and struck Ock with it, knocking him down. At the same time the defendant directed Ung Wong to "stab him," which Wong then and there proceeded to do, leaving the knife in Ock's body. At that moment two shots were fired, although it was not proven that defendant fired them. The court allowed proof of the stabbing, and allowed one of the witnesses who swore to it to produce the knife in court; and to this ruling appellant excepted. There was no error in admitting evidence of the stabbing. In the first place, it tended to show the intent with which defendant made the assault; and, in the second place, it was so inseparably mixed up with the transaction as to be necessarily a part of the res gestæ. Allowing the witness to exhibit the knife, after the facts as to the stabbing had been shown, was not important enough, under the circumstances, to merit discussion. Judgment and order denying a new trial affirmed.

BURGLARY—AUTRE FOIS ACQUIT.

A motion to set aside an information for burglary, on the ground that defendants had once been discharged from arrest for the same offense, on the same evidence as that given at the preliminary examination, is properly denied where there is no proof that the evidence was the same at both examinations.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Solano county; A. J. BUCKLES, Judge.

Charles A. Hubbs, for appellants. Geo. A. Johnson, Atty. Gen., for the People.

PER CURIAM. Information for burglary, and conviction of defendants. The defendants moved to set aside the information, on the ground that they had once been discharged from arrest for the same offense, based on the same evidence as was had at the first preliminary examination by the superior court of Solano county. We find no proof in the record that the evidence was the same on both of the examinations. The basis of the motion is lacking. The court did not err in denying the motion. The information was sufficient, and in accordance with law, and the court did not err in directing judgment to be entered on the verdict. The evidence is sufficient to support the verdict. On an examination of it, and taking it altogether, we find it of such a character that we cannot reverse on the ground of insufficiency of the evidence. There is no error in the transcript. Judgment and orders affirmed.

PATERSON, J. I do not concur. The evidence in my opinion is insufficient to support the verdict and judgment.

THORNTON, J. I dissent on same grounds as Justice PATERSON.

NAVIGABLE WATERS—WHARVES—EMINENT DOMAIN—INJUNCTION.

1. A city map not made until after plaintiffs acquired title to their lot, and which shows the lot to be smaller than it is described to be in their deed, and smaller than it appears to be by an official map made before the execution of the deed, is not admissible against plaintiffs, to prove the true boundaries of the lot.

2. Act Cal. March 26, 1851, which establishes a water front for the city of San Francisco, gives the use and occupation of the land therein included to the city for a term of years, and provides that the act shall not be construed as a surrender by the state of its right to so regulate the erection of wharves that they shall not interfere with the commercial interests of the bay and harbor, does not deprive the state of jurisdiction, by its harbor commissioners, over Channel street of said city; said street being a mere navigable arm of the bay. Following People v. Williams, 2 Pac. Rep. 393.

3. Whether or not the erection by the harbor commissioners of a wharf in Channel street, in front of plaintiffs' property, on which a wharf built at great expense had been used for years, would constitute a taking or damaging of private property for public use, within Const. Cal. art. 1, § 14, an injunction will not lie to restrain the commissioners from building the wharf.

4. Civil Code Cal. § 3423, providing that an injunction shall not lie to prevent the execution of a public statute by officers of the law for the public benefit, does not prohibit an injunction against the erection of such a wharf on plaintiffs' land, as no public statute authorizes the taking of land without proceedings under eminent domain.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; T. K. WILSON, Judge.

On March 26, 1851, the legislature of California passed the "Water-Lot Act," (St. 1851, p. 307,) by which all the lots of land within certain boundaries, according to the survey of the city of San Francisco and the map then in the recorder's office, were designated as the "San Francisco Beach and Water Lots." A boundary line was established, to be the permanent water front of the city, and the duty of keeping the space beyond the line for a distance of 500 yards clear of obstructions was imposed on the city. The use and occupation of all the land described was given to the city for 99 years, and the city was required to file a certified map of the water-front boundary in the office of the city surveyor, as well as in other offices mentioned, and this was afterwards done; the map being known as the "Red Line" or "Eddy" map. The act further provided that it should not be construed as a surrender by the state of its right to regulate the construction of wharves, so that they shall not interfere with the commercial interests of the bay and harbor of San Francisco. William D. English and others, defendants, were the board of harbor commissioners of the state, and Nancy Payne and S. P. Dewey, the plaintiffs, owned a lot contiguous to the water front mentioned. Defendants undertook to build a wharf in front of plaintiffs' lot, and plaintiffs brought this action to enjoin them from so doing. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal.

Cope, Boyd & Fifield, for appellants. T. C. Coogan, for respondents.

MCFARLAND, J. Defendants are state harbor commissioners. Plaintiffs are owners (being seised of a term of years therein) of those certain premises in the city of San Francisco known generally as "Block 12 of South Beach Water-Lot Property;" lying between Channel street on the southerly side, Berry street on the northerly side, Third street on the easterly side, and Fourth street on the westerly side. Channel street is an arm of the bay of San Francisco, running up from the open bay through a portion of the southern part of the city, past and beyond the said block 12. It is covered by the waters of the bay; the tide ebbs and flows in it; it is navigable, and is used and navigated by vessels engaged in commerce; it has been dedicated to public use for purposes of navigation and commerce; and it is claimed by defendants to be of the width of 200 feet up to a point beyond the said land of plaintiffs. By an act of the legislature approved March 26, 1868, (St. 1867–68, p. 355) it was declared that a canal 140 feet wide, located in the middle of said Channel street, should forever remain open for purposes of drainage and navigation; and it is contended by defendants that there is thus left on each side of said 140 feet canal a strip 30 feet wide, which is part of said Channel street, and within their jurisdiction and control as harbor commissioners. And upon what is claimed by defendants to be the 30-foot strip next to plaintiffs' block 12, on the northerly side of what is claimed to be Channel street, defendants entered and were about to drive piles upon and along a part of the same, and to erect a wharf thereon, when plaintiffs commenced this action to enjoin them from so doing. Plaintiffs claim that this strip is a part of their said block 12. The court below found against plaintiffs, and entered judgment for defendants; and from the judgment and an order denying a new trial plaintiffs appeal.

The land in controversy, together with large quantities of other land in that vicinity, originally belonged to the state of California, and were granted by the state to the city of San Francisco for the term of 99 years, by an act of the legislature passed March 26, 1851, and generally known as the "Water-Lot Act." It is admitted and found that the title of the city under said act to said block 12 passed to plaintiffs on December 30, 1852, through a deed to them of that date, executed by one Lewis Peck, to whom the title had regularly come through sufficient conveyances. The court found that more than 20 years ago plaintiffs erected, and still maintain, upon said block, including said strip 30 feet in width, wharves and other structures for the loading and unloading of ships and vessels and the storage of merchandise, and "have continuously, for more than twenty years next before the commencement of this action, used and occupied the whole of said lot or parcel of land, including said strip 30 feet wide, for the purposes aforesaid, and still continue to so use and occupy the same." But the court found that while plaintiffs' land, block 12, is 825 feet long from Third to Fourth street,—the length claimed by plaintiffs,—it is only 245 feet wide from Berry to Channel street, instead of 275 feet, as claimed by plaintiffs; and that, as 245 feet southerly from Berry street would not include any of the 30-foot strip, as claimed by defendants, therefore plaintiffs do not own any of the land upon which defendants propose to operate. The main issue of fact, therefore, was as to the width of plaintiffs' land,—whether 275 feet wide, as claimed by them, or only 245 feet, or less.

Plaintiffs contend—First, that this issue should have been found in their favor upon the evidence introduced, and upon the application of the true rules of construction to their title-deeds; and, secondly, that, if the finding of the court on that point could be held as supported by the evidence at all, it could be so held only by taking it as based on evidence erroneously received and considered, against the objections and exceptions of plaintiffs.

If we construe plaintiffs' deeds according to courses, distances, and quantities therein expressed, then the amount of land, and its length and width, are exactly as plaintiffs claim. The description in the deed to plaintiffs, dated December 30, 1852, (and the prior deeds were substantially the same,) is as follows: "All those three certain 100-vara water-lots situated in the city of San Francisco, and being subdivisions number one, (No. 1,) number two, (No. 2,) and number three, (No. 3,) of the block known on the official map of said city as 'Number Twelve (No. 12) South Beach Water-Lots,' bounded as follows, to-wit: Beginning at the point forming the south-westerly corner of Third and Berry streets, and running thence south-westerly on the line of Berry street three hundred varas, to Fourth street; thence south-easterly, along the line of Fourth street, one hundred varas; thence north-easterly, at right angles, along Channel street, three hundred varas; and thence north-westerly, along the line of Third street, one hundred varas, to the place of beginning." Three 100-vara lots would include a piece of land 825 feet long (the length claimed by plaintiffs and found by the court) and 275 feet wide, (the width claimed by plaintiffs.) Moreover, the further descriptions of 300 varas between Third and Fourth streets, and 100 varas along the lines of Third and Fourth streets, make the block of the exact length and width claimed by plaintiffs. It is argued, however, by respondents, that in cases of disputed boundaries, courses and distances and quantities must give way to monuments. That is undoubtedly the general rule. But before the rule can be applied, there must not only be monuments which will stand still, and not float or fly, but the place where the alleged monuments were at the time the conveyance was made must be satisfactorily located. The monument which is claimed to be controlling in this case is the northerly line of Channel street; but where that line was or is constitutes the unknown quantity of the problem. In 1852, when plaintiffs got their deed, the land in controversy, and the place where Channel street is claimed to be, and all the country round about there, was a wide waste of waters. There was not only no designation of Channel street on the surface, but it can hardly be said to have had any definite dimensions or boundaries, even in mental contemplation. Of course, if there had been proper evidence sufficient to locate the line of that street as the court must have located it, we would not be prepared to say that such line should not control the other descriptive parts of the deeds. But as to that point we think the court erroneously admitted evidence upon which it must have based its findings.

Plaintiffs received their deed and acquired their title, as before stated, in December, 1852. At that time there was a map of the city certified and indorsed by the mayor and city surveyor, in accordance with the requirement of section 5 of said act of March 26, 1851, by which the land in question was granted by the state to the city. This was called the "Eddy" or "Red Line" map; and being thus recognized by the state and city, and in existence at and before the time when the deed was made, and being referred to in the deed itself, it was properly introduced in evidence,—plaintiffs contending that it shows their land to be as they claim. But the court allowed the defendants, over the objections of plaintiffs, to introduce a number of maps of the city of San Francisco and parts of it, made long after plaintiffs' title had accrued, as follows: A map called "City Engineer's Map," of the date of January 30, 1866; a map of the city front and water lot property, made under the directions of the state harbor commissioners in 1864; a map made under directions of the board of tide-land commissioners in 1869; a map of the city known as the "Humphrey's Map," made in 1870; a map called the "Turner Map," made in 1869; and also other maps, surveys, and data in the surveyor's office, all made long after 1852. On these maps and surveys—at least, on most of them—the said block 12 appeared as of less width than 275 feet, some of them showing a width of only 240 feet, and nearly all the testimony of the witnesses of defendants tending to show the smaller width of the block was based on said maps and surveys. It is apparent, therefore, that the evidence was material, and that the court must have given great weight to it. Indeed, without the maps and the testimony founded on them, there would not be sufficient evidence to support the finding. And we are satisfied that these maps and surveys were erroneously admitted in evidence. Counsel for respondents argued that they were admissible as acts and declarations of parties. Of what parties? Certainly not of plaintiffs, or of persons who could bind them. They were declarations either of third parties entirely unconnected with the issues involved, or of parties in their own interest who were hostile to plaintiffs, and in either event they were clearly inadmissible. If a man has already acquired title to land, he cannot afterwards be mapped out of it by other persons.

For the foregoing reasons the judgment must be reversed; but, as there may be another trial, there are one or two other things which need brief mention.

1. Appellants contend that by said act of March 26, 1851, the state conveyed all the premises in question here, including the whole of Channel street, to the city; and that, therefore, neither the state, nor the state harbor commissioners, have any jurisdiction or control over them. But it was held by this court in People v. Williams, 64 Cal. 498, 2 Pac. Rep. 393, that by said act the state did not surrender control over the navigable waters of the bay, of which Channel street is a part. We do not desire to disturb the ruling in that case, and therefore this contention of appellants must be determined against them. (It may be remarked that the point as above stated was about all that was determined in People v. Williams.)

2. Plaintiffs have erected on their land, at large expense, and have maintained for many years, a number of wharves, with slips between, and ships load and unload both at the ends of the wharves and in the slips. If defendants were to erect a wharf along the line of Channel street, in front of plaintiffs' land, vessels would be prevented from coming into the slips, and plaintiffs' business and property would be greatly injured. And plaintiffs, therefore, contend that by the erection of a wharf along the line of Channel street on the 30-foot strip, even though the latter is not part of their land, their property would be "damaged for public use without compensation," etc., within the meaning of section 14, art. 1, of the state constitution. If, however, the state should, in aid of commerce and navigation, erect a wharf of usual and reasonable dimensions, and in a reasonable manner, on the navigable waters of Channel street, and not on plaintiffs' land, and without taking any of their property, we are disposed to think that the resulting injury to plaintiffs' business and land would not be the damage contemplated by said section of the constitution. In such event plaintiffs would probably be held to have contemplated this exercise of governmental power when purchasing their land. City of Denver v. Bayer, 2 Pac. Rep. 6. But, however that may be, we are satisfied that in such a case an injunction would not lie against the officers of the state.

3. Respondents contend that an injunction would not lie in this case under any alleged state of facts, because the Code provides that "an injunction cannot be granted to prevent the execution of a public statute by officers of the law for the public benefit." Civil Code, § 3423. But there is no public statute or other law which authorized defendants to take plaintiffs' land, at least without proceedings under the power of eminent domain. We perceive in the record no other matter of importance necessary to be noticed. Judgment and order appealed from reversed, and a new trial ordered.

VAN CLEAVE v. BUCHER, Sheriff. (No. 12,369.)

SHERIFFS—RETURN OF EXECUTION.

1. A complaint in a suit against a sheriff, for failure to return a writ of execution, is not demurrable because it did not allege that the sheriff's fees were paid.

2 Where an execution states that the judgment was recovered "in the superior court of the county of L.," it is not void for failing to state the county where the judgment roll was filed, as required by Code Civil Proc. § 682, as it will be presumed that the clerk of the court did his duty, and filed the same in the county where the judgment was recovered, as provided by Code Civil Proc. § 670.

3. Under Code Civil Proc. § 128, subd. 8, providing for the amendment of process, an execution which does not clearly set out the amount due thereon is voidable, but not void.

4. Under Civil Code § 139, providing that, on granting a divorce for an offense of the husband, the court may compel him to provide for the support of the wife and children, and Code Civil Proc. § 1007, providing that an order by a court for the payment of money may be enforced by execution, an execution in such case is not void because issued without an order for defendant to show cause why he had not obeyed the order of the court.

Beatty, C. J., and Paterson, J., dissenting.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Modoc county; G. F. Harris, Judge.

Spencer & Raker, for appellant. Ewing & Claflin, for respondent.

Foote, C. This is an action for damages against a sheriff, for the alleged failure to return a writ of execution. A demurrer was filed to the amended complaint, stating as grounds therefor: "(1) That said amended complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action against the defendant as sheriff of Modoc county. (2) That said amended complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. (3) That said amended complaint is ambiguous and uncertain in this: It does not appear with certainty therein whether or not this action is sought to be maintained against the defendant as sheriff of Modoc county or against him in his individual and private capacity." This demurrer was sustained, and the plaintiff declined to amend. Judgment was duly given in favor of the defendant, from which this appeal is prosecuted.

It is urged upon us, because of the want of an allegation in the complaint, that the sheriff's fees were paid, that the pleading in question was demurrable. That was a matter which the sheriff might perhaps have set up in an answer by way of defense, joined with a statement that he had refused to receive and serve the writ until such fees were paid, but the complaint was not demurrable for not stating that such payment was made. It is claimed that the execution does not state the county where the judgment roll was filed, and was therefore void under section 682, Code Civil Proc. The writ states that "on the 8th day of November, 1884, in the superior court of the county of Lassen, and state aforesaid," the judgment was recovered. The statute provides that a judgment roll shall be filed in the county where the judgment is recovered. Section 670, Code Civil Proc. It is to be presumed that the clerk of the superior court, whose duty it was to make up and file the judgment roll, did so; and therefore it intelligibly appeared, upon the face of the writ, that the judgment roll was filed in Lassen county. It is further alleged that the writ was void because it did not state the amount of the judgment, or the amount actually due thereon. It is true that neither the amount of the judgment, nor the amount actually due thereon, are stated in such manner as that the exact amount either due, or for which the judgment was rendered, can absolutely and without doubt be ascertained, but it is certain that the sheriff was informed by the language of the writ that the judgment was rendered for at least the sum of $390, which he was commanded to make by levy, distress, and sale out of the defendant's property. These imperfections in the writ could have been amended. Section 128, subd. 8, Code Civil Proc. If amendable the writ was not void, but only voidable, and should have been served and returned by the sheriff. Freem. Ex'ns, § 103; Hibberd v. Smith, 50 Cal. 511. It is further argued that the writ was void, because issued under an order incident to a decree of divorce, before the defendant had been given an opportunity to show cause why he had not obeyed the order of the court. Sections 139, Civil Code, and section 1007, Code Civil Proc., are as follows: "Where a divorce is granted for an offense of the husband, the court may compel him to provide for the maintenance of the children of the marriage, and to make such suitable allowance to the wife for her support * * * as the court may deem just. * * *" Section 139, Civil Code. "Whenever an order for the payment of a sum of money is made by a court, pursuant to the provisions of this Code, it may be enforced by execution in the same manner as if it were a judgment." Section 1007, Code Civil Proc. In view of these provisions, we fail to see any force in that contention on the part of the respondent. We think, from an inspection of the whole complaint, that it was not doubtful in what capacity the defendant was sued. It is clear that the action was brought against him as the sheriff of Modoc county. For these reasons the judgment should be reversed, and the court below directed to overrule the demurrer.

We concur: Belcher, C. C.; Hayne, C.

We dissent: Beatty, C. J.; Paterson, J.

Farnum v. Hefner. (No. 12,351.)

Leases—Assignment—Renting on Shares.

1. A covenant by a lessee not to assign the lease or underlet the premises without the lessor's consent is not broken by an involuntary sale of the leasehold under execution against the lessee.

2. A written acknowledgment of forfeiture of the lease by the lessee, and a surrender of the premises to the lessor, after the levy of the execution thereon, is invalid as against the levy, it not appearing that there was in fact any cause for forfeiture.

3. Under a lease providing that the crop shall be the property of the lessor until it is delivered to him, when he shall immediately redeliver two-thirds of it to the lessee, one who purchases the leasehold interest at execution sale may harvest the crop and fulfill the lessee's agreement, and if the lessor refuses to divide the grain, or to receive it, unless the delivery is free from any claim to a return of one-third part of it, and afterwards accepts a warehouse receipt for one-third, he cannot recover for its conversion.

McFARLAND, J., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Butte county; LEON D. FREER, Judge.

Action by C. E. Farnum against Philip Hefner for the conversion of a quantity of wheat. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

H. V. Reardan, for appellant. Carter P. Pomeroy, for respondent.

WORKS, J. Action to recover damages for the conversion of a lot of wheat. Judgment for the plaintiff, from which, and an order denying his motion for a new trial, the defendant appeals. The respondent, being the owner of certain real estate, leased the same to one Butler for a term of years. The lease contained the following covenants: "And the said party of the second part does hereby covenant and agree that he will not underlet any portion of said premises, nor assign this lease, without the written permission of the said party of the first part, his agent or attorney, and he will during the said term of lease keep the buildings, corral, and other improvements now on said premises, or which may be put thereon during the term of this lease by the said party of the first part, in good repair, damages or loss by fire excepted; that he will not commit or suffer waste to be committed thereon. And the said party of the second part further covenants that he will in good and farm-like manner, at his own cost, charge, and expense, till and cultivate the said premises as follows, not otherwise, to-wit: That in due and proper season in the fall of 1884 he will plow to the depth of four inches, or deeper, and sow to wheat the east one-half of said premises, and in due and proper season, in the spring of 1885, he will plow to the depth of four inches, or deeper, the west one-half of said premises, and sow the same to wheat in the fall of 1885; that he will, at his own cost, charge, and expense, well and carefully tend, take care of, and protect the crops while growing on said premises during said term of this lease; and that as soon as the same is suitable for harvesting he will without delay, and at his own cost, charge, and expense, harvest, thresh, glean, and sack, in good and new merchantable sacks, all the grain raised on said premises, and, as soon as threshed and sacked, deliver to said party of the first part, his agent or attorney, without charge, all of the grain, one-third thereof, quality and quantity considered, to be delivered in the town of Biggs, in Butte county, Cal., and the remaining two-thirds to be delivered on the said premises. * * * And the said party of the first part hereby covenants and agrees that upon said wheat or hay, or wheat and hay, being delivered as aforesaid, he will immediately deliver and transfer to the said party of the second part two-thirds of said wheat or hay, quality and quantity considered. And it is mutually covenanted and agreed that until such delivery and transfer by the said party of the first part all of said wheat and hay shall be the property of the said party of the first part, and the said party of the second part shall have no right to dispose of or incumber any portion thereof." The appellant brought his action and recovered a judgment against Butler, the tenant, and levied his execution upon this leasehold interest in the respondent's property. After the levy of said execution, and while the lien thereof was in force, the tenant executed to the respondent the following acknowledgment of forfeiture of the lease: "Whereas, on account of financial embarrassment, I am unable to perform my obligations under a certain lease made by C. E. Farnum to myself on the 15th day of October, 1884, in the city and county of San Francisco, Cal., to [describing the property,] and having already, to the detriment of the said C. E. Farnum, committed breach of covenant of said contract; and whereas, said C. E. Farnum demands forfeiture of said lease or contract, in order to secure himself from loss on account of such breach of contract: now, therefore, in consideration of the foregoing, I hereby forfeit to the said C. E. Farnum the said lease or contract, with all my rights under it." The appellant proceeded to enforce his judgment and execution lien by a sale of the property on such execution, and himself became the purchaser. He entered upon the lands under his purchase, and proceeded to harvest the wheat growing on the land. While so in possession he was notified by the respondent to give possession of the property, and forbidden to harvest the grain. After having harvested and threshed the grain, he tendered to the agent of the respondent the wheat, as provided in the lease. One Frank Hefner, a son of the appellant, testified as follows with reference to the delivery of and offer to deliver the wheat: "When I had cut and sacked the grain I visited Biggs, and notified Mr. Robinson (respondent's agent) that the grain was ready for delivery, and requested him to name the place where I should deliver it. He refused to name the place, and refused to make any division of the grain. I thereupon hauled all of the grain to Biggs and deposited it in the warehouse, had it weighed and divided, and deposited two-thirds of it under one receipt and one-third under another. I again called upon Mr. Robinson, and informed him that all of the grain was at the warehouse, and tendered him the receipt for one-third of it, which he at first refused to accept, but in a short time concluded to, and did, accept the one-third."

Mr. Robinson testified as follows: "After the grain was cut and sacked, Mr. Frank Hefner, the son of the defendant, called upon me at Biggs, and notified me that the grain had been cut and sacked, and was ready for delivery, and requested me to designate where it should be delivered, and also to make division. I refused to accept the grain unless it was delivered free from any claim by Mr. Hefner for any part of it. Afterwards Mr. Frank Hefner notified me that the grain had all been delivered at the warehouse at Biggs, and weighed, and tendered me the warehouse receipt for one-third of said wheat. I at first refused to receive it, but afterwards accepted and received it." At the trial the appellant offered in evidence the judgment roll in the action of himself against Butler, under which the leasehold interest of Butler was sold. Objection was made to the evidence by the respondent, and the court below excluded it, and this is assigned as error. The respondent contends that the ruling of the court was right, on three grounds: (1) The transfer of the leasehold interest by the execution sale to the appellant was an assignment within the terms of the lease, and worked a forfeiture thereof. (2) The lease has been forfeited by the written acknowledgment of the tenant. (3) The tenant, under the provisions of the lease, had no interest in the crops harvested, and therefore no interest could pass to the appellant by the sale.

1. The first of these contentions presents the question whether an involuntary transfer of the leasehold interest of the tenant was in violation of the terms of the lease, and worked a forfeiture of his estate. If so, the ruling of the court below was right; otherwise, so far as this point is concerned, it was error. The covenant in the lease is the ordinary kind, which applies, it seems to us, to a voluntary, and not an involuntary, assignment of the lease. It is firmly established by authority that under such a covenant an involuntary assignment by sale under execution, bankruptcy, and the like, is not a violation of the covenant and does not work a forfeiture. 2 Greenl. Ev. § 245; Wood, Landl. & Ten. (2d Ed.) 714; Riggs v. Pursell, 66 N. Y. 198; 1 Tayl. Landl. & Ten. § 408; Bemis v. Wilder, 100 Mass. 446; Jackson v. Silvernail, 15 Johns. 277. If the landlord desires to avoid such involuntary transfer of the leasehold interest of the tenant, he may provide expressly in his lease that such transfer of the property shall work a forfeiture, and the same will be effectual. Tayl. Landl. & Ten. § 409; Davis v. Eyton, 7 Bing. 154; Doe v. David, 5 Tyrw. 125; Roe v. Galliers, 2 Term. R. 133. So where it appears that the judgment and sale have been submitted to in bad faith on the part of the lessee, or where he voluntarily places himself in such a position that a transfer must result; as, for example, where he deposits the lease as security, or gives a warrant of attorney, whereby he may be dispossessed by the creditor. Doe v. Hawke, 2 East, 481. But this is placed upon the ground that the assignment in such cases must be regarded as voluntary. It is contended by counsel for respondent that where the whole tenor of the lease shows that it is the intention of the parties that the tenant shall himself occupy the premises, the case is within the rule above laid down, and that the assignment, under the circumstances of this case, must be held to work a forfeiture; and he cites a number of cases, only one of which, it seems to us, has any tendency to support the position taken, (Doe v. Clarke, 8 East, 185,) and in that case the court puts its decision upon the ground that the lease required, as a condition, that the tenant should actually occupy the dwelling-house on the premises, which, we think, presents an entirely different case from the one before us. We are quite clear, from the authorities cited above, that the transfer of this property by the judgment and sale of the appellant did not forfeit the lease, and that the ruling of the court cannot be sustained on that ground.

2. As to the contention that the lease was forfeited by the written acknowledgment thereof by the tenant, it appears that such acknowledgment was executed after the lien of the appellant's execution had attached. and in our judgment a voluntary acknowledgment of forfeiture at that time could not affect the rights of the appellant, and that upon a sale of the property his title would relate back to the time of the levy of his execution as against such forfeiture. Again, it appears to us from the record before us that there was no consideration or reason for this acknowledgment of forfeiture, unless it were to avoid the just obligations of the tenant to the respondent. There is no evidence in the case, nor does it appear from the instrument itself, that there was any cause of forfeiture, or that the respondent could in any way be injured by reason of the proceedings of the appellant. Under such circumstances it seems to us that the forfeiture executed by the tenant must be held to be invalid as against the rights of the appellant.

3. We think the contention of the respondent, that the tenant had no such interest in the wheat in controversy in this action as could pass by execution and sale, does not reach the question presented. The tenant certainly had a leasehold interest in the property, under which he might, by complying with the terms of the lease, become the owner of the identical wheat raised upon the land. It is undoubtedly true, as contended, that the landlord and tenant may by agreement provide that all of the crops raised upon the land may be delivered to and remain the property of the landlord, and be disposed of by him; and such agreement will protect the title of the landlord in the property as against an attaching creditor of the tenant. But it will be found upon an examination of the cases cited by counsel that in every instance where such an agreement is upheld, it is made for the protection of the landlord in case of advancements by him, or for some other reason; in other words, there is some consideration shown for the agreement by which the title remains in the landlord. And in none of the cases, so far as they have come to our notice, has it been held that such a rule can apply where the property, or a part of it, delivered to the landlord, is to be immediately redelivered to, and become the property of, the tenant, as in this case. Howell v. Foster, 65 Cal. 169, 3 Pac. Rep. 647; Smith v. Atkins, 18 Vt. 461; Paris v. Vail, Id. 277; Briggs v. Oaks, 26 Vt. 138; Esdon v. Colburn, 28 Vt. 631.

There is no evidence in this case that there was any reason, so far as the liability of the landlord was concerned, that there should be any withholding of the crops raised upon the land for his protection, and the lease expressly provides that one-third of the wheat shall be delivered to him at a certain place, and the other two-thirds be delivered to the landlord on the land, and immediately redelivered by him to the tenant. It is not denied that the appellant, after his purchase, fully complied with the terms of the lease, cut and harvested the grain, tendered the delivery thereof to the agent of the respondent, who refused to receive the same unless the delivery was made free from any claim of the appellant. Conceding, as contended, that the title to the property remained in the respondent, still the tenant would have had the right to enforce the delivery of the grain to him under the terms of the lease, and that right was one which would pass by the sale to the appellant, and, upon a compliance by him with the terms of the lease, he was entitled to have the identical wheat raised upon the land delivered to him; and upon the refusal of the respondent, through his agent, to accept the wheat on the terms provided for in the lease, the appellant had the undoubted right to retain the wheat without a delivery in the first instance to him. The wheat being in his possession, under these circumstances, it is quite clear to us that an action to recover the wheat, or for damages for its conversion by the appellant, cannot be maintained. For these reasons the court below erred in excluding the judgment roll, which was material to show that the appellant had become the owner of the interest of Butler. It is also contended by the appellant that the court erred in admitting in evidence, over his objection, the written acknowledgment of forfeiture above set out. We are of the opinion, for the reasons above stated, that the acknowledgment was immaterial as against the appellant, whose rights had attached in the property before such acknowledgment had been executed and delivered. Judgment and order appealed from reversed.

MORAN et al. v. ROSS. (No. 12,697.)

EMINENT DOMAIN—COMPENSATION.

Under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1248, which provides that in eminent domain proceedings to condemn land the damages to defendant's land not sought to be condemned shall be ascertained, as well as the amount of benefit to said land, if any, that will be derived from the proposed improvement, and which further provides that, if the benefit shall be equal to the damages assessed, no compensation shall be paid except the value of the portion taken, but, if the benefit shall be less than the damages so assessed, the former shall be deducted from the latter, and the remainder shall be the only damages allowed in addition to the value, the defendant is entitled to the full value of the land taken, for the use of a private individual, and also to the damages sustained by the balance of the tract by the severance from the part taken, less the benefits accruing to such part; and it is immaterial that Const. Cal. art. 1, § 14, makes different provisions in case of the taking of land for the use of a private corporation.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Lassen county; M. MARSTELLER, Judge.

Charles Moran and others, partners as Moran Bros., commenced proceedings in eminent domain to condemn, for railroad purposes, land owned by defendant, A. E. Ross. Judgment condemning the land was rendered, the value of the land taken being fixed at $329.51, and the injury to the other land at $150. The plaintiffs were also required to pay for fencing the right of way. The court further found that the portion of defendant's land not taken would be benefited $150, but refused to offset it against the damages to that tract. Plaintiffs appeal.

Spencer & Raker, for appellants. Goodwin & Davis and W. N. Goodwin, for respondent.

WORKS, J. Proceeding to condemn lands for the right of way of a railroad, brought by the appellants as partners. There was judgment for the appellants condemning the land, as prayed for, but the court found that the lands of the respondent, not taken by the railroad, would be benefited by the location and construction of the road in the sum of $150, and refused to allow the appellants any deduction on account of said benefits from the amount of damages found as to the part of respondent's land not taken. The sole question presented is whether, in an action by a private individual to condemn lands, the amount of benefits accruing to the land of the defendant, not taken, can be deducted from the damages resulting from the taking of the right of way. The Codes of this state authorize private individuals to condemn lands for railroad purposes. Civil Code, § 1001; Code Civil Proc. § 1238; Moran v. Ross, ante, 547, (opinion filed May 6, 1889.) The Code requires that the court, jury, or referee trying the case shall ascertain, among other things, damages to the defendant's land not sought to be condemned, and "separately how much the portion not sought to be condemned, and each estate or interest therein, will be benefited, if at all, by the construction of the improvement proposed by the plaintiff."

Code Civil Proc. § 1248, subds. 2, 3. It is also provided in this same section, subd. 3: "And if the benefit shall be equal to the damages assessed under subdivision 2, the owner of the parcel shall be allowed no compensation except the value of the portion taken; but, if the benefit shall be less than the damages so assessed, the former shall be deducted from the latter, and the remainder shall be the only damages allowed in addition to the value." There can be no question as to the proper construction of these provisions. The defendant is entitled to the value of the lands taken, without any deduction; but if the balance of his tract of land will be damaged by the severance therefrom of the part taken, and at the same time be benefited by the making of the improvements by the plaintiff, such benefits shall be deducted from the damages that will result to the land not taken. The section is not only plain and explicit in this respect, but to us it seems to be eminently just and right. No one's private property should be taken for public improvements, no matter how important or necessary to the public good they may be, without just compensation. But it is equally true that no one engaged in a work for the benefit of the public should be compelled to pay more than a just compensation for such taking. Therefore, when the defendant receives compensation for his lands taken and the damages resulting to the part not taken, less the benefits accruing to such part, he receives what seems to us to be "just compensation." But in respect to corporations the constitution of this state provides otherwise. Section 14, art. 1, of the constitution, provides: "Private property shall not be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation having been first made to or paid into court for the owner, and no right of way shall be appropriated to the use of any corporation other than municipal, until full compensation therefor be first made in money, or ascertained and paid into court for the owner, irrespective of any benefit from any improvement proposed by such corporation; which compensation shall be ascertained by a jury, unless a jury be waived, as in other civil cases in a court of record, as shall be prescribed by law." So far as this section imposes upon the party seeking to condemn lands for public use a burden greater than those provided for in section 1248 of the Code of Civil Procedure, it is confined to private corporations. Moran v. Ross, supra. Its language is plain, and, so far as it requires the payment of compensation "irrespective of any benefit from any improvement proposed by such corporation," it is carefully limited to "corporations other than municipal." Counsel for respondent contends that such a construction of the constitution and statutes would render the provision in the constitution absurd, and make one rule of damages for a corporation and another for private individuals. Such may be the effect of these provisions, but if so it is a matter with which we have nothing to do. We have only to declare the law as it is, not to change it to avoid what may seem to be an absurd or unjust provision, where it is plain and unambiguous in its terms. Railway Co. v. Porter, 74 Cal. 261, 15 Pac. Rep. 774, relied upon by counsel for appellants, is not in point, as the party seeking to condemn there was a private corporation and strictly within the terms of the constitution. The court below should have allowed the deduction of the benefits found, as against the damages resulting to the lands of the defendant not taken. Judgment reversed, with instructions to the court below to modify the same in accordance with this opinion.

We concur: McFARLAND, J.; PATERSON, J.; THORNTON, J.; SHARPSTEIN, J.

BEATTY, C. J., (concurring.) I concurred in the opinion of the court in the case of Moran v. Ross, ante, 547, wherein it was held that under our statutes natural persons may condemn lands for railroad purposes; but subsequently, on consideration of the petition for rehearing, I became so doubtful of the soundness of that conclusion as to think the question at least deserving of reargument and further consideration. The result to which the doctrine of that case leads —as illustrated in this case, viz., that there is one rule of damages for private individuals and another rule for corporations, when they seek to condemn lands for the same purpose —deepens my conviction that the correctness of our former decision is open to serious question. If, however, we were right in that decision, and, whether right or wrong, so long as we adhere to it, the conclusion reached by Mr. Justice WORKS in the foregoing opinion seems to be inevitable.

TURNER v. TURNER et al. (No. 12,505.)

PRESUMPTION OF PAYMENT.

In a suit to foreclose a lien based on six promissory notes, both the maker and the payee were dead. The notes could not be found. When last seen, the maker had them. The payee was executor of the maker, and in reporting claims against the estate did not mention the notes. The evidence as to non-payment was vague. Held, that the presumption was the notes were paid.

Hundley & Gale and R. C. Long, for appellant. Gray & Sexton and F. C. Lusk, for appellees.

HAYNE, C. This was a suit to foreclose a vendor's lien to secure the amount of six promissory notes. One of the defenses was that the notes had been paid, and the trial court found this to be the fact. The counsel for the appellant contend that this finding is not supported by the evidence, but we think that the evidence must be held to be sufficient to support it. The notes were made by one J. T. Turner to his brother Robert Turner, whose administrator is the plaintiff here. Both brothers were dead before the suit was commenced, and there was no direct evidence for or against the payment. The plaintiff did not produce the notes at the trial, or give any satisfactory explanation of their absence. It was shown that diligent search had been made among the papers of Robert Turner, and inquiry made of every person who would be likely to know about them, but nothing was heard of them. The last seen of some of them was that they were in possession of the maker. The possession of the notes is a material circumstance in relation to the question of payment. Possession by the maker raises a rebuttable presumption of payment. Code Civil Proc. § 1963, subd. 9; 2 Greenl. Ev. § 527; Zeigler v. Gray, 12 Serg. & R. 42; Lipscomb v. De Lemos, 68 Ala. 592; Carroll v. Bowie, 7 Gill, 41. And, on the other hand, possession by the payee is prima facie evidence of non-payment. Somervail v. Gillies, 31 Wis. 155; Ritter v. Schenk, 101 Ill. 389; Haywood v. Lewis, 65 Ga. 225. And, upon this principle, it has been held in this state that, if payment is denied, the onus is upon the plaintiff to prove the non-payment, at least by the production of the note. Bank v. Christensen, 51 Cal. 572. In other words, if the plaintiff does not produce the note or account for its absence, the presumption is against him.

There was evidence tending to strengthen this presumption. Robert Turner, the payee, was executor of his brother's will; and, in making out the appraisement, he gave to the appraiser a list of the debts and incumbrances of the estate, on which occasion, according to one of the appraisers, the following occurred: "After the debts was all in I asked if there was any further claims against the estate that he knew of, and he, Robert Turner, told me there was none. I was referring more particularly to that land." The inventory and appraisement were introduced in connection with this testimony, and contained no reference to the notes or lien. Although the ascertainment of the debts which the deceased owed was not the duty of the appraisers, yet the conversation was admissible as an admission of the payee, and the inventory was admissible in connection therewith. There were other admissions of the payee to the same effect. When the will was read, he declared to the attorney that he had no interest in the property of the estate, beyond what was given to him by the will. And upon his death-bed, when some of his family were around him, he called for his clothing, "took his purse out of his pocket, and poured out a few dollars and said, 'Here, Mary, take this; it is all I have in the world.'" The evidence against the payment was of the same character, consisting of evidence of the family and friendly relations between the parties, and of assertions by Robert Turner, on different occasions, of a claim against the property, on the ground that it had not been paid for. But the testimony in reference to the more specific assertions were contradicted. The foregoing is the substance of the material evidence which bears upon the question, and it certainly does not show that the notes were not paid. The counsel for the appellant rely a good deal upon "undertones" which they say are heard throughout the testimony. But this is not the kind of evidence upon which an appellate court can be asked to set aside a decision of fact. In this view it is not necessary to consider the question whether the defendant Thresher was a bona fide purchaser. There was no error in the admission of evidence. The inventory and appraisement and the conversation in connection therewith have already been referred to. The question at folio 133 was entirely irrelevant. The objections on pages 89, 90 were properly overruled. The evidence simply went to show what was the consideration of the conveyance from Robert Turner to his brother. The other matters do not require special notice. We therefore advise that the judgment and order denying a new trial be affirmed.

We concur: FOOTE, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

TAX-DEEDS—NOTICE.

Pol. Code Cal. § 3785, (act March, 1885,) provided that a purchaser of property at tax-sale must, 30 days before he applies for a deed, serve the owner with a certain notice. S. purchased at a tax-sale, February, 1885, at which time the law permitted him to obtain a deed one year after sale without notice to the owner. Held, that section 3785 applied to all deeds obtained after its passage, and a deed procured after that time, without notice, was void.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Stanislaus county; WILLIAM O. MINOR, Judge.

Wright & Hazen, for appellant. Stonesifer & Minor, for respondent.

HAYNE, C. Ejectment. Judgment for defendant; plaintiff appeals. The case turns upon the validity of a tax-deed, under which the plaintiff claims. The deed was made without any notice to the owner, as required by section 3785, Pol. Code. The sale was made in February, 1885, at which time the law was that a redemption could be made in 12 months, and, if not made within that time, the purchaser could obtain his deed without giving notice to the owner. But by an amendment passed in March, 1885, it was provided that "the purchaser of property sold for delinquent taxes, or his assignee, must, 30 days previous to the expiration of the time for redemption, or 30 days before he applies for a deed, serve upon the owner of the property purchased, or upon the person occupying the property, if said property is occupied, a written notice, stating that said property, or a portion thereof, has been sold for delinquent taxes, giving the date of sale, the amount of property sold, the amount for which it was sold, the amount then due, and the time when the right of redemption will expire, or when the purchaser will apply for a deed; and the owner of the property shall have the right of redemption indefinitely until such notice shall have been given and said deed applied for, upon the payment of the fees, percentages, penalties, and costs, as provided by law." Pol. Code, § 3785. We think that this amendment was intended to apply to all applications for deeds after it took effect. The counsel argue, however, that it was not within the power of the legislature to extend the time for redemptions on sales previously made, because they say such an extension impairs the validity of a contract. It may be assumed, for the purposes of the case, that the legislature cannot make an absolute extension of the time for redemption of property previously sold. But this has not been attempted to be done by the provision in question. The purchaser may still obtain his deed at the expiration of 12 months provided he takes the proper proceedings. If he does not take them it is his own fault, and he alone is responsible for the consequences. The question, therefore, is whether the legislature had the power to require notice to be given of applications for deeds of sales made before the passage of the law. This precise point was decided in Curtis v. Whitney, 13 Wall. 68, in which the court upheld the validity of the law. We think that this decision is sound in principle. The change affected the remedy merely, which was within the control of the legislature. See, generally, Redemption Co. v. Sedgwick, 15 Cal. 516; Moore v. Martin, 38 Cal. 428. We therefore advise that the order appealed from be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the order appealed from is affirmed.

KNOCK v. BUNNELL. (No. 12,469.)

HOMESTEAD DECLARATION.

Where a homestead declaration contains no estimate of the cash value of the property, as required by Civil Code Cal. § 1263, it is void.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Lassen county; M. MARSTELLER, Judge.

Spencer & Raker, for appellant. Goodwin & Dodge, for respondent.

HAYNE, C. The transcript in this case is improperly entitled. Simpson v. Applegate, 75 Cal. 345, 17 Pac. Rep. 237. The action was brought to foreclose a mortgage executed by one H. C. Stockton, since deceased. No claim was presented to the administrator, the plaintiff having waived in his complaint all recourse against any property of the estate other than the mortgaged property. Judgment passed for the plaintiff, and the defendant appeals. The main ground relied upon for the reversal is that a homestead existed upon the property, and that, therefore, a claim should have been presented under the rule of Camp v. Grider, 62 Cal. 20. It is sufficient answer to this contention to say that no homestead existed upon the property. The homestead declaration set out in the answer and introduced in evidence contains no estimate of the cash value of the property, as required by section 1263 of the Civil Code. It was therefore void. Ashley v. Olmstead, 54 Cal. 616; Ames v. Eldred, 55 Cal. 136. In this view the evidence introduced for the purpose of showing that the homestead had ceased to exist was irrelevant and immaterial, and, if it be assumed that there was error in its admission, such error was without injury. The other matters do not require special notice. We therefore advise that the judgment and order denying a new trial be affirmed.

We concur: GIBSON, C.; FOOTE, C.

KING v. GILDERSLEEVE et al. (No. 11,882.)

SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE—PLEADING—MUTUALITY OF CONTRACT.

1. C., in consideration of services to be rendered by plaintiff as attorney for him in litigation then pending concerning land, agreed to convey to plaintiff a certain lot "out of the premises which may be recovered by him." After C.'s death, and after plaintiff had performed services in the litigation, C.'s administrator compromised it against plaintiff's advice, and conveyed C.'s interest in the land to B., the other litigant. Held, that a complaint in a suit for specific performance need not allege against C.'s administrator and B., and purchasers from B., that C. had any title to the land, as plaintiff was entitled, as against all the defendants, to a conveyance of C.'s interest, whatever it may have been.

2. But such a contract cannot be specifically enforced, as there is no mutuality of remedy thereon, where the complaint does not show a substantial performance by plaintiff of his contract to render services, the refusal of C.'s administrator to continue the litigation not being such a waiver as to warrant specific performance.

George E. Lawrence, for appellant. Garber, Thornton & Bishop and Lloyd & Wood, for respondents.

WORKS, J. The deceased, Corwin, and the defendant Baldwin being in litigation involving the title to a certain tract of land, the former entered into a written contract with the appellant's intestate, by which he agreed that, in consideration of his services, to be rendered as an attorney for said Corwin, in said litigation, he would convey to Lawrence "a lot of land out of the premises which may be recovered by him, fronting 30 feet on Hayes street, by a uniform depth southerly of 137½ feet, which is to be of equal quality and value as the remainder of said premises, free of incumbrances created by him." Lawrence entered upon the performance of the services, and a long litigation followed, the case coming once to this court. Before the litigation was concluded Corwin died, and the respondent Gildersleeve was appointed his administrator. Gildersleeve declined to prosecute the action further, although Lawrence requested it, and was ready and willing to carry out his part of the contract. Gildersleeve, against the advice and without the consent of Lawrence, compromised the litigation with Baldwin for $1,000; and, under an order of the probate court, procured in furtherance of the terms of compromise, conveyed to Baldwin all the right, title, and interest of Corwin in the property. This suit was brought to compel a specific performance of the contract of Corwin to convey to Lawrence the 30-feet front of the property, and the complaint shows substantially the above facts. Baldwin and the defendant Grayson, who took under him, as well as Corwin's administrator, are made parties defendant. A demurrer to the complaint was sustained, and judgment rendered against the plaintiff, from which this appeal is taken, and is being prosecuted by King, the administrator of Lawrence.

We are inclined to doubt the correctness of the ruling of the court below, on account of the extreme length of the brief of the learned counsel for respondent in its support. Knowing the abilities of counsel, and their accurate knowledge of the law, a brief of 85 pages, coming from them in support of a single ruling of the court below, casts great doubt upon such ruling. However, the learned counsel may not have had time to prepare a short brief, and for that reason have cast upon us the unnecessary labor of reading and extracting therefrom the points made. If we overlook any of them, counsel will readily understand the reason.

It is urged, as an objection to the complaint, that it does not allege that Corwin had any title to the land. This was unnecessary. The question whether he had title or not was the question in litigation between Corwin and Baldwin. Lawrence had agreed to recover the land for Corwin, and in consideration thereof was to have a part of the land. Neither Corwin nor his administrator could assert, as against him, that Corwin had no title, and thereby defeat his claim. He was entitled to proceed with the suit and obtain a title; and, as Corwin's administrator prevented his doing so, he was, as against Corwin's estate, entitled, so far as this point is concerned, to a conveyance of Corwin's interest in the land, whatever it might have been. He would also have been entitled to such a conveyance, as against Baldwin and purchasers under him, if the contract had been fully performed on his part. Under such a conveyance he would have stood in Corwin's shoes; and, if Baldwin had a better title, his deed would have availed him nothing. If Corwin's title was good as against Baldwin, Lawrence was entitled to it, if he performed his part of the contract; so that, in neither view that can be taken of it, was it necessary for Lawrence to show title in Corwin in order to entitle him to recover. The fact that the litigation, as between Corwin and Baldwin, was compromised, could not affect his right to such a deed. It would, of course, give him no better title than Corwin had, and to that Baldwin, and purchasers from him with notice, cannot be heard to complain. It is true, as contended by the appellant, that an attorney cannot prevent a compromise by his client, but it is equally true that the client cannot, nor can the opposite party, having knowledge of his rights, so compromise the action as to defeat the rights of the attorney in the subject-matter of the action.

But the complaint was fatally defective for the reason that the contract was not one that could be specifically enforced. To authorize the specific enforcement of a contract, the remedy under it must be mutual and susceptible of enforcement by both of the parties. There are certain exceptions to this rule not affecting this case. The performance of a contract for personal services, confidential in their nature, will not be compelled, and this being so, the party bound by the contract to perform such services cannot compel performance by the other party for that reason alone. Cooper v. Pena, 21 Cal. 409, is in point, and decisive of the question. In that case it was said: "So far as the agreement is unperformed, the plaintiff cannot be compelled to perform it on his part, for equity will not enforce a contract for personal services, but leave the party to his remedy at law. In respect to the remedy, therefore, there is no mutuality, and it is universally admitted that equity will not enforce a contract where the party asking its enforcement cannot himself be compelled to perform it. The contract must be just and equal in its provisions, and the subject-matter must be such that equity can take jurisdiction of it, and compel performance by both of the parties. The remedy must be mutual as well as the obligation, and, where the contract is of such a nature that it cannot be specifically enforced as to one of the parties, equity will not enforce it against the other. * * * We have already stated that the plaintiff cannot be compelled to complete the services which he agreed to perform, and the fact that he has offered to complete them is not equivalent to actual performance. The rejection of the offer by the defendant excuses the performance as a condition precedent, but does not release the plaintiff from his obligation to perform, so long as he insists upon the agreement. As this is an obligation which the court cannot enforce, there is no principle which would justify it in enforcing the obligation on the other side; and the only course is to decline to interfere, and leave the plaintiff to his remedy for damages." So in Vassault v. Edwards, 43 Cal. 465, it is said: "In Cooper v. Pena the consideration for the land to be conveyed was to be paid by the personal services of the plaintiff; and the court rightly, and in entire accord with the authorities, some of which we have above cited, held that, as the court could not specifically enforce the performance of the personal services, the remedy was not mutual. There is no exception to the rule—at least none now occurs to us—that the contract, though signed by both parties, will not be specifically executed at the instance of one party, unless performance on his part can also be compelled. The proposition, that specific performance of the contract would not be decreed when the party asking its enforcement could not be compelled to perform it, was decisive of the case, and upon it the case was, in fact, decided; and in our opinion the decision is sustained by the overwhelming weight of the authorities. The exceptions which are stated in some of the cases prove the rule. A suit cannot be maintained by an infant, because he cannot be compelled to perform the contract; but, if the infant commence the action after he arrives at the age of majority, specific performance will be decreed, because there is then a mutuality of remedy, and the plaintiff can be compelled to perform on his part. A sale to a married woman furnishes another illustration. She cannot maintain a suit for specific performance, because she cannot be compelled to perform the agreement on her part." The rule is not applicable where the personal services have been fully or substantially performed, or where full performance has been waived. Ballard v. Carr, 48 Cal. 79; Howard v. Throckmorton, Id. 489.

The complaint does not show even a substantial performance on the part of Lawrence, and the refusal of the administrator to go on with the litigation could not, under the circumstances of this case, be regarded as such a waiver of performance as would entitle the appellant to a specific performance, but might entitle him to damages.

This objection to the complaint being fatal, other points made by the respondent against it need not be considered. Judgment affirmed.

CROSSMAN v. DAVIS. (No. 12,920.)

RES ADJUDICATA.

A stipulation, by which all parties to a suit involving the title to certain land compromised and dismissed the action, is a bar to a suit involving the title to the same property by a grantee of one of the parties who purchased with knowledge of the agreement.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county; JAMES A. GIBSON, Judge.

E. A. Crossman sued C. G. Davis in partition. The case turned upon the stipulation of Raynor, present plaintiff's grantor, and proceedings thereunder, in the case of P. A. Raynor v. W. H. and Sarah J. Mintzer, in which case the then plaintiff, P. A. Raynor, sought partition of the same lands described in the present case, and in which former suit defendants therein filed a cross-complaint, in which case, under the said stipulation, the cross-complaint was withdrawn and dismissed, and thereupon by consent of defendants plaintiff dismissed said action. Defendant claims that by reason of such dismissal in former case, and the stipulation, plaintiff is barred from again proceeding in a new action to obtain partition; the defendant here being the grantee of defendants in that suit, and present plaintiff here, Crossman being grantee of former plaintiff Raynor, and also having purchased with full knowledge of all the facts. The dismissal in the former suit was by agreement.

Crossman & Woodside, for appellant. Rowell & Rowell and A. B. Hotchkiss, for respondent.

WORKS, J. Action for the partition of real estate. Findings and judgment for the defendant that he was the owner of all the property in controversy. The appeal is from the judgment, and comes to us on the judgment roll. The only real question presented by the record is whether or not a certain agreement between the grantors of the parties to this action, by which said parties compromised and dismissed an action pending between them, involving the title to this same property, was a bar to the plaintiff's claim to an interest therein. The court below found that the dismissal of the action under a special agreement involving other disputed matters was sufficient to bar the plaintiff's claim, and in this we think the court was right. Merritt v. Campbell, 47 Cal. 542. The plaintiff had full knowledge of the agreement and dismissal, and must be held to have been bound thereby. Judgment affirmed.

Franklin et al. v. Dutton. (No. 12,946.)

Venue in Civil Cases.

Under Code Civil Proc. § 392, providing that actions for the recovery of real property, or an estate or interest therein, or for the determination of such interest, must be tried in the county in which the subject of such interest is situated, a suit for the reformation of a contract for the sale of land must be tried in the county where the land is situated.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Santa Barbara county; R. M. Dillard, Judge.

B. F. Thomas, for appellants. Hall & Rodgers, for appellee.

Sharpstein, J. This action was commenced in the superior court of the county of Santa Barbara for the reformation of a contract for the sale by plaintiffs to defendant of a certain tract of land lying in said county. Defendant demurred to the complaint, and at the same time demanded a change of the place of trial to San Francisco, the place of his residence. The court made an order changing the place of trial as demanded. From that order plaintiffs appealed, and contend here that under section 392[1] of the Code of Civil Procedure they are entitled to have the action tried in the county of Santa Barbara, where it was commenced. If it be an action for the determination, in any form, of a right or interest in real estate, situated in Santa Barbara county, it must be tried in that county. This action, as we construe it, is for the determination of a right or interest in real estate. Order reversed.

Green v. McMann et al. (No. 13,092.)

Record on Appeal.

1. A certificate to a transcript which merely states that the "transcript is correct," and does not state that numerous erasures, interlineations, etc., were in the transcript when the certificate was given, is insufficient.

2. Where the copy of a transcript served on appellees does not contain all the interlineations and corrections in the original transcript, the service is insufficient.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; T. H. Rearden, Judge.

A. D. Splivalo, for appellants. Mitchell & McPike, for respondent.

McFarland, J. Respondent moves to dismiss the appeal herein on seven different grounds, each of which is entitled to consideration. We will notice a few of them:

1. The first is that the transcript is not a printed transcript, within the meaning of rule 2 of this court. The facts with reference to this point are that, although the original transcript is mainly in print, it contains a large number of erasures and 23 corrections and alterations in writing,—some between the printed lines, and others on the margin; and, in addition, there are certain capital letters scattered along the margin, which, on their face, are of uncertain meaning. Of course, it would be allowable to thus correct one or two typographical errors in a printed transcript, but the condition in this respect of the transcript in the case at bar is beyond the reach of clemency.

2. The second ground is that the transcript—not considering the erasures and written matter—is not printed on paper of the size required by the rule, and has no blank fly-sheet cover, etc., as the rules require. The facts on this point are as stated by respondent.

3. The third ground is that the transcript is not certified as required by law. The facts on this point are: First, that the certificate merely states that the "transcript is correct," and does not state, in terms, that the papers are correct copies of the originals on file; and, second, that it does not state that the erasures, interlineations, and alterations were made before the certificate was given.

4. The fourth ground is that "the transcript contains so many errors and corrections as to have become unintelligible." It is difficult to say whether an inspection of the transcript establishes this allegation or not; it certainly tends strongly in that direction.

5. The fifth ground is that "no copy of the transcript has been served upon this respondent or his attorneys." The facts on this point are that the copy served contained only four of the corrections on the original transcript, one of them being a paster.

The other grounds go rather to the merits of the appeal, and we do not care to discuss them here.

We have noticed the grounds of the motion in detail, not because each of them, in itself, would furnish sufficient reason for dismissing the appeal, but to show the general situation of the case, as bearing on the discretion (if there be room for discretion) which this court should exercise in the premises. We think that the motion to dismiss should be granted, upon, at least, the third and fifth grounds stated. Waiving the question whether or not a general statement that the "transcript is correct" is sufficient in a clerk's certificate, it is clear that, in this instance, the certificate should have shown that the numerous erasures, interlineations, marginal writings, etc., were in the transcript when the certificate was given. Any other rule would subject a record to most dangerous alterations and mutilations. And, again, no matter under what circumstances the changes were made, it is apparent that no substantially correct copy of the transcript was served on appellant. For these reasons the motion is granted. Appeal dismissed.

[1] Section 392 provides that actions "for the recovery of real property or of an estate or interest therein, or for the determination in any form, of such right or interest and for injuries to real property" must be tried in the county where the subject of the action is situated.

We concur: BEATTY, C. J.; SHARPSTEIN, J.; WORKS, J.; PATERSON, J.

THORNTON, J. I concur in the judgment on the ground that no copy of the transcript was served.

HUBBOCK v. ROSS et al. (No. 13,148.)

APPEAL—RECORD.

A motion to dismiss an appeal because a transcript was not filed in time will not be granted where the reason of the delay was that appellant, a poor man, was unable to procure the money in time to get the transcript printed.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Marin county; E. B. MAHON, Judge.

Moses G. Cobb and Hepburn Wilkins, for appellant. Wm. Barber, for appellees.

PER CURIAM. There is a motion to dismiss this appeal. The appellant, not being able to get his transcript on file in time, applied for an extension of time, and this was renewed until three extensions were granted. The respondents move to dismiss, on the ground that no sufficient reason existed for the failure to file the transcript in time, and that the court was misled and induced to make the several orders extending time by the affidavits of counsel for the appellant, which it is claimed, did not set out the true reason for the delay. It is quite apparent to us that counsel for appellant did not deal frankly with the court, and his course in the matter is subject to criticism. Therefore, if his interests alone were to be considered, we would dismiss the appeal without hesitation. But the true reason of the delay, as now developed, was that the appellant is a poor man, and was unable in time to procure the means with which to get his transcript printed, or arrange to have the same printed in any other way, although he endeavored to do so. The expenses of taking appeals, under our practice, are extremely burdensome to litigants of small means, and no doubt frequently result in injustice. For that reason we do not feel that we should deprive the appellant of the benefit of his appeal under the circumstances of this case. The courts should be open to all litigants alike, whether rich or poor, and every facility should be afforded them to be heard. But we take this occasion to express our unqualified disapproval of the growing habit on the part of some attorneys practicing in this court of neglecting to prepare their transcripts and briefs in time to be printed, and then burdening this court with applications for extensions. These applications are of almost daily occurrence, and in perhaps 99 out of every 100 of these cases, if the real reason for the failure to file in time were stated, it would be the neglect of the attorney. Usually it is that the printer has failed to print in time; but whether the manuscript was furnished him in time or not is left to be conjectured. If counsel will do their duty in this respect this court will have more time to devote to other more urgent and important matters. Motion denied.

ACTION ON CONTRACT.

1. Under Civil Code Cal. §§ 1614, 1615, providing that every written contract imports a consideration, as if it were a promissory note, in a suit on a contract for the payment of money it is not necessary to allege a consideration.

2. A general finding that all the allegations of the complaint are true, and all the averments of the answer untrue, is sufficient.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; A. W HUTTON, Judge.

Hall and others sued Williams and others on a contract for the payment of money. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals.

Wells, Guthrie & Lee, for appellants. W. S. & I. Hall, pro sese, and Reymert & Messmore.

HAYNE, C. The transcript in this case is improperly entitled. The plaintiffs in the court below are put as the defendants on appeal, and the defendants in the court below are put as the plaintiffs on appeal. Under our system this is improper and confusing. Simpson v. Applegate, 75 Cal. 345, 17 Pac. Rep. 237. The action was upon a contract for the payment of money. Judgment was given for the plaintiffs, and the defendants appeal. The first point is that the complaint does not allege that there was a consideration for the contract; but, in the first place, we think that a consideration is alleged. By their contract the defendants acknowledged themselves to be indebted to plaintiffs in a certain sum, and promised to pay the same. And it is alleged that "the said obligation and indebtedness was made and executed by the said defendants, Williams and Adams, as final settlement of accounts for transactions in real estate between them and the plaintiffs and defendant Frank Berton, and for good, valid, and substantial consideration." And in the second place the contract was in writing and was set forth in hæc verba, and in such case it is not necessary to aver a consideration. Under the Code every written contract imports a consideration, as much as if it were a promissory note, (Civil Code, §§ 1614, and 1615,) and therefore it is not necessary that a consideration should be specifically averred. Winters v. Rush, 34 Cal. 136. The next point is that the general finding, that all the allegations of the complaint are true and all the averments of the answer are untrue, is not sufficient. But it is well settled that it is sufficient. Gwinn v. Hamilton, 75 Cal. 266, 17 Pac. Rep. 212; Johnson v. Klein, 70 Cal. 186, 11 Pac. Rep. 606. In addition to this, the findings dispose of all the material issues specifically. The only other point is that the judgment was for one dollar less than authorized by the findings. The appeal is entirely destitute of merit, and was evidently taken for delay. We therefore advise that the judgment be affirmed, with 20 per cent. damages.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is affirmed, and it appearing to the court that the appeal herein was taken for delay, it is ordered that there be added to the costs 20 per cent. of the amount of the judgment as damages, by virtue of the provisions of section 957, Code Civil Proc.

PEREGOY et al. v. SELLICK. (No. 12,441.)

WATER-COURSE—QUIETING TITLE—PLEADING.

1. One who has appropriated all the water in a stream for purposes of irrigation may sue persons who afterwards acquire vacant land above plaintiff's tract, and divert part of the stream to irrigate their crops, to quiet his title to the full flow of the stream.

2. Where the complaint alleges that defendants were preparing to divert the whole stream under a claim of right, and the answer asserts a right to use 40 inches of the stream for irrigating defendants' crops, and the court finds that plaintiff was entitled to the full flow of the stream, it is sufficiently shown that defendants claimed water at a time when plaintiff was entitled to it.

3. There need not be an actual interference with plaintiff's right before an action can be brought. The assertion of an adverse claim is sufficient.

A. L. Shinn and Spencer & Raker, for appellants. Goodwin & Davis, for respondent.

BEATTY, C. J. The record and the brief of the appellants in this case bear the above title, which, in view of the long-settled practice of the court not to transpose the names of the parties when defendant appeals, is confusing, if not positively misleading. We take the occasion to express the hope that we may receive no more records or briefs entitled in this way. The case is this: Sellick, the plaintiff, owned lands bordering on a natural stream. He went above his land, on land of the government, put a dam in the stream, and by means of a ditch of sufficient capacity, heading above the dam, diverted all the water of the stream, which he conducted to the higher parts of his own land, and has since continuously used thereon to irrigate his crops of grass, etc., and for domestic purposes. Subsequent to this appropriation by plaintiff, the defendants acquired from the government lands bordering on the stream above plaintiff's dam, and commenced diverting water from the stream by means of ditches, for the irrigation of their crops. The plaintiff thereupon commenced this action to quiet his title to the full flow of the stream down to the head of the ditch. In his complaint he alleged his ownership of the land, and appropriation of the water for beneficial uses, substantially as above stated, and charged that the defendants had "entered upon said stream above said land and above the head of the ditch of plaintiff, and made some claim to the whole of the water flowing in said stream, and are making preparations to divert and use said water so as to deprive plaintiff of the use thereof."

It will be seen that the entry and diversion, or claim of right to divert, by the defendants, is not expressly charged to have been subsequent to plaintiff's appropriation. But it is charged "that whatever claim the defendants, or either of them, have or may make to said water, or the use thereof, the said claim or right is entirely subject to plaintiff's claim and title to said water, and is wholly invalid and without right as against the appropriation of said water by plaintiff." The prayer of the complaint is that defendants be required to set forth their claim, etc., and that plaintiff have judgment "quieting him in the use, right to use, and title, to all of said water as aforesaid, against the defendants, and either of them, and that said defendants have no right or title to the same, or any portion thereof," etc. To this complaint the defendants interposed a general demurrer, which was overruled, whereupon they answered, denying plaintiff's appropriation, and setting up their riparian rights and use of the water diverted by them for irrigation of their crops. The case was tried by the court upon these issues. Findings, conclusions, and judgment were made and given in favor of the plaintiff. The defendants appeal from the judgment upon the judgment roll.

1. It is contended that the superior court erred in overruling the demurrer to the complaint. We do not think so. The complaint is, perhaps, justly amenable to some of the criticisms directed against it, but it states facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. It presents a case substantially like the case of Standart v. Water Co., 19 Pac. Rep. 689, in which we held that this action would lie to quiet title to rights of the character here involved.

2. It is contended that the superior court has failed to find upon all the material issues raised by the pleadings, and that the findings made do not support the judgment. We think every material fact has been found, and that the findings do support the judgment. The two points under this head, upon which counsel for appellant most strongly insist, are (a) that it is not shown by allegation or finding that the defendants claim any water which belongs to plaintiff at a time when plaintiff shows himself entitled to it; and (b) that defendants are not shown to have interfered with the use of the water at the season when plaintiff was entitled to it. As to the first point the complaint shows that defendants were making preparations to divert the whole of the water, so as to deprive plaintiff of the use of it, and that they did this under claim of a right to do so. The answer asserts a right to use 40 inches of the stream on the lands of defendants for irrigating crops, (necessarily during the irrigating season,) and this assertion of right renders a finding upon the point unnecessary. As to the second point it is only necessary to say that the right to maintain this action does not depend on an actual interference with plaintiff's right. The assertion of an adverse claim is all that is required. No error appears in the record. Judgment affirmed.

PEREGOY v. MCKISSICK. (No. 12,442.)

WATER-COURSES—INJUNCTION.

Plaintiff constructed a dam in a stream on vacant land, and diverted the entire stream to his land for purposes of irrigation. Afterwards defendant acquired title to the land on which the dam was built, and he removed a portion of the dam so as to allow the water to flow in its natural course, using it to irrigate his crops. It did not appear that plaintiff used the water for irrigation, though he diverted it for that purpose, or that he was in any way damaged by defendant's acts. Held, that defendant would not be enjoined from interfering with the dam.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Lassen county; M. MARSTELLER, Judge.

A. L. Shinn and Spencer & Raker, for appellants. Goodwin & Davis, for respondent.

BEATTY, C. J. There is the same fault in the entitling of this appeal as that noticed in Peregoy v. Sellick, ante, 966, (No. 12,441,) just decided. It should be entitled McKissick v. Peregoy. This is an appeal from a judgment enjoining the defendant from interfering with a head-dam by means of which the plaintiff diverts water from a stream which flows in its natural course through the defendant's lands. This head-dam and connecting ditch were constructed by plaintiff on the land now owned by defendant, while the title thereto remained in the government, and they have been used to divert the water of the stream to lands belonging to the plaintiff. The defendant, owning land bordering on the stream below plaintiff's dam, and needing the water for irrigation, has several times removed portions of the dam so as to cause the water to flow down to his own ditches, and claims the right to do so, and is insolvent. But it is not found that plaintiff will be damaged by the acts done and threatened by the defendant except nominally. It is found that the water is useful and necessary for the irrigation of plaintiff's land, and that he diverted it for that purpose; but it is not found that he has ever used it for that purpose, or that he has ever raised, or attempted to raise, any sort of crops on his land. For aught that appears he has simply turned the water out of the stream and allowed it to run to waste, and when defendant turned it back into its natural channel through his land (where he did use it for beneficial purposes) it does not appear that plaintiff was at all damaged. The finding shows he was not damaged. Under such circumstances a party claiming as an appropriator has no right to an injunction against a riparian proprietor, and the judgment is therefore erroneous. Another point is also presented by the record in this case, viz., the validity of an appropriation not initiated by compliance with the provisions of the Civil Code as to posting and recording of notice. This question was decided in the case of De Necochea v. Curtis, 20 Pac. Rep. 563, and a rehearing afterwards granted. As counsel in this case have not argued that question, and its decision is not necessary to a disposition of his appeal, we shall leave it untouched until we come to reconsider the case of De Necochea v. Curtis. For the reason above specified the judgment is reversed and cause remanded.

We concur: WORKS, J.; SHARPSTEIN, J.; PATERSON, J.; MCFARLAND, J.

THORNTON, J. I concur, and will add that if the plaintiff has never used the water for any useful or beneficial purpose, he was never an appropriator, and if he has ever used it for the purposes above mentioned, and then ceased to use it, his right has ceased. This is so by both statute (Civil Code, § 1411) and the law fixed by the decisions in this state, made before the statute was enacted. If he ever appropriated the water, or his right has ceased by non-user, we cannot see what right he has against the defendant, a riparian proprietor, to continue his diversion and waste of the water.

RAPE—EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTIONS—JUDGMENT—ENTRY.

1. On a trial for rape, where the prosecutrix, a girl between 10 and 11 years old, testifies that defendant, her step-father, with whom she lived, was in the habit of beating her, and thus keeping her in constant fear, and that she submitted to him under the influence of such fear, the testimony of a witness to the effect that, living in a house close to defendant's, she could hear him beating prosecutrix, is admissible as corroborative.

2. Prosecutrix, during her testimony, made a remark, not brought out by any question, indicating that defendant had, or attempted to have, intercourse with her on former occasions. The district attorney then asked, without objection, "Do you mean to say that he has done these things before?" to which she replied that he had twice before. Held, that the district attorney was then properly allowed to ask, "How came he to do it on these two former occasions?" and "Why didn't you tell your mother?"

3. A charge on the subject of reasonable doubt, that "it would not be sufficient to justify a conviction if the jury should be satisfied of the guilt of the defendant to such a moral certainty as would influence their minds in the important affairs of life," was properly refused, as calculated to confuse the jury.

4. An instruction that before the jury can convict they must be satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that defendant is guilty of the crime as alleged; that a charge of this nature is one peculiarly hard for a defendant to clear himself of; that from the nature of the case the prosecutrix and defendant are usually the only witnesses; that the jury should be perfectly satisfied from the case made out by the witnesses, and corroborating evidence, if any, before finding defendant guilty; that, if not satisfied, they should acquit; and that the "reasonable doubt" mentioned is as follows: "A defendant in a criminal action is presumed to be innocent until the contrary is proved, by not the mere preponderance of evidence, but by evidence entirely convincing to the jury; and, in case of a reasonable doubt whether his guilt is satisfactorily shown, he is entitled to an acquittal,"—is sufficient.

5. Where the clerk omits to enter the judgment in a criminal case when it is pronounced, defendant being then present, an order to enter the judgment nunc pro tunc may afterwards be made, though defendant is not in court.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; W. P. WADE, Judge.

Hugh J. & Wm. Crawford, for appellant. George A. Johnson, Atty. Gen., for the People.

MCFARLAND, J. 1. The defendant was charged with and convicted of the crime of rape, and he appeals from the judgment. Appellant contends that the court below erred in allowing the testimony of Mrs. Amanda Stevens to the effect that, living in a house next and close to that of defendant, she heard him whipping and beating the prosecuting witness. The prosecuting witness, upon whom the alleged crime is charged to have been committed, was a young girl between 10 and 11 years old, and lived with the defendant who was her step-father. She testified that defendant was in the habit of cruelly beating her, and thus keeping her in constant fear and terror, and that she submitted to him under circumstances which, without such fear and terror, might have indicated consent, (if, indeed, consent of such a child could have been found by the jury at all.) The testimony of Mrs. Stevens was admitted by the court expressly upon the ground—and upon no other ground—of corroborating the statement of the prosecuting witness as to cruel treatment and fear, and we think that for this purpose it was properly admitted. 2 Bish. Crim. Law, §§ 1124, 1125; Reg. v. Jones, 4 Law T. (N. S.) 154. What is said in People v. Tyler, 36 Cal. 522, does not apply to the case at bar, where the party injured was a mere child under the defendant's control, and where the main question was whether or not she was influenced by fear to make less resistance than should have appeared under other circumstances. The fact that the beating to which Mrs. Stevens testified the most positively happened about a year before the alleged rape, goes only to the weight, and not to the admissibility, of the testimony.

2. During the examination in chief of the prosecuting witness, she voluntarily, and not in response to a question asked by the prosecution, made a remark indicating that the defendant had, or attempted to have, intercourse with her on occasions prior to the time alleged in the information. The district attorney then asked: "Do you mean to say that he has done these things before?" To which question she answered that he had twice before. The district attorney then asked her if on these occasions she had consented to his doing it, and she answered that she had not. Up to this point no objection was made to the testimony by the defendant. The district attorney then asked the witness, "How came he to do it on these two former occasions?" and "Why didn't you tell your mother?" Defendant objected to these questions as irrelevant, incompetent, and immaterial. The court overruled the objections, and defendant excepted, and he contends that this ruling was an error for which the judgment should be reversed. The witness answered, substantially, that on the two former occasions she was overcome by fear and terror, and that she did not tell her mother because she was "so scared," and because she was afraid that defendant would kill her mother.

There is no doubt that it is the general rule that the prosecution cannot prove the commission by a defendant of another offense, for the purpose of raising the inference that he is guilty of the particular crime charged. If, therefore, the prosecution had directly offered to prove the two former assaults made by the defendant on the girl, and defendant had objected to the testimony, it would, perhaps, have been the duty of the court (even under the particular circumstances of this case) to have sustained the objection. But the testimony of the main fact, that former assaults had been made, came from the witness incidentally, and evidently to the surprise of the prosecution, and defendant made no objection to it. If he had made such objection, and had moved to strike out what had thus been suddenly injected into the testimony, a different question would have arisen. Defendant, however, had apparently no objection to the witness testifying to the fact of the former occurrences; for that testimony was evidently favorable to defendant, as tending to rebut the want of consent on the part of the witness. His position was that her testimony, given voluntarily, that the former intercourse, or attempted intercourse, did occur, should remain before the jury as an isolated fact, without any explanation of the circumstances under which it occurred. This position, in our opinion, is not tenable. As the testimony to the fact of prior intercourse, coming, as it thus did, incidentally, was, with the consent of defendant, allowed to remain before the jury, we think that the prosecution was properly allowed to explain the circumstances under which that fact occurred. Moreover, there could have been no material damage done to defendant by the ruling, because—First, before any objection was made the witness had already testified that the former acts were without her consent, which was, substantially, all that she afterwards testified to; and, second, because the whole testimony as to the former acts was favorable to defendant.

3. Appellant contends for a reversal because the court refused a certain long instruction on the subject of reasonable doubt. It is difficult to tell from the transcript by whom this instruction was asked; but, assuming that appellant requested it, there was no error in refusing it, because it contained this proposition: "It would not be sufficient to justify a conviction if the jury should be satisfied of the guilt of the defendant to such a moral certainty as would influence their minds in the important affairs of life." This language lacks precision, and is so unguarded as to produce a bewildering impression. It seems to be founded upon People v. Brannan, 47 Cal. 97. In that case the court had given to the jury the affirmative proposition that it "was their duty to convict" if they should "be satisfied of the guilt of the defendant to such a moral certainty as would influence the minds of the jury in the most important affairs of life." This was held to be error, as most of the instructions of courts on the old subject of reasonable doubt turn out to be erroneous, when they ambitiously step outside of well-established bounds. But the proposition in the Brannon Case is very different from the negative proposition that the evidence is not sufficient to convict if it would influence men in the important affairs of life,—a meaning that can fairly be ascribed to the instruction asked for.

Moreover, the court of its own motion had instructed the jury as follows: "The jury are instructed that before you are justified in finding the defendant guilty of the crime charged in the information you must be satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that on about the 6th day of February, 1888, and at the place alleged in the information, the defendant forcibly, violently, and against her will, had sexual intercourse with the female Eliza Daniels. The jury are instructed that a charge of this nature is peculiarly difficult for a defendant to clear himself of. No charge can be more easily made, and none is more difficult to disprove. From the nature of the case, the complaining witness and the defendant are generally the only witnesses. You should be perfectly satisfied that the case is made out by witnesses, and corroborating evidence, if any, before you find the defendant guilty, if you find him guilty. If you are not satisfied, you should acquit." And at the request of appellant had also instructed them as follows: "The jury are instructed that the reasonable doubt mentioned in the foregoing instructions is as follows: A defendant in a criminal action is presumed to be innocent until the contrary is proved, by not the mere preponderance of evidence, but by evidence entirely convincing to the jury, and in case of a reasonable doubt whether his guilt is satisfactorily shown, he is entitled to an acquittal." And we are satisfied that these instructions include about all that is necessary to say to a jury on the subject of reasonable doubt. It is proper for a court, and (if asked, at least) its duty, to call the attention of the jury to the difference between the character of evidence which would warrant a verdict in a civil case and that which would warrant a verdict in a criminal case, and to tell them that, while a preponderance of evidence would be sufficient in the former, it would not be in the latter, which requires proof beyond a reasonable doubt. In the case at bar the jury were cautioned that the charge of rape is "easily made," and "difficult to disprove." They were told that before they could convict they must be "satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt" that the defendant committed the crime charged; that they must be "perfectly satisfied," or else they should acquit; that mere "preponderance of evidence" will not do, but that there must be "evidence entirely convincing to the jury;" and that in any other event the defendant is "entitled to an acquittal." Where such instructions are given we would be slow in any case to reverse a judgment because other instructions on the same subject were refused. How much further, indeed, can a court safely go? Whenever a judge undertakes, in elaborate language, to tell a juror when his mind would be in a legal state of reasonable doubt, he enters upon a wide waste of mental philosophy, where landmarks are soon lost in fog; and he is very apt to have a collision with the metaphysics of some other court, which results in a wreck of the judgment. We think there was no error in the case at bar with respect to the subject of reasonable doubt. There are no other assigned errors which we deem it necessary to notice. Judgment affirmed.

MCFARLAND, J. Appellant was convicted of rape, and on the day duly appointed for pronouncing judgment he was brought into court, and while he was present there judgment was duly pronounced and rendered that he be imprisoned in the state-prison for a certain term of years. The clerk, however, neglected at that time to enter the judgment; and afterwards the court made an order that the judgment be entered as of the date at which it was pronounced, which was accordingly done. This order was made when appellant was not present, and he appeals from the order on the ground that it was void because made in his absence. The position of appellant is not tenable. Appellant was present when the judgment was pronounced and rendered, and that is all that is required by the Penal Code on the subject. Sections 1191, 1193. It has been held in some cases that a different judgment cannot be rendered, or the original judgment changed, without the presence of the defendant, or after the lapse of a certain period of time. But in the case at bar there was no change of the judgment or new judgment entered. The entry of the judgment which had been already rendered was a mere ministerial act, which the clerk, probably, had the power to perform without any order of the court. Franklin v. Merida, 50 Cal. 289; In re Cook's Estate, 19 Pac. Rep. 431. We are astonished, however, that in so grave a case as this there was such unpardonable neglect to enter the judgment immediately after it was rendered. The order appealed from is affirmed.

APPEAL—RECORD—WAIVER.

Where the record on appeal in a case tried by the court shows no findings by the judge except a paper bearing a date 28 days after judgment rendered, in the absence of showing to the contrary it will be presumed the clerk did his duty, and as provided by Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1963, subd. 15, included immediately after entering judgment all the papers on file in the judgment roll, and the paper with a date later than the judgment need not be regarded, and no findings appearing it will be presumed they are waived.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. F. SULLIVAN, Judge.

E. S. Lipitt, for appellant. Theodore Bradley, for respondent.

GIBSON, C. Action to recover compensation for services as nurses, rendered to defendant by plaintiff and two other persons, which other persons respectively assigned their demands therefor to the plaintiff. The case was tried before the court without a jury, and on the 12th day of October, 1885, judgment in favor of plaintiff, as prayed for in her complaint, was announced by the court, and was entered on the 14th day of the same month, from which judgment the defendant appeals.

Defendant urges as the sole reason for the reversal of the judgment that the instrument set forth in the transcript and denominated "Findings," and bearing date of November 11, 1885, and which date is appended under the signature of the judge, and no indorsement of filing appearing anywhere thereon, contains the only findings of fact and conclusions of law that were filed in the case, and the judgment having been entered prior to the filing of findings of fact and conclusions of law, the same not having been waived, is unsupported by findings, and consequently erroneous, and the filing of the findings bearing date of November 11, 1885, as aforesaid, did not and could not correct the error. To sustain this position, defendant assumes that the date on the face of the so-called findings under the signature of the judge, and the situation of the paper in the transcript immediately after the judgment, no other findings appearing in the judgment roll, conclusively show that such paper must have been filed after the judgment. This assumption, as will appear from what follows, is based on an unstable foundation. There is no bill of exceptions in the record; nothing by which it can be determined whether findings were not waived, or whether the so-called findings in the record were filed before or after the judgment was entered, unless the mere date on the so-called findings can be taken as prima facie evidence of the time the findings were signed, on the theory that the signing or authentication of findings should precede the filing, and could not have been filed prior to such date, which is 28 days after the entry of the judgment. The only thing in the record showing that the paper referred to as findings was ever filed is the certificate of the clerk to the transcript, reciting that all the papers in the transcript are correct copies of the originals on file in his office.

In Mulcahy v. Glazier, 51 Cal. 626, the court said: "It is a well-settled rule that upon appeal taken error is not to be presumed, but must be affirmatively shown. Where, therefore, as here, a cause is tried by the court without a jury, and the appeal is taken upon the judgment roll, the mere nonappearance of findings of fact in the roll does not necessarily establish that error was committed. The statute, when its several provisions are considered together, does not absolutely or unconditionally require that findings of fact shall be filed, but only that they must be filed unless waived in some one or more of the three methods therein mentioned. Under the rule of presumption referred to, we cannot presume that no such waiver occurred; the necessary intendment, in support of the judgment, is the other way. A party, therefore, who comes here to say that the court below committed an error in failing to find the facts, must, by bill of exceptions or some other similar and appropriate method, make it affirmatively appear by the record that no waiver of findings had in fact occurred in the court below; otherwise the intendment here must go to support, and not to overthrow, the judgment rendered there." Smith v. Lawrence, 53 Cal. 34; Carr v. Cronan, 54 Cal. 600; Reynolds v. Brumagim, Id. 254.

Measured by the foregoing rule, the judgment should be affirmed, because, if the paper referred to as the findings was not filed until after the entry of the judgment, then it must be presumed, in the absence of a showing to the contrary, that as the clerk of the trial court was required by section 670 of the Code of Civil Procedure, immediately after entering the judgment, to make up the judgment roll, that he regularly performed his official duty, (Code Civil Proc. § 1963, subd. 15,) and made it up within the proper time, including therein all papers then on file which should have gone into it, and the paper referred to as the findings showing merely, under the signature of the judge thereto, a date subsequent to the time when the judgment roll is presumed to have been completed, need not be regarded as a portion thereof. It then follows that, as no findings appear in the judgment roll, we must presume that they were waived. On the other hand, if the mere date on the paper referred to as the findings and its situation in the transcript immediately following the judgment can be disregarded, as we think they can be on the record before us, then the intendment still is in favor of the regularity of the proceedings of the court below, and the findings must be held to have been filed before the judgment was entered. It is therefore evident that upon either aspect of the case the judgment should be affirmed.

HAMMOND v. STARR et al. (No. 11,623.)

ATTACHMENT—BONDS—DISSOLUTION—DAMAGES.

1. The misnomer of a defendant corporation, consisting in the omission of part of its name, will not invalidate a levy of an attachment on its property if it waives the irregularity by appearing without objection.

2. Nor will the filing of an amended complaint, correcting the misnomer, and stating the causes of action separately instead of as one, as in the original complaint, render void such a levy, if the defendant makes no objection on that ground, and the attachment cannot be questioned for the first time in an action on the bond given by defendant to obtain a release of the levy.

3. Under Pol. Code Cal. § 4178, providing that the return of a sheriff upon process is prima facie evidence of the facts therein stated, such a return showing that he demanded payment of an execution of defendant, and was informed by the officers of the latter that they had no property of defendant in their possession, sufficiently shows that defendant's property previously seized under attachment and released on bond was not delivered to the sheriff pursuant to the provisions of the bond.

4. Under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 555, requiring such an undertaking to provide that defendant shall restore the released property or pay its value on demand, in case the attachment plaintiff recovers judgment, the damages recoverable in an action on the undertaking cannot exceed the amount of the judgment in the attachment action.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JOHN F. FINN, Judge.

Action by John Hammond against A. M. Starr and G. H. Walter, upon an undertaking given by them to obtain the release of property of the Ætna Iron-Works Company, a corporation, levied on under attachment at the suit of said Hammond. Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 555, provides that such an undertaking shall provide that the defendant shall restore the released property in case plaintiff recovers judgment, or pay its value. Pol. Code, § 4178, makes the sheriff's return on process prima facie evidence of the truth of the facts therein stated. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal.

E. W. McGraw and R. Percy Wright, for appellants. John C. Hall, for respondent.

GIBSON, C. This was an action against defendants as sureties upon an undertaking to obtain the release of an attachment levied in another suit, and was tried before the court without a jury, and resulted in a judgment for plaintiff, from which judgment defendants appeal, and, instead of moving for a new trial, bring up the evidence, rulings, and exceptions in a bill of exceptions. In the action wherein the attachment proceedings occurred it appears the original complaint therein was entitled "John Hammond vs. Ætna Iron-Works, a corporation," and the affidavit and undertaking for an attachment were entitled the same. The defendant thus designated appeared in and by its true name, viz., Ætna Iron-Works Company, and demurred to the complaint. This demurrer was sustained, and, pursuant to leave obtained, plaintiff filed an amended complaint, entitled the same as the original complaint, to which defendant again demurred by its true corporate name, which demurrer was overruled. Two answers were then put in,—one by the "Ætna Iron-Works," averring that said "Ætna Iron-Works" was a private copartnership, and denying the corporate existence of defendant; the other by the "Ætna Iron-Works Company," averring its corporate capacity, and denying that the "Ætna Iron-Works" ever was a corporation, or anything other than a private copartnership. Thereafter the plaintiff served on the attorney who had appeared as the attorney for the Ætna Iron-Works Company, and filed a second amended complaint, in the title of which the defendant was designated as the "Ætna Iron-Works Company, a corporation." For failing to answer this last amended complaint, judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff against the Ætna Iron-Works Company, a corporation. The day after, the Ætna Iron-Works Company appeared, and demurred to the original complaint. It made its motion in its true corporate name for a release of the attachment levy, under the provisions of sections 554 and 555 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which motion was granted, and the undertaking sued on in this action given pursuant to said sections.

When a person, natural or artificial, is sued by a wrong name, and appears by and in his or its true name in the action without objection, the error is waived. McCreery v. Everding, 54 Cal. 168. The irregularity in omitting the word "Company" from the name of defendant in the original complaint did not affect the attachment lien. In Porter v. Pico, 55 Cal. 173, the court, speaking of an attachment lien that had merged in the judgment therein considered, said: "This lien was not affected by any irregularities in the attachment itself, nor was it destroyed by the judgment rendered in the attachment suit. Any irregularities in obtaining it were waived by the defendant to the suit when he appeared and answered, without taking advantage of them by motion or otherwise in the course of the proceedings. The process is merely auxiliary, and the judgment in the action cures all irregularities."

It is urged that the amended complaints rendered the attachment levy void, because they stated a different cause or causes of action from that or those declared upon in one common count in the original, which was a demand for goods sold and services rendered to defendant, for which it agreed to pay. No objection was made on this ground to either of the amended complaints in the action in which they were filed, and cannot be made for the first time in a collateral proceeding. The original complaint at most was but defective, and could be amended without affecting the attachment lien. Hathaway v. Davis, 33 Cal. 168.

The two returns of the sheriff on the execution issued in the attachment suit show demands upon the officers of the defendant corporation for the payment of the amount named in the execution instead of for property released from the attachment, and that such demands were answered by such officers saying that they had no money or property in their possession belonging to the "Ætna Iron-Works." We think that it appears from the returns that a sufficient demand for the redelivery of the property that was released from the attachment levy was made. It was the sheriff's duty to levy the execution on such property, and his returns are prima facie evidence that the property was not delivered to him pursuant to the undertaking given for the release thereof. Pol. Code, § 4178. The said returns also show that the execution was unsatisfied. The judgment creditor then elected, under Code Civil Proc. § 552, to proceed upon the undertaking on the release of the attachment levy, and gave notice to each of the sureties thereon of the non-delivery of the attached property, and demanded payment of the amount fixed in the undertaking. As appellants' principal contention is that the findings in this case are not supported by the evidence based upon the invalidity of the proceedings in the attachment suit, and that the court erred in admitting the same in evidence, it follows that their contention cannot be sustained.

The judgment in the attachment suit was entered January 23, 1884, for $708.25, and $55.41 costs, which, together with interest thereon at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum to October 28, 1885, the date of the entry of the judgment appealed from, amounts to $857.25. The judgment appealed from is for $1,200 and costs, being $342.75 greater than that which the plaintiff could have recovered on his judgment in the attachment suit. The measure of damages is the value of the property attached. Metrovich v. Jovovich, 58 Cal. 342; Code Civil Proc. § 555. It is admitted in the pleadings that the value of the property attached was $76,000, but by stipulation the amount of the undertaking in suit was fixed at $1,200, instead of at the value of the property attached, as might have been done under section 555, Code Civil Proc. As the sheriff, in satisfaction of the execution in the attachment suit, could not have sold more of the attached property, had it been redelivered to him according to the undertaking for the release thereof, than sufficient to satisfy such execution, we think the plaintiff's recovery in this case should be limited to the amount recovered by him in the attachment suit, with the statutory interest thereon from the date thereof until the date of the entry of the judgment in this case. This we understand to be in accordance with the rule deduced from the authorities in Drake on Attachment, § 342, expressed as follows: "The measure of recovery on a delivery bond is the value of the property secured by it, not exceeding the amount of plaintiff's recovery in the attachment suit." We advise that the court below be directed to modify the judgment appealed from by deducting therefrom the sum of $342.75, and that it be affirmed for the remaining sum of $857.25 and the costs therein contained.

We concur FOOTE, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the court below is directed to modify the judgment by deducting therefrom the sum of $342.75, and the judgment as to the remaining sum of $857.25, and costs, therein contained, is affirmed.

BROWN v. STARR et al. (No. 13,100.)

HOMESTEADS—CONSTRUCTION OF STATUTES.

Under Civil Code Cal. § 1237 et seq., exempting from forced sale a homestead, consisting of "the dwelling house in which the claimant resides, and the land on which the same is situated," and further providing for the appraisement of the premises, and a division thereof in case the "land claimed" is of greater value than $5,000, and is susceptible of division without injury, and that when so divided the "remainder of the land" above the value of $5,000 may be sold, etc., the duration of the debtor's estate in the land is immaterial, and not merely the value of his life-interest, but the value of the land in fee, should be appraised.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; A. W. HUTTON, Judge.

Wicks & Ward, for appellants. C. N. Wilson, for respondent.

MCFARLAND, J. Execution was issued upon a judgment in favor of plaintiff herein against L. C. Alexander et al., and levied on land upon which Alexander had declared a homestead. Under section 1245 et seq. of the Civil Code, persons were appointed by the court to appraise the value of the homestead. They reported that the property covered by the homestead was of the value of $15,000; that it could be easily divided, and that they had set off as a homestead a certain part of the land, including the dwelling-house of Alexander, and most of his improvements, which was of the value of $5,000. Alexander claimed that he owned only a life-estate in the land, or a "mere right of personal occupancy during his life-time;" and he moved that the appraisement be remanded for another report, in which his said life-interest only should be appraised, and that he be allowed to prove that he had only such interest. He also moved that the premises be sold as an entirety, and $5,000 of the proceeds paid to him. The court overruled said motions; and Alexander appeals from the orders denying said motions, and also from an order approving the report of the commissioners.

Assuming that said orders are appealable, we are satisfied that no error was committed by the court below. A homestead consists of "the dwelling-house in which the claimant resides, and the land on which the same is situated," (Civil Code, § 1237,) irrespective of the tenure, tenancy, or title by which he holds it. When an execution is sought to be enforced against it the appraisers must "view the premises" and "appraise the value thereof,"—that is, the value of the premises; and if the value of the premises exceeds $5,000 they must determine whether the land claimed can be divided without material injury. Section 1251. If from the report it appears to the judge that the land claimed can be divided, etc., he must "direct the appraisers to set off to the claimant so much of the land, including the residence, as will amount in value to the homestead exemption, and the execution may be enforced against the remainder of the land." Section 1253. It is the land, including the residence, that "must amount in value," etc. There is no provision of the Code on the subject of homesteads which makes any allusion to the title or kind of tenure by which the claimant holds the property, or requires any appraisement of the interest which he has therein. If he resides on the land, he may have a homestead on so much of it as does not exceed in value $5,000, against any person except one who has a better title, no matter what his own title is; and when an execution creditor claims that he is holding as a homestead more than he is entitled to, that question must be determined by the value of the land. Any other rule would lead to infinite confusion. Can it be contended that a man can have and keep and enjoy as a homestead a large and valuable tract of land, worth ten times the amount of exemption, and can prevent a creditor from having set off to him a part of the land, including his dwelling-house, of the value of $5,000, because he claims only a life-estate in the whole, and, owing to the uncertainty of life, such estate might not bring a large sum at sheriff's sale? The question here is not what title would a purchaser get if the property were sold? A purchaser at sheriff's sale never gets higher title than that held by the judgment creditor. Whenever it appears that a homestead claimant holds land of greater value than $5,000, and a creditor seeks to subject the excess to his execution, the court must first find out, through appraisers, whether it can be "divided without material injury;" and, if it can be so divided, and a part worth $5,000 set off to the claimant, that course must be pursued. That was the fact, and such was the course pursued, in the case at bar; and there the proceedings properly ended. If large and valuable properties could be held as homesteads under the pretense that the claimants had less than titles in fee-simple thereon, schemes could easily be contrived with relatives and friends, by which the machinery of the homestead law, designed for beneficent purposes, could be used as a means of dishonesty and fraud. These views are in entire accord with the cases of Spencer v. Geissman, 37 Cal. 99, and Brooks v. Hyde, Id. 366.

The orders appealed from are affirmed.

CONTEMPT.

The petitioners were convicted of contempt in violating an injunction in a case in which the complaint was entitled as in "The Supreme Court of" Y. county, while the other papers were entitled as of "The Superior Court" of Y. county, where the suit was brought. Held, that though Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 405, provides that a complaint must contain, inter alia, "the name of the court and county in which the action is brought," yet, as section 475 provides that the court "must disregard" every defect in the pleadings which does not affect the rights of the parties, the court had jurisdiction, and an application for discharge on habeas corpus should be denied.

In bank. Application for a writ of habeas corpus.

Frank M. Stone and Joseph A. Joyce, for petitioners. George A. Johnson, Atty. Gen., for respondent.

SHARPSTEIN, J. The persons in whose behalf this writ was sued out were convicted, in the superior court of Yuba county, of a contempt of said court in disobeying and violating a temporary injunction issued out of said court in an action in which the county of Yuba was plaintiff and said Fil Ki et al. were defendants. The complaint in that action was entitled, "In the Supreme Court of the County of Yuba, State of California." The wrapper or outside cover had upon it the title, "In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the County of Yuba." The summons and temporary injunction were entitled, "In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the County of Yuba." The complaint was filed in the office of the clerk of the superior court of said county of Yuba. The contention of the petitioners is that no such action as that in which said injunction purports to have been issued was pending in the superior court of said county at the time said injunction issued; that a complaint must contain, among other things, the name of the court, and the county in which the action is brought; and that the complaint in this case does not contain the name of any court. That the complaint is defective in that respect is apparent. Is it a fatal defect?

Civil actions in the courts of this state are commenced by filing a complaint. Code Civil Proc. § 405. The complaint must contain: "(1) The title of the action, the name of the court and county in which the action was brought, and the names of the parties to the action. (2) A statement of the facts constituting the cause of action, in ordinary and concise language. (3) A demand of the relief which the plaintiff claims. If the recovery of money or damages be demanded, the amount thereof must be stated." Id. § 426.

If, in order to constitute a complaint, it is necessary to strictly comply with each and every of these requirements, then the paper filed in this case was not a complaint, and the injunction issued upon it was void, and, if void, might be disobeyed without committing any contempt of court. But no mere irregularity or omission, not going to the jurisdiction of the court, can be taken advantage of in this proceeding. Here we can only inquire whether the court had jurisdiction to issue the injunction. The Code prescribes what a complaint must contain, and it provides that "the court must, in every stage of an action, disregard any error or defect in the pleadings or proceedings which does not affect the substantial rights of the parties, and no judgment must be reversed or affected by reason of such error or defect." Id. § 475. The two provisions are equally mandatory and imperative. The defect relied on in this case could not in any conceivable way "affect the substantial rights of the parties." The summons contained the name of the court, and the cover of the complaint contained it. So did the writ of injunction, which was disobeyed. And there was no "Supreme Court of the County of Yuba, State of California." The requirement that the complaint must contain the names of the parties is just as mandatory and imperative as it is that it must contain the name of the court. But in Campbell v. Adams, 50 Cal. 205, the court said: "The only ground on which it is claimed the judgment is void is that he [Lewis] was not named as a defendant in the original or any amended complaint * * *. But we are not prepared to hold that the judgment was a nullity for want of jurisdiction to render it. When Lewis was served as a defendant sued by a fictitious name, the court acquired jurisdiction over his person, and it then became the duty of the plaintiff to amend the complaint by inserting the true name. The omission to do this rendered the judgment irregular, but it was not void." In this case, we think, there was a complaint filed in the proper court, and that the defect relied on did not affect the substantial rights of the parties, and therefore must be disregarded in every stage of the action. The writ is discharged, and the prisoners remanded to the custody of the sheriff of Yuba county.

NORDDEUTSCHEN FEUER-VERSICHERUNGS GESELLSCHAFT v. BERTHEAU. (No. 11,770.)

CONTRACTS—DAMAGES.

1. Defendant's firm made a written contract of agency with plaintiff, by which plaintiff reserved the right to terminate the agency at any time. In an action to recover money received by the agents, defendant testified that after the written contract was made it was discovered that a former agent was in default to the amount of $12,000, and that defendant's firm then verbally agreed to pay that amount, on plaintiff's assurance that "if this account is squared up, and you keep up the accounts with [plaintiff,] and do your duty, you will be able to soon refund yourself for your outlays, and we will stay with you and support you as long as you do your duty for us." Held, that the court properly left it to the jury to say whether there had been a modification of the written contract in respect of the duration of the agency.

2. Defendant's agency continued for two years after the alleged modification of the contract, when plaintiff terminated it. The court charged that if the jury found that there was such modification, and if the agency was revoked without consent, defendant would be entitled to counter-claim against plaintiff's demand the sum paid in settlement of the former agent's debt. Held error. If such payment was the consideration for the modification, the continuance of the agency for two years must have been of some value to defendant.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JAMES G. MAGUIRE, Judge.

Naphtaly, Freidenrich & Ackerman, for appellant. A. H. Loughborough, for respondent.

WORKS, J. This is an action to recover the sum of $8,983.56, money alleged to have been had and received by the defendant, as agent of the plaintiff in the business of insurance. One Henry Balzer had been the agent of the plaintiff, and on the 25th day of September, 1878, the defendant entered into a copartnership with said Balzer, and upon that day the plaintiff and said firm entered into a written contract by which they became the agents of the company, in which it was provided, among other things, that the plaintiff should have the right of giving notice of the removal of the agency at any time, the agents to terminate the agency upon six months' notice. Immediately after the formation of the copartnership and the making of this contract of agency, it was discovered, upon closing up the accounts of said Balzer, that he was indebted to the plaintiff for premiums theretofore collected by him in the sum of $12,018.37. The defendant pleads by way of answer that upon the discovery of the indebtedness of Balzer there was a separate verbal agreement entered into between himself and the plaintiff, through its then president, by which it was agreed that the defendant should pay the said sum of $12,018.37 found to be due from Balzer, and that in consideration thereof the said firm, or the defendant, might continue the agency mentioned in the said written contract so long as the defendant might desire, provided that said firm, or the defendant, would perform all the duties of the trust. Shortly after this transaction Balzer died, and the defendant continued the business of the agency for about two years after the making of the contract, when he was removed by the plaintiff. The principal question in the case arises upon the allegation of the verbal contract, claimed to have been made by the president, by which it is claimed that the written contract was so modified as to continue the agency during the good behavior of the defendant. The only evidence tending to establish this allegation of the answer is that of the defendant himself, and is as follows: "At that time Henry Balzer owed the company $26,309.32, against which were outstanding premiums to the amount of $16,952.75, which had not been collected. Balzer owed the company for moneys actually collected by him $12,018.37. His financial condition, as I found it later, was hopelessly bankrupt. That balance of $12,018.37 was paid by me to Mr. Perger, as manager of the company, on the 28th of September, 1878. Mr. Balzer had told Mr. Perger that the money was ready for him, and when the latter found that it was not forthcoming he called on me, and asked me to pay the indebtedness of Henry Balzer, and he said to me at the time: 'If this account is squared up, and you keep up the accounts with my company, and do your duty, you will be able to soon refund yourself for your outlays, and we will stay with you and support you as long as you do your duty against [for] us.' I then paid the money. It has only been partly paid back to me." The agency was withdrawn from the defendant on the 19th day of August, 1880, and it is claimed that this was a breach of the contract, and entitled the defendant to recover back the $12,018.37. The plaintiff asked the court to charge the jury as follows: "First. I charge you that defendant has not presented here any proof sufficient in law to alter or modify in any particular the written contract of September 25, 1878. Second. Under the terms of said contract plaintiff had the privilege of changing said agency and removing said agent at any time, and defendant has not shown by legal proof that this provision of said written contract was in any manner changed at any time." The court refused to give these instructions, and this is assigned as error. It must be conceded that the evidence upon the point is extremely meager, but it tends to show that the money due from Balzer to the plaintiff was paid upon a consideration moving from the plaintiff to the defendant, and we think it was for the jury to determine whether this was such a modification of the original contract as would entitle the defendant to the remedy claimed. It may be conceded that, where the evidence is clear and undisputed, the court may determine as a matter of law whether it shows a contract or not. Lassing v. Paige, 51 Cal. 575. But we think there was evidence sufficient here to go to the jury, and be determined by them. For this reason the instructions asked by the plaintiff were properly refused. The court gave to the jury the following instruction: "If from the evidence you find that after the execution of the contract mentioned in the complaint Perger, on behalf of the plaintiff, agreed with the defendant that the plaintiff would continue the agency with the firm of Henry Balzer & Co., or with the defendant, so long as they would faithfully discharge the duties of the trust, if said firm would pay to the plaintiff a certain amount, alleged to be due to the plaintiff by Henry Balzer, as its former agent, and if you find that said firm thereupon, on the faith of such promises, paid to the plaintiff the said amount, and that the said firm thereafter, until the death of said Balzer, and that the said defendant until the revocation of the agency faithfully performed all the duties of the trust, and if you further find that the agency was revoked without the consent of the defendant, then the court instructs you that the defendant is entitled to offset the amount that you may find was so paid against the claim of the plaintiff for moneys received by the defendant, or the said firm under the contract set forth in the complaint." This instruction was clearly erroneous. It informed the jury that the measure of damages must be the exact amount paid by the defendant of the indebtedness of Balzer. The question as to the amount of damages was a question of fact that should have been left to the jury. Parke v. Frank, 17 Pac. Rep. 428.

Taking the defendant's view of the transaction and giving it the most favorable construction for him, he was not entitled to recover the full amount paid by him to satisfy Balzer's debt. If the right to do business for the plaintiff, as its agent, during good behavior, was worth $12,018.37, the amount agreed to be paid by him, the right to the agency for the term of two years, it may fairly be assumed, was worth something, and it is alleged in his answer and conceded by him that he did hold the agency for that length of time. If the agency had been terminated immediately upon the payment of the money, it might be said with some degree of force that he would then be entitled to recover back the whole amount of the money paid, but this cannot be the case where the agency was the consideration for the payment of the money, as claimed by him; and he has enjoyed the fruits of the agency for at least a part of the time contracted for. There is in fact no foundation laid in the answer of the defendant for proof of damages, and no facts are alleged tending to show that he was in fact damaged by his removal from the agency. We are quite clear, for this reason, that the instruction ought not to have been given, and for this error the case must be reversed. It may be well to notice that, so far as the allegations of the answer go, and the evidence in support of it, the money paid by the defendant seems not to have been paid on his own account, but for the firm, and, as one member of the firm was the person owing the indebtedness, it may be questionable whether the defendant would be entitled to recover in any event more than the one-half of the amount found to be due him as damages or otherwise. Judgment and order appealed from reversed.

In re JESSUP'S ESTATE. (No. 12,941.)

ADOPTION—EVIDENCE.

1. Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1659, provides that notice of an application by an heir, legatee, etc., for partial distribution of the estate, must be given to the executor, etc., personally, and to all others interested, in the same manner as is required on settlement of the account of an executor, etc. Section 1633 provides that notice of the settlement of such accounts shall be given by posting notices in three public places, stating the time, place, etc., and that "the court or judge may order such further notice to be given as may be proper." Held, that where all the non-resident legatees were represented in the proceeding by attorneys and by the executor, who was their brother, there was no abuse of discretion in not requiring additional notice to be given to them.

2. The right to ask for partial distribution under Code Civil Proc. § 1658, by an "heir" who is not named in the will, is not confined to children born in lawful wedlock; and it is not necessary for the petitioner to first establish his heirship (as by adoption) in the manner provided in section 1664. The proceeding provided for in that section is not exclusive of the right to have the question determined at the hearing of the application for partial distribution.

3. The statutes relating to the adoption of illegitimate children are to be liberally construed, except as to the proof of paternity required.

4. No greater degree of certainty in the evidence to prove the fact of adoption of an illegitimate child by acts in pais is required than in other ordinary issues of fact.

5. Acts in pais, tending to show adoption of an illegitimate child, at a time when the statute required a written acknowledgment, are admissible, not only to show the purpose and object of the father's subsequent treatment at a time when the statute no longer required the acknowledgment to be formal or in writing, but also because the whole treatment of the child, being continuous in its nature, must be considered in determining whether or not there was an adoption under the later statutes.

6. Civil Code, § 1387, providing that "every illegitimate child is an heir of the person who in writing acknowledges himself to be the father of such child," is not a limitation upon section 230, so as to exclude from the inheritance an illegitimate child adopted by its father under that section without writing. Section 230 expressly provides that a child adopted as therein provided "shall be deemed to be legitimate for all purposes."

7. Under the statutes relating to adoption, (St. 1869-70, p. 530; Civil Code, §§ 221-230,) the consent of the mother is not necessary to an adoption of an illegitimate child by its father by acts of recognition, etc., without any formal proceeding.

8. Petitioner was shown to be the illegitimate son of the testator, J. Many witnesses testified that J. had taken charge of him from his birth, named him after a favorite uncle, provided him with the best nurses, sent him to school and college, dressed him expensively, often spoke of him and introduced him to friends as his son, often declared his intention to leave him all his property, and always manifested much affection for him. On the other hand, petitioner was kept in the family of a colored woman, whose mother had nursed him, and went by her name. J. was never married, nor had what could be called a home, he living much of the time with a mistress; and it appeared that he did not have petitioner assume his (J.'s) name, because he feared interference from the mother's family. A number of his business and social acquaintances testified that they never heard him speak of having a son, but it appeared that he was a reticent man. Held, that the evidence justified a finding that J. adopted him, under Civil Code, § 230, "by publicly acknowledging it [the child] as his own, receiving it as such into his family, and otherwise treating it as if it were a legitimate child."

9. The status of the petitioner being thus fixed, it could not be affected by subsequent acts of the father, by failing to name him in his will or otherwise.

10. The fact that the statutes under which petitioner claims to have been adopted were enacted after the execution of J.'s will in favor of third persons is immaterial, as the will gave no vested rights at the time of its execution.

11. The fact being undisputed that petitioner was the illegitimate son of J., and clearly established by competent evidence, the erroneous exclusion or admission of other evidence on that point was harmless.

McFarland and Thornton, JJ., dissenting.

Thomas J. Bowers, John H. Dickinson, and McAllister & Bergin, for appellants. Henry I. Kowalsky, (W. H. L. Barnes and Morris C. Baum, of counsel,) for respondent.

Works, J. Gershom P. Jessup, an unmarried man, died testate, leaving an estate valued at about $100,000. By his will he devised and bequeathed his estate to his brother and sisters. The will was admitted to probate, and letters issued to the executors named therein. The respondent, Richard Page Jessup, filed his petition in the court below, alleging that he was the illegitimate son of the deceased, and had been adopted by him, whereby he became his legitimate son and heir, and praying for a partial distribution of the estate to him. Upon a full hearing the petition was granted, and an order made distributing the whole of the estate to the petitioner, upon his giving bond to secure the payment of the debts of the estate, and costs and expenses of administration. From this order the executors of the estate and the legatees under the will have appealed.

The really controverted question in the court below was whether or not the deceased had adopted the respondent as his son in such manner as to constitute him his heir. Some objections are urged in the brief for appellants to certain rulings upon the admission and exclusion of evidence. Most of the rulings complained of relate to evidence tending to show that the respondent was the son of the deceased. Counsel for respondent contend that these rulings, if erroneous, were harmless, for the reason that the paternity was expressly admitted by counsel in the court below. No such admission appears in the record, but the fact of such paternity is not disputed in this court, and the evidence of the fact, independent of any testimony claimed to have been erroneously admitted or excluded, is so clear and conclusive that the appellants could not have been injured by any of the rulings complained of. So far as the rulings apply to other material matters, we find no error for which the cause should be reversed.

It is contended that the court below had no jurisdiction to make the order appealed from, for the reason that the non-resident legatees were not notified of the pendency of the proceeding. The court below proceeded under sections 1658 and 1659 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Section 1659 provides that notice of the application must be given to the executor or administrator personally, and to all persons interested in the estate, in the same manner that notice is required to be given of the settlement of the account of an executor or administrator. Notice of the settlement of an account of an executor or administrator is provided for as follows: "The clerk must thereupon give notice thereof by causing notices to be posted in at least three public places in the county, setting forth the name of the estate, the executor or administrator, and the day appointed for the settlement of the account. The court, or a judge thereof, may order such further notice to be given as may be proper." Code Civil Proc. § 1633. It is not claimed that the notice expressly required by the statute was not given, but it is contended that this was a case in which the court should have ordered further notice to be given. Whether such additional notice shall be given or not is a matter within the discretion of the court below, and, in the absence of anything to show that such discretion has been abused, this court will not interfere. There was no such abuse of discretion here. One of the executors, who was a resident of this state, was a brother of the deceased and of the other legatees under the will, and his interest in the proceeding was identical with that of the other legatees. As to the non-resident parties in interest, an attorney was appointed to look after their interests, and did so throughout the proceeding. Their rights, if they had any, were thoroughly represented and carefully guarded by competent and able attorneys, who acted for them as well as the executors.

Again, it is contended that the court had no jurisdiction to determine the question of the heirship of the petitioner in this proceeding; that the right to ask for partial distribution by an heir, where there is a will in which he is not named, must be confined to children born in lawful wedlock; and that he must assert his right to the estate, or any part of it, by a contest of the will, or must first establish the fact that he is an heir by proceeding under section 1664 of the Code of Civil Procedure. A distinction is thus attempted to be made between an heir born in lawful wedlock and one that has become such by adoption. Counsel contend that section 1386 of the Civil Code, which provides for the succession to and distribution of estates, does not apply to illegitimates, and in support of the position cite Estate of Magee, 63 Cal. 414; McCool v. Smith, 1 Black, 459; Hughes v. Decker, 38 Me. 153. These cases relate, generally, to the right of an illegitimate child to inherit, and have no application to a case of adoption by the father. Whether the petitioner was an heir, and entitled to distribution as such, was a question of fact to be determined by the probate court before an order for such distribution could be made. We see no reason for holding that the court could not consider and decide this question of fact because his right of inheritance must be established by proof that he was an "illegitimate child of the deceased, and adopted by him, instead of proof that he was a child born in lawful wedlock." It is no more a contest of the will in one case than in the other. The fact of heirship, when established, must have the same effect upon the will, and the rights of the legatees thereunder, in both cases. The fact of heirship is one that must be found by the court in either case, and the jurisdiction cannot be denied because the fact to be adjudicated must be established by evidence of a different kind, where the claim rests upon adoption. It cannot be treated as a contest or revocation of the will of the deceased, because the property distributed goes to one not named therein. The position that this was a taking of property without due process of law cannot be maintained, for the plain reason that notice was given as required by law in such cases. The position that the heirship of the petitioner must be established in the manner provided in section 1664 of the Code of Civil Procedure, before he can maintain a proceeding for partial distribution, is not well taken. The proceeding provided for in the section referred to is not exclusive of the right to have the question determined at the hearing of the application for distribution. Estate of Oxarart, 20 Pac. Rep. 367.

We come now to a consideration of the main issue in the case, viz., whether or not the finding by the court below that the petitioner was adopted by the deceased, as his son and heir, is sustained by the evidence. At the outset, counsel for the appellant insist that the question is not one of conflict of evidence, but purely a question whether or not the facts proved constitute such acts and conduct on the part of the deceased towards the respondent as amounted to an adoption of him as his heir, and that the claim of heirship must be sustained by evidence, clear, indisputable, and conclusive. The question whether the acts and conduct of the deceased, as testified to, admitting them to have been proved, amount to an adoption or not, is a matter of law to be determined by the court; but whether such facts are established by sufficient evidence, there being testimony directly on the point, is a question of the weight of the evidence and the credibility of the witnesses, to which the well-established rule as to conflicting evidence must apply. The cases cited by the appellant to the effect that, where clear and conclusive evidence of a fact is required, the appellate court may inquire whether the evidence proves such fact to such a degree of certainty, no doubt state the law correctly; but, in order to make them applicable here, it must be assumed that such a degree of certainty is required in this class of cases; which we think is a mere assumption, without authority to support it. So far as the mere question of adoption is concerned, no greater degree of certainty in the evidence should be required in this than in other ordinary cases. The cases cited by counsel are such as call for exceptionally clear proof, for the reason that they seek to defeat a written instrument or the like. Ford v. Osborne, 12 N. E. Rep. 526. Cummings v. Baars, 31 N. W. Rep. 449; Anthony v. Chapman, 65 Cal. 73, 2 Pac. Rep. 889.

In order that we may intelligently consider the evidence, and the effect to be given it, we must first call attention to certain dates, and construe the several statutes bearing upon the question in dispute. The respondent was born March 20, 1866. The will of the deceased was executed August 28, 1867. The deceased died November 2, 1886. His will was probated November 22, 1886, and the respondent's petition for distribution was filed April 11, 1887. The law in force at the time of the birth of the respondent was the statute of April 13, 1850, which provided: "Every illegitimate child shall be considered as an heir of the person who shall, in writing signed in the presence of a competent witness, have acknowledged himself to be the father of such child." St. 1850, p. 220, § 2. By an act approved March 31, 1870, general provision was made for the adoption of minors, and the statute of 1850 was expressly repealed. St. 1869–70, p. 530. Section 9 of this statute related to the adoption of illegitimate children by either or both of the parents, and provided as follows: "Sec. 9. Either or both parents of an illegitimate child, or the father, with the consent of his wife, or the mother, with the consent of her husband, may acknowledge such child as his or their own by a document in writing, executed by either, if single, or both, if married, or by treating, receiving, or acknowledging him publicly as his or their own legitimate child; and such child, and the one mentioned in the foregoing section, shall, to all intents and purposes, be deemed legitimate from the time of its birth, and entitled to all the rights aad privileges of legitimate offsprings." Section 3 of this act provided that an illegitimate child could not be adopted without the consent of its mother, and that the consent of a minor, if over 12 years of age, should always be necessary. This statute continued in force until January 1, 1873, when the Civil Code took effect. Chapter 2 of the Civil Code provides generally for the adoption of minor children in much the same terms as in the statute of 1869–70. Civil Code, §§ 221–230. Civil Code, § 230, provides: "The father of an illegitimate child, by publicly acknowledging it as his own, receiving it as such, with the consent of his wife, if he is married, into his family, and otherwise treating it as if it were a legitimate child, thereby adopts it as such; and such child is thereupon deemed for all purposes legitimate from the time of its birth. The foregoing provisions of this chapter do not apply to such an adoption." Section 1387 of the Civil Code, which is a part of the chapter on succession, provides: "Every illegitimate child is an heir of the person who, in writing, signed in the presence of a competent witness, acknowledges himself to be the father of such child; and in all cases is an heir of his mother, and inherits his or her estate, in whole or in part, as the case may be, in the same manner as if he had been born in lawful wedlock."

The appellants contend: (1) That the statutes authorizing the adoption of an illegitimate child by the father should be strictly construed. (2) That there could have been no adoption of the respondent under the statute of 1850 by any acts or conduct of the deceased towards him, for the reason that, under that statute, the only way in which such adoption could have taken place was by a writing to that effect, signed in the presence of a competent witness. (3) That such acts as are shown to have been done prior to the enactment of subsequent statutes, enabling the father to adopt his illegitimate child without any written acknowledgment, cannot be considered in determining whether there was an adoption or not, because the statute cannot be construed to be retroactive, and the question of adoption is one of intent on the part of the father, and his acts and conduct, tending to indicate what his intention was, must be construed in the light of the statute in force at the time. (4) That there could be no adoption, under either of the statutes or the Code, without the consent of the mother, and that no such consent has been shown. (5) That section 1387 of the Civil Code is a limitation upon section 230, as to the right of inheritance, and that under section 1387 there can be no inheritance, except where there has been a written acknowledgment of the child. (6) That the evidence is insufficient to prove an adoption of the respondent by the deceased. The points stated are given in our own language, as the substance of the very elaborate briefs of counsel. We shall endeavor to dispose of each of them in its order.

1. As to the strictness with which the statutory provisions referred to should be construed, we are not without authority. Estate of Sandford, 4 Cal. 12; Pina v. Peck, 31 Cal. 361. The cases cited are clearly to the effect that the statute, being in derogation of the common law, must be strictly construed. So far as the cases relate to the degree of proof required to prove the parentage of the alleged father, or that the claimant is his illegitimate child, we fully concur in the views expressed, but no further. If the proof of parentage is clear, then the rule to be applied should be the reverse of that contended for by the appellants. It should be the policy of the law to require the father of a child, whether legitimate or illegitimate, to assume towards it the duties and responsibilities of a father. Hargroves v. Freeman. 12 Ga. 342. This state has made no provision by which the paternity of an illegitimate child may be judicially determined and the father compelled to contribute to its support. These unfortunates are left to be supported by the mothers, who are usually unable to maintain or educate them properly, or by public charity, and, as a result, many of them, whose fathers are amply able to support and educate them, become paupers and criminals. The legislature has, in a very slight measure, made amends for this anomalous state of affairs by providing that the illegitimate child may, so far as its legal rights are concerned, by acts of the father, be made legitimate. The object is laudable, and should receive the aid and encouragement of the courts, and to that end the statute, so far as it provides how this being born again may be brought about, should be liberally construed. If the paternity of the child be the matter in dispute, strict proof of the fact should be required, but once the paternity is established the statute should be liberally construed, so far as it affects the question of legitimizing the child. We may fairly assume that such was the legislative intent. The earlier statutes requiring a written acknowledgment were, as we have seen, strictly construed. This was followed by more liberal statutes, authorizing the legitimizing of this class of children, which clearly indicates that such construction was not consistent with the object and purposes of such legislation. In this case, as we have said, the fact of paternity was so clearly established by the proof that it is not controverted here. The only question, therefore, that this court is called upon to consider is whether or not, being an illegitimate child of the deceased, the respondent was by the acts and conduct of his father adopted as legitimate. As to this branch of the inquiry we hold that the statutes relating to the subject should be liberally construed. Dickinson's Appeal, 42 Conn. 491. See commissioners' comments in note to section 230, Civil Code; Deering's Civil Code, § 230.

2. The point made that there could have been no adoption under the statute of 1850 is well taken, for the reason that under that statute a written acknowledgment was necessary, and none such was shown by the evidence. But it does not follow that the conduct and acts of the deceased, prior to the enactment of subsequent statutes, cannot be taken into account in determining whether or not there was an adoption, where, as in this case, as we shall show presently, such acts. conduct, and treatment were continuous from the birth of the respondent until the death of the deceased. If the acts relied upon had all taken place before the statute authorizing an adoption in that manner took effect, the position of counsel for appellant, that the subsequent statute could not be construed to be retroactive, so far as to render proof of such acts sufficient to establish the fact of adoption, would be correct. Estate of Pico, 52 Cal. 84; Brown v. Belmarde, 3 Kan. 41.

3. It follows that, conceding that the question of adoption is one of intention on the part of the alleged father, it was not only competent to prove such prior conduct on his part as tending to show the purpose and object of his subsequent treatment of the respondent, but the whole of his treatment of him, being continuous in its nature, must be taken into account in determining whether or not there was an adoption under the later statutes. If, taking his whole conduct towards and treatment of the child, it appears that it is sufficient to show an adoption, we think the case is made out, notwithstanding some of the acts proved appear to have taken place before the later statutes took effect. In support of the opposite view, counsel cite Morgan v. Perry, 51 N. H. 559; Brown v. Belmarde, 3 Kan. 41; Estate of Pico, 52 Cal. 84; Hartinger v. Ferring, 24 Fed. Rep. 15. These cases do not meet the question presented. In Estate of Pico it was held that section 230 of the Civil Code could not be construed to be retroactive; that all of the acts shown, since the enactment of that section, were after the claimant had arrived at full age; and that, as the statute only authorized the adoption of minors, the claimant was not within its terms, and no adoption was shown. This was precisely the same, in legal effect, as if no acts tending to show an adoption, after the statute took effect, were shown, which presents an entirely different question. In the case of Brown v. Belmarde, the statute under which the adoption was claimed to have taken place was enacted after the death of the alleged father, and it was claimed that the statute related back. It seems unnecessary to say that this case is not in point. In the case of Morgan v. Perry the statute required marriage of and recognition by the parents. The parents of the claimant had married and taken him into the family 40 years before the statute was enacted, and it was held that the statute did not apply. Hartinger v. Ferring is to the same effect. We do not regard any of these cases as of any weight, except upon the simple question whether the statute can be treated as retroactive, in the sense in which we have held it to be so, as above stated.

4. As to the point raised, that there could be no adoption without the consent of the mother, we cannot agree to the proposition that such consent is necessary where the adoption is by the father, and especially where such adoption is the result of his conduct towards the child, and does not depend upon any formal proceeding. The provision of the statute must be held to apply to adoptions by persons other than the father. This is apparent from a reading of the statute of 1870, and of the provisions of the Civil Code. St. 1869-70, p. 530; Civil Code, §§ 221-230. Sections 1 to 8 of the statute of 1870 relate exclusively to adoptions by other persons than the father, and include the provision requiring the mother's consent. Sections 8 and 9, although parts of the same act, are, as to the procedure, essentially an act to themselves, providing for an adoption in an entirely different manner, not including such consent. This is made manifest by section 230 of the Civil Code, which provides in express terms that "the foregoing provisions of this chapter do not apply to such an adoption." One of the foregoing provisions is the one requiring the consent of the mother of the illegitimate child. In Estate of Pico, 52 Cal. 84, relied upon by the appellants, the sole question was whether a person not a minor could be adopted under section 230. This court said in that case: "Except for the concluding words of the section, 'the foregoing provisions of this chapter do not apply to such an adoption,' it would be clear beyond controversy that this section, like all those which precede it in that chapter, had reference to minor children. But, taking the whole chapter together, we are satisfied that when section 230 declares that 'the foregoing provisions of this chapter do not apply to such an adoption' it refers only to the procedure by which the adoption may be effected." This is in entire accord with the view we have taken. The provision for procuring the consent of the mother relates to the procedure necessary to effect the adoption, and is clearly within the language of the case cited.

5. We cannot agree to the proposition that the provision contained in section 1387 of the Civil Code, that "every illegitimate child is an heir of the person who, in writing signed in the presence of a competent witness, acknowledges himself to be the father of such child," is a limitation upon section 230 and excludes an illegitimate child, adopted as provided in the latter section, from the inheritance. If so, section 230 would be deprived of much of its force. One of the legal consequences of an adoption is the right to inherit from the adopted father. Section 1387 of the Code is, no doubt, based upon the former provision of the statute, requiring the adoption to be in the manner therein indicated, and has never been made to conform to the later and more liberal provision. But, however this may be, the provision in section 1387, that certain illegitimates may inherit, cannot be held to exclude others, who have been adopted as provided by law, from the right of inheritance. Section 230 expressly provides that upon the adoption of a child, as therein provided, it shall "be deemed to be legitimate for all purposes." See Estate of Wardell, 57 Cal. 484.

6. In order to a proper understanding of the comments we make upon the evidence, it is necessary to state its substance. The testimony on the part of the respondent tended to show that the mother of the respondent resided in Marysville, in this state, and was, while residing there, on terms of intimacy with the deceased; that she came to San Francisco, and was by him placed in charge of a nurse, an old colored lady, who it appears, was a respectable, Christian woman. Soon after being placed with the nurse, she was confined, and gave birth to the respondent. The deceased visited her frequently during her stay at the house, paid all of the expenses consequent upon her sickness, and after the birth of the child the mother left the city, and the deceased took the entire charge of the child from that time on, leaving it with the nurse. He provided for its maintenance, appeared to be very fond of it, took it out with him frequently when it was young, to places of amusement, took great pride in seeing that it was well dressed, paid the nurse, and an extra nurse employed by her, liberally, for taking care of the child, and paid all of the doctor's bills and other necessary expenses. After the child became old enough he sent it to a private school, paying considerable sums of money for that purpose, and paid all of its necessary expenses. He caused a picture of it to be painted at an expense of $100, and kept the same in his room. As to his declarations with reference to the child, we set out the evidence of various witnesses as to the same, without giving names, lettering the testimony of each witness separately:

(a) "He said: 'This is my son, Doctor, that I had by Miss ———. Isn't he a nice-looking boy. I think a great deal of that boy, and I am going to raise him as my boy, and look after him, and educate him, and make a man of him, and he shall be my heir.' After that we had some talk, and I asked him on one occasion whether the boy was his son. He said he had him, educating him, and also told me that Miss ——— had married, and done well, and he was very glad of that, as it got her out of the scrape, and him too. Jessup said also that he did not want the mother to see the boy, because her parents would find it out, and he did not want them to find it out; but he wanted to keep the boy as secret as he could from the parents, and it would save the reputation of the young lady. He told me that the boy had grown up, and was most a young man, and he was going to make him his son and heir. He so told me more than once, and within the last five years, but I am unable to state when or where."

(b) "We had some further conversation after that; some conversation about the boy. He had grown to be four or five years old. Jessup knew that I knew all about the affair. We used to talk about it frequently. I recollect he brought the boy up to my place to have his teeth taken out, which I did."

(c) "My mother spoke to him about Miss ———, and wanted him to marry her; told him that Miss ——— was feeling very bad, and that he had confessed to my mother that he was the father of the child. He said: 'Yes; I know I am. She was a good girl when I met her, and I caused her fall. I am the father of the child, and I intend to marry her.' Mr. Jessup called quite often. I cannot tell the number of times,—two or three times a week; I should think oftener after the child was born. He was not there more than twice before. He paid forty dollars a month for the care of Richard. That was for the board exclusively. As for his clothing, he wanted him dressed in the best. He said that he was able to pay for it, and he wanted him dressed nicely, and always to look nicely. He did not want him to wear calico dresses. He wanted him dressed in white always. He wanted him kept in white, and whatever the expense was he would pay it. He had plenty to take care of Richard with, and he intended to take care of him, and wanted him always to look nice. He visited the child after the mother went away quite often. I cannot tell just how often, but very often. He visited him quite often at my mother's house, before the child went to Petaluma. I cannot tell how often. If the child was awake when he came he would take him up, and play and talk with him. If he was not awake, he would wait until he awoke. He would call him his boy, and many other affectionate names. He would take him up in his arms and say: 'Come to your papa; come to your daddy,'—and hold him up, and ask if he was not a fine boy. He always seemed very pleased if mother said that he looked like his father. He was very fond of him. He used to take him out,—would come very often, and used to take us down to North Beach; for Richard, as a baby, was very fond of the birds and monkeys and wild animals that were kept down at North Beach at the time, and his father, learning of his fondness for them, would take us down there to visit those animals, and he would buy nuts and candy for Richard to give them. The baby was rather sickly from the time it was born, and needed a good deal of care, and Mr. Jessup told my mother whenever she thought it was necessary to get a physician, and take good care of him. He was called Richard by his father's request. He said he wanted him called Richard after an uncle of his, a brother of Mr. Jessup's, who Mr. Jessup said was very wealthy. He said he was dead, and he would receive his estate, and that whatever he got would belong to Richard. He was leaving it to Richard, and he intended to leave him all that he had, and he would like to have him named after his uncle. He said: 'If Richard behaves himself, and does what I want him, he will not be sorry for it.' Said he wanted to make a man of him. He wanted him well educated. Fretted, I think, that Richard did not want to remain at school. He said that Richard was all that he had, and there was only the two of them, and that he ought to try and make him happy, and do just as he wanted him to do. He thought he ought to try and make him happy, and he would do anything for him and make a man of him, and after his death he would have 'all that I have.' He further said he wanted Richard to work and be self-sustaining. He wanted him to be independent, but at the same time he did not want him to want for anything. He told me his object in having Richard work was that he wanted him to learn the value of a dollar, because he wanted him to know how to take care of it; for he said: 'When I die, what belongs to me will fall into Richard's hands, and I want him to know how to take care of it.'"

(d) "I knew Gershom P. Jessup in his lifetime about ten or twelve years, probably. We were friends. Never had any conversation with him directly about his family. With regard to the boy, I had a conversation once. One of my sons was with me, and I introduced him to Mr. Jessup, and he said to me: 'I have a son that I am educating and bringing up.'"

(e) "I painted the portrait for Mr. Jessup. During the process of painting the picture Mr. Jessup called at my studio, and seemed quite interested in the portrait. I cannot exactly state how, except that he came up in the room, and expressed himself pleased with it."

(f) "I said: 'You have not anything to detain you here,—have not got any family, have you?' He said: 'I have got a son here.' He spoke of having two sisters in the east and his brother here. He said he did not expect— Well, he said: 'The way I feel, and the way this thing [referring to some litigation] worries me. I do not think I will last long.' He said he had made a will providing for his sisters, his brother, and for his son."

(g) "The boy always accompanied him to the store. I do not remember any statement he ever made with reference to the boy, as to who he was. He would say: 'I want a suit for the boy.' The way he spoke, I thought it was his boy, though I do not remember his saying whose boy it was. He selected the best goods, and made no objection to the price. I think I last made an overcoat. I cannot remember. It must have been ten or twelve years ago."

(h) "I knew Mr. Jessup in his life-time. At one time he came and asked me the fare to San Diego. I told him, and asked him whether he was going. He said: 'No; he was going to send some one.' He said he was going to send a boy. I said: 'What boy?' He said: 'I have got a boy as big and as old as yours.' He did not tell me where the boy was. He said he had been to college, and was going to send him to a ranch on a vacation. He asked for the ticket to be made out to Richard Miller, and it was so made. He told me that the ticket was for his boy,—his son. I asked him: 'Why do you make it out for Richard Miller?' Well, he said that he wanted to avoid trouble with a woman, or the mother, as some people at the back of her, by talking with her, were making trouble."

(i) "Question. Did you hear the boy call his father by any names? Answer. Papa. Mr. Jessup's manner was very affectionate. He would take the boy, and caress him, and kiss him, bring him fruits, cakes, lady-fingers, and be very fond of him."

(j) "He said that she had been married, and that he did not think that he ought to look out for her any more; that he had this heir,—this boy, rather,—and he had looked out for him from his infancy, and intended to look out for him, but he did not think he should be bothered with the mother. He said that he was giving the boy a schooling. He had looked out for him from infancy. I don't think he told me who the child was with. He said he had him off at school. I think he told me that the mother had nothing to do with the boy; that he had taken care of him. That is my recollection. I said: 'Mr. Jessup, that is my boy.' He said: 'My boy is as old as your boy.' I said: 'Your boy ought to be three or four years older than mine, I don't know but more, and my boy is fully sixteen years;' and he said: 'He is.' I asked him: 'Where is your boy? What have you done with him?' 'Well,' he said, 'he is at work; it is well enough for parents to learn their boys to go to work.' I said: 'I agree with you; that is a good idea.'"

(k) "He said: 'That is my boy.' He had a little boy with him. I judged in my own mind that it was his son at the time. He said: 'What do you think of him?' I took him to be his son, for he looked upon him with such pride and affection, as if he must be his child."

(l) "He spoke to me several times about his family,—about having a son. I told him to bring him up one time; I should like to see him. That was about five years ago; may be a little longer. He brought him in afterwards a couple of times, and they had dinner together. I says to Mr. Jessup: 'You cannot deny that boy; he is the very picture of you.' Jessup said: 'The boy puts me to a good deal of trouble sometimes now. It don't matter; I will never forget him.' He said he had property on Stevenson street and on Clay street,—some property that he said he would make over to him. He was sick then a great deal. He could hardly walk sometimes.

He often used to come over. He would say: 'I am not able to walk.' He told me the boy was in the country with friends, and that he loved the boy dearly. We were then talking about children. I had children myself. He said if the boy would do right, and all this, that he would give him everything he had got. He said that he did not want him with him; that he would keep him in the country. He would be better off with his friends than he would be with him."

(m) "I saw the child with him. The child was dressed in a very handsome black suit, with a black cap, and had long hair. I was going down Market, and he was going up with the child by the hand. I asked: 'Is that the first production, and are there any more of them?' He said: 'No; it was the first one. Don't you think he looks like me?' I always understood him to say that he had the child in good hands, or was taking the best care of him. I do not know that I ever spoke to him about the boy more than five or ten or twenty times during our couple or three years' acquaintance. He would speak to me about how the boy was, and about how he was taking care of him. He used to speak about the boy as 'little Dick,' or 'my little Dicky,' or 'my little boy.'"

(n) "One day he asked me if I knew his boy. I asked him who his boy might be. He said: 'Dicky Jessup.' I said I did not know him by that name. He then said: 'He may go over here by the name of Miller; he is hiding over here.' 'Yes,' I said, 'I know him.' He said: 'If you see him, tell him to come over to see me, corner of Fifth and Market streets. I am residing there, and you will confer a favor upon me.'"

(o) "I knew the boy, who gave me his name as Richard Jessup Miller. He was sent to me from San Francisco by A. A. Denning about six years ago, when I was living on my ranch. He told me his name was Richard Jessup, but his aunt made him call himself Richard Jessup Miller. That was when he first came to my place. He was with me about six months, and then went back to San Francisco. I received several letters from Mr. Jessup. He sent me money for the boy. He told me to be kind to him, and make a man of him. He returned to San Francisco at the request of Mr. Jessup, who sent him money to buy him clothing and buy him a ticket."

(p) "He said: 'Oh, no; there is no mystery about the child. I have always taken care of the child—the boy—from his birth. I have always done for him, and always will.' I think he told me that he had him at Washington College, over at Alameda, and said: 'I have done for him. I have had him down in Lower California. I have spent large sums of money on him. I have always taken care of him, and always shall.' He seemed to want to impress on my mind the fact that he wanted to make the boy self-sustaining,—self-supporting; to show him how to save money; how to make money."

(q) "I saw Mr. Jessup once with a little boy. I do not know how old. I should think about five. He was dressed in a kind of fancy suit. I think he said: 'This is my boy.' I don't know about the word 'son.' He said the 'little boy,' or his 'boy;' meaning his son, I presume. He did not say his 'son,' I do not think. I said he looked very much like him."

(r) "He told me that he had a young boy, going on two years. Those were the words he used. I will not be positive now whether he said 'boy' or 'son.'"

(s) "I got to speaking to him,—was very well acquainted with him,—and I told him I thought he was very well fixed for wealth. He said: 'Yes, I am well fixed.' I said: 'I suppose you have got fully one hundred thousand dollars.' He said: Yes; he had fully that much. I heard him speak about his son at different times; I forget the date. I said: 'When you die you must remember me,'—in a kind of joking way. Well,' he says, 'I have got a son that will come in for a good part of that.' Then I commenced to laugh at him. I says: 'How is that? You have a son and have no wife.' He said: 'Can't a man have kids and not have a wife?' On one occasion he asked me if I had any family beside my little girl. I said none, with the exception of two brothers and a sister, aged fifteen, seventeen, and nineteen. 'That,' said he, 'is the age of my boy.' This was in 1885. On my expressing my surprise, he said: 'Oh, yes; I have a son. He is across the bay.'"

(t) "He said that he had a fine boy by her, and that he was going to make a Dick Jessup of him. He told me the boy was in school. I cannot tell which one. He spoke about his boy that he had put at school. Said that he was a fine boy, but he believed he was going to make him a great deal of trouble."

In opposition to this array of evidence, tending strongly to show an adoption, it appears that the respondent did not go by his father's name; that he lived with a colored woman, daughter of the old nurse, and was brought up with her children, and went by her name. But it appears from some of the evidence above that this might have been, not for the purpose of concealing his parentage, but through the fear that the mother of the boy, or some of the family, might assert some claim to him. Again, it is shown that the deceased never took the boy into his family. But the evidence shows clearly that he never had any family, or any place that could be called a home. He roomed in various places in the city, and a great part of the time lived with a mistress, the wife of another man. It was to his credit, and bears strong evidence of his regard and affection for the boy, that he was not willing to subject him to the influences that had contaminated his own life. It was also shown by a number of reputable witnesses that they had known the deceased with more or less intimacy, had met him in business, at the clubs and at lunch, and never heard him speak of having a son. But this is testimony of a negative kind, and entitled to but little weight. Besides the fact that it appears that the deceased was a reticent man, not given to talking about his affairs, he would not be likely to discuss such a matter under such circumstances, and, if he had, the witnesses would not be likely to remember it. There is evidence tending to show that the respondent was christened under the name of Richard Page Jessup, and that this was done at the request of the deceased, but as to the latter the evidence is conflicting.

Was this evidence sufficient to show an adoption? This depends, in part, upon the construction to be given to the two statutes in force during the time covered by the testimony. The appellants contend that under section 9 of the statutes of 1870, which provides for the adoption of a child "by treating, receiving, or acknowledging him publicly as his or their own," should be construed to mean receiving and acknowledging, and that both must be proved to show an adoption. As we view the evidence, it is unnecessary to determine this question. If the testimony is sufficient to establish one of these requisites, it is equally sufficient to prove the other. But it is further contended that the requirement that he should publicly acknowledge him as his own legitimate child is not established by proof that he acknowledged him openly to various persons as his son; that a public acknowledgment, as here used, means some formal acknowledgment of him as his legitimate son, in an open and public way; and that it is not enough to show that he made such acknowledgment to friends and acquaintances, no matter how many. We do not so understand the statutes. To establish his right to inherit, a claimant must prove two things: (1) That he is the illegitimate child of the alleged father; (2) that he has been openly and publicly acknowledged and received and treated as such. But, in order to avoid imposition and fraud, the statute requires that these things shall be established by certain proof. Under the statute of 1870, it must be proof of his "treating, receiving, or [and] acknowledging him publicly as his own legitimate child." That is to say, he must treat, receive, or (and) acknowledge him as if he were his own legitimate child; and in order that the proof may be made by disinterested parties, and fraud and imposition avoided, all of these things must be done openly and publicly, and not secretly. But this does not mean, as counsel for appellants seem to think, that the alleged father must cry out from the housetops: "This is my illegitimate son, that I now and here publicly acknowledge as my own legitimate son,"—or go about with a lie upon his lips, saying: "This is my legitimate son." Section 230 of the Civil Code, although differently worded, is in effect the same. The language is: "By publicly acknowledging it as his own, receiving it as such into his family, and otherwise treating it as if it were a legitimate child."

Undoubtedly the most satisfactory way of establishing the necessary facts is by proof that the claimant has been received into the family, and given the family name. But this is not necessary where there is sufficient proof of a reason for not having done either, as we think is shown in this case. The deceased could not take the respondent into his family, because he had none. He did not openly give him his name, for the reason that he feared the mother, or some of her family, would attempt to take him from him. But he did give him the Christian name of a favorite brother, and expressed the hope that he might be able to raise him to be like his uncle. In other respects he treated him as such a man might be expected to treat his legitimate son; and that he openly and publicly acknowledged him to be his son there can be no doubt, if the witnesses who testified to the facts were to be believed. Whether they were worthy of belief or not was for the court below to determine. He performed towards the respondent the duties which would have devolved upon him as the father of a legitimate child, viz., those of protection, maintenance, and education. Therefore he treated him as his legitimate child. When the status of the respondent was thus fixed it could not be affected by subsequent acts of the deceased, by failing to name him in his will or otherwise. The statute, together with other acts done under it as will constitute an adoption, fixes the status of the illegitimate child irrevocably. McGunnigle v. McKee, 77 Pa. St. 81; Hosser's Succession, 37 La. Ann. 839.

It is said that the statutes under which the respondent claims to have been adopted were enacted after the will of the deceased was executed, and therefore the adoption, if proved, cannot affect the rights of parties named as legatees in the will; but the will gave no vested right at the time of its execution, and for that reason, if for no other, the point is not well taken. Sewall v. Roberts, 115 Mass. 262. The evidence is sufficient to sustain the order of distribution. Order affirmed.

FEENEY v. HOWARD et al. (No. 11,567.)

TRUSTS—EXPRESS AND IMPLIED—STATUTE OF FRAUDS.

1. A grantor conveying land by a deed reciting a valuable consideration, in the absence of actual or constructive fraud, accident or mistake, cannot show by parol that no consideration passed, and that the conveyance was made in trust, the grantee agreeing to reconvey upon request.

2. Mere failure to comply with the promise to reconvey is not such evidence of fraudulent intent in procuring the conveyance as will take the case out of the operation of the statute of frauds.

3. Though, when no consideration for a conveyance is either recited therein or proved, a trust will result in favor of the grantor, parol evidence will not be admitted as between the parties to contradict the recital of such a consideration for the purpose of raising such a trust.

4. Nor would the fact that the grantee acted under the deed, doing nothing but what the terms of the deed authorized, constitute such a part performance as will take the case out of the statute.

5. The statute of frauds need not be specially pleaded to an action to enforce such a parol trust, if the agreement is itself denied by defendant's pleadings.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JAMES G. MAGUIRE, Judge.

Action by Michael Feeney against James Howard, the San Francisco Savings Union and others, to declare a trust in the proceeds of land conveyed by plaintiff to defendant Howard. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant Howard appeals.

R. Percy Wright, for appellant. Clara S. Foltz and J. C. Bates, for respondent.

HAYNE, C. Suit to declare a trust. The material facts are as follows: One Catherine Feeney and the plaintiff, Michael Feeney, were tenants in common of a certain tract of land. She died, and Michael Feeney was appointed her administrator. He made two deeds to the defendant Howard, which were dated on the same day, and purported to convey the same property, and recited a valuable consideration. One of these deeds was made by Michael Feeney as administrator of Catherine Feeney, and the other by him in his individual capacity. Howard subsequently conveyed the property to trustees to secure a debt to the San Francisco Savings Union, and, this debt not having been paid, the trustees sold the property, and, after satisfying said debt, have a certain balance in their hands, which they are ready to pay to the person entitled thereto. The controversy relates to this balance. Michael Feeney, in his life-time, commenced the present suit in his own name, (not as administrator,) to have it declared that he was entitled to said balance. On the trial he introduced in evidence the deeds above mentioned, and then offered parol evidence to prove that they were without consideration, and that the property was conveyed to Howard upon certain trusts, and was to be reconveyed on request. Howard objected on the ground of the statute of frauds. The parol evidence was admitted against such objection, to which Howard excepted; and judgment was given for the plaintiff, from which, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, the appeal is taken. Subsequent to the appeal Michael Feeney died, and his administrator was substituted. It is to be observed that, since Michael Feeney did not sue as administrator, no question as to the rights of the estate is involved. His deed as administrator may therefore be dismissed from consideration. The question to be determined is whether, as between Michael Feeney and his grantee, a trust can be established in the manner attempted.

1. Unless the case can be brought within some one of the exceptions hereinafter noticed, we think that it is clear that the statute of frauds is a defense to the action, and that the parol evidence was improperly admitted. If a trust could be raised in such a way, what operation could the statute of frauds ever have? The authorities are overwhelming to this effect. In the case of Rasdall's Adm'rs v. Rasdall, 9 Wis. 379, the ancestor of the plaintiff conveyed certain real property to the defendant, and it was sought to be shown that the transfer was without consideration, and upon a parol agreement to reconvey upon request. But the court held that this could not be done, and PAINE, J., delivering the opinion, said: "We do not feel called upon to cite authorities to show that in the absence of fraud, accident, or mistake, parol evidence cannot be received to prove that a deed absolute on its face was given in trust for the benefit of the grantor; and we have not been able to find anything in the case to make it an exception. We cannot see why, if this evidence is to be received to establish this trust, every other deed in the state may not be shown by parol to have been given upon trust, and the statute of frauds be entirely annulled." And there are numerous authorities to the same effect. See Barr v. O'Donnell, 76 Cal. 469, 18 Pac. Rep. 429; Sturtevant v. Sturtevant, 20 N. Y. 39; Wheeler v. Reynolds, 66 N. Y. 227; Titcomb v. Morrill, 10 Allen, 15; Ratliff v. Ellis, 2 Clarke, (Iowa,) 59; Fouty v. Fouty, 34 Ind. 433; Perry v. McHenry, 13 Ill. 227; Burden v. Sheridan, 36 Iowa, 125; Morrall v. Waterson, 7 Kan. 199; Lawson v. Lawson, 117 Ill. 98, 7 N. E. Rep. 84; Dean v. Dean, 6 Conn. 284; Walker v. Locke, 5 Cush. 90; Boyd v. Stone, 11 Mass. 342; Metcalf v. Brandon, 58 Miss. 842; Bonham v. Craig, 80 N. C. 224; Donohoe v. Mariposa Co., 66 Cal. 327, 5 Pac. Rep. 495. In some of these instances the case might possibly have been taken out of the statute on the ground of a fiduciary relation, but that feature did not receive attention. Then, can the case be brought within any of the recognized exceptions to the above general rule? We do not think it can.

(a) The counsel for the respondent is in error when he contends that the case presents features of actual or constructive fraud. No actual fraud was alleged. A material ingredient of actual fraud is the fraudulent intent, and this must be alleged as one of the facts constituting the fraud. Moss v. Riddle, 5 Cranch, 351. And if it be assumed, for the purposes of the opinion, that there may be cases where a fraudulent intent would necessarily be inferred from the allegation of certain facts, and that a sale by an administrator without consideration would be such a case, yet this would not help the respondent in this regard; for, as above stated, neither the right of the estate nor the administrator's deed is involved here. No actual fraud is alleged, found, or shown by the evidence. For all that appears to the contrary, Michael Feeney's deed may have been given and received in entire good faith. The mere failure to perform a parol agreement, which was made in good faith, is not fraud. Perry v. McHenry, 13 Ill. 236; Wheeler v. Reynolds, 66 N. Y. 234; Burden v. Sheridan, 36 Iowa, 125; Boyd v. Stone, 11 Mass. 348; Rasdall's Adm'rs v. Rasdall, 9 Wis. 386, 387. Nor does any constructive fraud appear. It is true that it was held in Brison v. Brison, 75 Cal. 525, 17 Pac. Rep. 689, that if by means of a parol promise to reconvey a party obtains an absolute deed, without consideration, from one to whom he stands in a confidential relation, the violation of the promise is constructive fraud, although at the time of the promise there was no intention not to perform. And this case was approved in Broder v. Conklin, 19 Pac. Rep. 516. But it is essential to the operation of this principle that there be a confidential relation. It is one of the facts constituting the fraud. The facts constituting fraud must be averred in cases of constructive as well as of actual fraud. Golson v. Dunlap, 73 Cal. 164, 14 Pac. Rep. 576. And in this case no confidential relation is averred. The counsel for the respondent suggests in his brief that the plaintiff was the son-in-law of the defendant, and reposed personal confidence in him. But, if it be assumed that this would make a difference, it is sufficient to say that it nowhere appears in the record that plaintiff was the son-in-law of the defendant, and that nothing in relation to actual trust or confidence is averred in the complaint. We are not saying that a trust might arise out of the violation of actual trust and confidence, independent of any fiduciary relation. We simply say that no such question can arise under the pleadings in this case.

(b) There was no resulting trust. It is not necessary to consider whether the old rule that a trust results where a deed is made without consideration, either expressed in the deed or proved aliunde, prevails at present. Compare Civil Code, § 1040; for the deed recited a consideration. And although there are certain collateral purposes for which such a recital can be contradicted, it cannot, in the absence of fraud or mistake, be contradicted between the parties for the purpose of defeating the operation of the instrument or raising a trust. Russ v. Mebius, 16 Cal. 356; Graves v. Graves, 29 N. H. 129; Philbrook v. Delano, 29 Me. 412, 413.

(c) The position that there was part performance sufficient to take the case out of the statute cannot be sustained. Whatever was done by Howard the deed gave him a right to do. And to say that the deed itself, or what was done under it, is part performance, is merely to reassert in another form that the parol agreement was sufficient to raise the trust.

It is not pretended that the transaction was a mortgage, nor is any other ground suggested which would constitute an exception to the general rule. We have carefully examined the numerous cases in our reports bearing upon the subject, and find that all proceed upon some recognized exception, and that none conflict with the rule above laid down.

2. The statute of frauds, however, was not pleaded. The defendant simply denied the alleged agreement and trust, but made no reference to the statute. And it is contended for the respondent that the statute was therefore waived, and that the appellant is not in a position to avail himself of it. As there has been some confusion on this subject, we have examined it with some care. The notion that the statute must be specially pleaded is derived from the old chancery practice. In the English court of chancery the usual course was to plead the statute specially. The function of pleadings in chancery, however, was somewhat different from that of pleadings at law. In the language of Story, "a bill in chancery is not only a pleading for the purpose of bringing before the court, and putting in issue, the material allegations and charges upon which the plaintiff's right to relief rests, * * * but it is also in most cases an examination of the defendant upon oath for the purpose of obtaining evidence to establish the plaintiff's case, or to counterprove or destroy the defense which may be set up by such defendant in his answer." Story, Eq. Pl. § 268. If in response to such a bill the defendant confessed the making of a parol agreement, but pleaded the statute as a bar to relief, the defense was good. 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 757. But if he confessed the parol agreement, and did not insist upon the statute, he was regarded as having waived it. Id. § 755. But it was not necessary for the defendant to confess the agreement. It became settled, after some conflict of opinion, that he could plead the statute as a bar to the discovery of the parol agreement as well as to its performance. Story, Eq. Pl. § 763. And, inasmuch as a denial of the agreement would subject him to a conviction of perjury, (see 1 Sugd. Vend., 7th Amer. Ed., p. 158, c. 4, § 6, par. 12,) it was natural that the usual course was to plead the statute as a bar to both discovery and relief. But it is not entirely clear whether a denial of the contract without pleading the statute was sufficient to enable the party to take the objection at the hearing. That it was, is distinctly stated by Lord Cranworth in Ridgway v. Wharton, 3 De Gex, M. & G. 689; and compare Fell v. Chamberlain, 2 Dick. 484, and Sugd. Vend., supra. But the contrary was held in Heys v. Astley, 4 De Gex, J. & S. 34. At law it is clear that the denial of the contract was sufficient to let in the defense. Buttemere v. Hayes, 5 Mees. & W. 461; Eastwood v. Kenyon, 11 Adol. & E. 445. And this was not put upon any distinction between cases where the plaintiff declared specially and cases where he resorted to the common counts. The defendant, however, was at liberty to plead the statute specially, if he saw fit to do so. 1 Chit. Pl. *528. The rule that it was sufficient at law to deny the contract seems to have continued in force until the new judicature acts, by which it was expressly provided that "when a contract is alleged in any pleading a bare denial of the contract by the opposite party shall be construed only as a denial of the making of the contract in fact, and not of its legality, or its sufficiency in law, whether with reference to the statute of frauds or otherwise." See And. & S. Jud. Acts, (4th Ed.) 197.

The common-law rule that it was sufficient to deny the contract has been sanctioned in America by high authority. Thus, in Dunphy v. Ryan, 116 U. S. 495, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 486, which went up from Montana, the defendant in an action at law set up a counterclaim or cross-action based upon an agreement which was not alleged to be in writing, and the plaintiff filed a replication denying such contract, and it was held that this was sufficient to raise the question, the court saying: "The denial in the replication of the plaintiff of the making of the contract, on which the defendant based his cross-action, is as effective for letting in the defense of the statute of frauds as if the statute had been specifically pleaded." See, also, Birchell v. Neaster, 36 Ohio St. 331. And even in states where the chancery rule that the statute must be specially pleaded seems to prevail, it has been held that, so far as the common counts are concerned, it is sufficient to plead the general issue. Durant v. Rogers, 71 Ill. 124; and see also Hunter v. Randall, 62 Me. 426; Duck Co. v. Dewey, 6 Gray, 446.

In New York, where the phraseology of the statute of frauds is similar to ours, the common-law rule of pleading is applied even in equity. This view was announced in Cozine v. Graham, 2 Paige, 181. That case arose on a demurrer to a complaint, which did not show whether the contract was in writing or not. The demurrer was overruled upon the ground that the contract must be presumed on demurrer to have been in writing. But Chancellor WALWORTH, in the course of his opinion, said: "The rule of pleading on this subject is well settled in the courts of law, and I do not see why the principle of that rule is not applicable to this court. It is there held that the statute did not alter the form of pleading; that if an agreement or contract is stated in the declaration to have been made, it is not necessary to allege that it was in writing, as that will be presumed until the contrary appears. If the agreement is denied the plaintiff must produce legal evidence of its existence." This case is a leading one in that state, and upon its authority it has always been held there that it is sufficient as a matter of pleading to deny the contract. See Bank v. Root, 3 Paige, *481; Coles v. Bowne, 10 Paige, 535; Champlin v. Parish, 11 Paige, 408; Harris v. Knickerbacker, 5 Wend. 643, 644; Botts v. Cozine, 1 Hoff. Ch. 89; Duffy v. O'Donovan, 46 N. Y. 226. The case of Bommer v. Manufacturing Co., 81 N. Y. 471, is not at all in conflict with the foregoing. In that case RAPALLO, J., said, in reply to an argument upon the statute of frauds: "There is no exception in the case raising any question under the statute of frauds. The statute is not pleaded, nor was there any objection to the proof of the agreement sued upon, by oral testimony, nor is there any exception to any finding or conclusion, which presents any question under the statute. No such question can, therefore, be considered on this appeal." This is merely the statement of the very obvious proposition that the record on appeal must show in some way that a question as to the statute of frauds is involved in the case. And the implication is that this might be shown in any of the ways mentioned. Nor have we seen any New York case which is in conflict with the rule that a denial of the contract is sufficient to raise the question of the statute of frauds. This rule is applied by the supreme court of the United States, not only at law, as appears from the cases above cited, but even in equity. See May v. Sloan, 101 U. S. 237. And it is so applied in many of the state courts. See Wiswell v. Tefft, 5 Kan. 266; Whiting v. Gould, 2 Wis. 593, 594; Patton v. Rucker, 29 Tex. 411; Walker v. Hill, 21 N. J. Eq. 203; Billingslea v. Ward, 33 Md. 51; Semmes v. Worthington, 38 Md. 317; Hocker v. Gentry, 3 Metc. (Ky.) *474; Brown v. East, 5 T. B. Mon. *408; Wynn v. Garland, 19 Ark. 34; Poag v. Sandifer, 5 Rich. Eq. 180; Hook v. Turner, 22 Mo. 333; Rowton v. Rowton, 1 Hen. & M. 91; Bonham v. Craig, 80 N. C. 228. And in some of the states which maintain the contrary doctrine it is admitted that the prevailing rule in this country is that a denial is sufficient. See Battell v. Matot, 58 Vt. 285, 5 Atl. Rep. 479.

In California two cases on the subject have been called to our attention. In Osborne v. Endicott, 6 Cal. 153, one of the objections to establishing a parol trust as to the real property was that there was no writing. The court held that the trust was a resulting trust, and therefore not within the statute, but said, in addition, that the point as to the statute was not good "because the statute of frauds is not pleaded." That was all that was said on the subject. No reason was given for the remark of the court, and no authorities were referred to. This case was referred to in Broder v. Conklin, 19 Pac. Rep. 513, but in such a manner as to show that no reliance was placed upon it. In Burt v. Wilson, 28 Cal. 638, an amended complaint to establish a trust alleged, as a reason why the trust should be established, that in the answer first filed (which had been withdrawn) the trust was admitted. The court replied, as well it might, that the position was not tenable "for a number of reasons;" and the reason which it selected from among the number was that there was no admission because it was not alleged that said answer did not contain a plea of the statute of frauds, which it might have done. It is hardly necessary to say that this does not conflict with the proposition that if the defendant denies the contract he need not plead the statute specially. In the subsequent case of Wakefield v. Greenhood, 29 Cal. 599, 600, the court stated the common-law rule to be as follows: "If the contract stated in the declaration or bill in equity was denied, it was incumbent on the plaintiff or complainant to prove by legal evidence its existence, and this could be done only by the production of proof of the execution and contents of the written agreement, or some note or memorandum thereof executed according to the provisions of the statute of frauds."

We think it clear upon principle that under our statute of frauds and system of pleading it is sufficient to deny the contract without referring to the statute. The old chancery idea that the statute must be specially pleaded grew out of and is based upon, the assumption that a parol contract within the statute had some kind of validity. And one of the objects of the pleadings in chancery being for the discovery of evidence, we can readily see how the doctrine arose. But our statute declares, not merely that no action shall be maintained upon contracts within its operation, but that they are "invalid." A parol contract within such a statute is void. Dung v. Parker, 52 N. Y. 496, 497; Dunphy v. Ryan, 116 U. S. 495, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 486; Welch v. Whelpley, 62 Mich. 15, 28 N. W. Rep. 744; Raub v. Smith, 61 Mich. 543, 28 N. W. Rep. 676. And to require the defendant to show affirmatively the invalidity of the plaintiff's contract would be out of harmony with the general rules of pleading and practice. It may be that it would simplify matters if the plaintiff were required to state in his complaint whether he relies upon a writing or not; for then the question could always be raised at a preliminary stage of the case. But it has been decided that this is not required. Wakefield v. Greenhood, 29 Cal. 599. And, since this is so, and the question may be adjourned to a subsequent stage of the proceedings, we do not see why the burden of allegation should be thrown upon the defendant when the thing is an essential element of the plaintiff's case. Furthermore, under our system the pleader is to allege facts only, avoiding matters of evidence on the one hand and matters of law on the other; and when he states a fact once, either affirmatively or negatively, it is sufficient for that pleading. Therefore when the plaintiff alleges a contract, which is either stated or presumed to be in writing, it is sufficient for the defendant to deny such contract. Having denied it, he is not required to state affirmatively that it was not in writing, or to refer in his answer to the law which makes it invalid. If the statute of limitations constitutes an exception to the rule that matters of law must not be pleaded, it is but an exception to a general rule; and it is quite a different matter. It is not an element of the plaintiff's case. Nor does it render the contract void. McCormick v. Brown, 36 Cal. 184; Grant v. Burr, 54 Cal. 300. And the statutory mode of pleading it is simply a short way of averring the time of the transaction. If the rule that the statute must be specially pleaded is to prevail in this state because it prevailed in the English court of chancery, then, to be consistent, we should say that for the same reason pleadings here should be of matters of evidence to the extent that was proper there. To our minds the rule of the common law which prevails in the majority of American courts, even in equity, is the true one. The bill of exceptions was in time. The other matters do not require special notice. We therefore advise that the judgment and order denying a new trial be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: Vancliff, C.; Foote, C.

SANTA MARINA v. CONNOLLY et al. (No. 11,889.)

FRAUD—FORECLOSURE OF MORTGAGES.

1. The land in controversy was covered by a mortgage to H. for $96,725, held by S. as collateral security. It was agreed that T., the owner, should convey the land to plaintiff for $37,500, the money to be paid to S., which was accordingly done. An agreement was then made between plaintiff and H. and S., by which the latter agreed to foreclose the mortgage, and to bid at the sale the sum of $45,000, and to transfer the certificate of sale to plaintiff; also that, if any third persons should bid more than $45,000, and become the purchasers, H. and S. should pay plaintiff that sum, and he would quitclaim to T. The actual value of the property was not more than $37,500, and there was no intent to defraud other creditors by the arrangement. Held, that the holders of liens junior to the H. mortgage had no cause to complain.

2. It being apparent that the conveyance from T. to plaintiff was a part of the transaction by which S. was to realize the amount of the purchase price on giving plaintiff the benefit of a title under foreclosure, the fact that the deed from T. recited that plaintiff took the land subject to incumbrances did not prevent him from availing himself of the foreclosure as against other liens.

3. The fact that T. was not a party to the written agreement between plaintiff and H. and S. cannot affect plaintiff's rights.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JOHN HUNT, Judge.

Action to enjoin a sale of land under execution, brought by J. D. Santa Marina against Patrick Connolly and others. Plaintiff appeals from an order granting a new trial.

Edward J. Pringle, (John H. Boalt, of counsel,) for appellant. J. M. Lesser, D. H. Whittemore, and W. H. Sears, for respondents.

WORKS, J. One Madison H. Turrill, being the owner of the real estate in controversy in this action, together with several other tracts of land, executed a mortgage thereon to one Edward F. Hall for the sum of $96,725. Subsequently the defendants in this action brought their suit against Turrill, and sued out an attachment upon all of said property, and recovered a judgment for the sum of $10,145.82. An appeal was taken from said judgment to this court, and while the same was pending on appeal the said Hall assigned said mortgage to one Robert Sherwood, as collateral security for a debt due from Hall to Sherwood. The said mortgagor, Turrill, and his mortgagee, Hall, and the assignee of said mortgage, Sherwood, procured the plaintiff in this action to become the purchaser of the property in controversy here for the sum of $37,500, which, by agreement between the parties, was to be paid to Sherwood, the then holder of the mortgage. In consideration of his agreement to purchase the property, Turrill agreed to and did convey to him the real estate, and Hall and Sherwood entered into a written agreement with the plaintiff, in which the fact of incumbrances and the purchase by the plaintiff were recited, and in which it was agreed as follows: "And whereas the said party of the third part [the plaintiff] has, by direction of the said Madison H. Turrill, paid the whole of said purchase money to the said party of the second part, [Sherwood,] to be applied upon the indebtedness of the said party of the first part [Hall] to him, and to the expenses of said foreclosure proceedings: Now, the said parties of the first and second parts, for and in consideration of the premises, and of the sum of one dollar, lawful money, to each of them in hand paid by the said party of the third part, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, have covenanted, promised, and agreed, and by these presents do promise, covenant, and agree for themselves, their heirs, executors, and administrators, to and with the said party of the third part, his heirs, executors, and administrators and assigns, as follows, to-wit: (1) That they will commence immediately to cause the said mortgage of the said party of the first part to be foreclosed, and the said mortgaged premises to be sold by the sheriff without unnecessary delay, and that they or one of them will bid at such sale, upon the said lot of land and premises so conveyed to the party of the third part, the just and full sum of forty-five thousand dollars. (2) That immediately upon receiving the sheriff's certificate of sale for said premises they or he will assign and transfer and deliver the same to the said party of the third part for his use, without further consideration, cost, or charge. (3) That if the parties of the first and second parts should fail to bid for said property at said sale the aforesaid sum of $45,000, the party of the third part shall be at liberty, and he is hereby authorized, to bid said amount therefor in the name of the plaintiff in the suit to foreclose said mortgage, and be entitled to an assignment of the certificate as aforesaid. (4) That, if at the sheriff's sale any other person shall bid for and take the premises so conveyed to the party of the third part any greater sum than $45,000, the said parties of the first and second parts shall and will pay, or cause to be paid, to the said party of the third part on demand, on the first day of the month succeeding the payment by said purchaser of such purchase money, and upon his executing to the said Madison H. Turrill a quitclaim deed for said premises, and delivering to the party of the second part the possession thereof, the just and full sum of $45,000. (5) And the said party of the third part, in consideration of the premises, doth undertake, promise, and agree, to and with the said parties of the first and second parts, that if at said sheriff's sale any person other than said parties of the first and second parts shall become the purchaser of said property so conveyed to him, he will, on demand, on the first day of the month succeeding such purchase, and on his payment to him of the sum of $45,000, convey the said property by quitclaim deed to said Madison H. Turrill, and deliver the possession thereof to the said party of the second part."

In pursuance of this agreement, and while the action of the defendants in attachment was pending in this court, Sherwood brought his action to foreclose the mortgage, making the respondents herein parties to that action, procured a judgment for the amount of the note and the foreclosure of the mortgage, and caused execution to issue, and the property to be sold. At the sale neither Sherwood nor Hall became the purchaser of said property, and the appellant, acting in pursuance of said agreement, himself bid the same in in Sherwood's name for the sum of $45,000; and a certificate of purchase was issued to Sherwood by the sheriff, and by him assigned to the plaintiff without the payment of any money, in addition to the $37,500 already paid to Sherwood. The respondents' judgment was reversed in this court, and sent back for a new trial, and upon a second trial thereof judgment in their favor was again rendered by the court below. Upon their second judgment they caused execution to issue, and placed the same in the hands of the sheriff, who was about to enforce the same by a sale of the property in controversy, and this action was brought to enjoin further proceedings under said judgment. The court below has found the facts as stated above, and found affirmatively that there was no actual fraud on the part of Turrill, Hall, Sherwood, and the appellant, or either of them, in the transaction with reference to the purchase of the property, and the foreclosure and sale thereof, and judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff that he was the owner of the property in controversy, and enjoining further proceedings under the judgment of the respondents. A motion for a new trial was made by the respondents, and granted, and this appeal is from the order granting a new trial.

There is no controversy between the parties as to the material facts. The sole question presented is whether the transaction between the appellant, Turrill, Hall, and Sherwood was a fraud upon the respondents or not. Conceding, for the purposes of respondents' case, that it was the actual intention of these parties to cut off the subsequent lien of respondents by a foreclosure of the mortgage, we confess our inability to see how any injury could have resulted to them by reason of the agreement and the foreclosure and sale. It is conceded that the mortgage lien was a valid one, and prior to the attachment lien of the respondents. The mortgage must therefore have been satisfied before the property could have been made available in satisfaction of their debt. The court found that the property was not worth more than the sum of $37,500, the amount actually paid by the appellant. By the agreement the holders of subsequent liens, covering this and other property of Turrill, were actually benefited to the extent of $7,500 by the stipulation that upon foreclosure a credit should be given on the mortgage of $45,000 when the value of this piece of land and the amount actually paid for it was $37,500. Nor did this agreement in any way prevent competition at the sale, as it was expressly provided that, in case any one else should bid more than $45,000 for the property, said last-named sum should be paid to the appellant, and he should reconvey the property to Turrill. Thus it was to the interest of Hall and Sherwood, as well as to all of the lienholders, to make this piece of property bring as much as possible, that other pieces of property owned by Turrill, and covered by the liens, might be relieved of the burdens resting upon them to that extent. We are unable to see any wrong in this transaction on the part of the appellant. He could not have been expected to pay the full value of the property, and take it subject to the whole of Sherwood's mortgage as well as subsequent liens, which were far in excess of its value. He had a perfect right to secure himself against such a result by the agreement that the money advanced by him should be applied upon a foreclosure of the mortgage, which would give him a title free from incumbrance; and so long as he paid full value for the property he was guilty of no wrong, and his acts could injure no one.

The only part of the transaction which, apparently, needs explanation is the provision that, while only $37,500 was paid, a credit of $45,000 was to be given upon a foreclosure and sale, but this is easily explainable. It is evident that Sherwood and Hall were anxious to realize $37,500 on the property. It appears in evidence that they had been offering it for $35,000. The appellant could not well afford to pay his money and run the risk of some one else becoming the purchaser at the foreclosure sale without some consideration. Therefore it was agreed that in consideration of his advancement of the money he was to receive, in case some one else became the purchaser, the amount paid by him, and $7,500 in addition, and, in order to prevent some one else becoming the purchaser, Sherwood and Hall agreed to bid the sum of $45,000 on the property. In either event the agreement was a positive benefit, instead of an injury to subsequent lienholders.

We have carefully examined the opinion of the learned judge of the court below upon the ruling granting the new trial. He concludes that the findings of facts were not sustained by the evidence in some particulars which seem to us to be wholly immaterial. Conceding that such findings were not sustained by the evidence, the conclusion of law should have been the same.

It is contended that the deed from Turrill to appellant recited that the appellant took the property subject to the incumbrances, and therefore he could not avail himself of the contract of Sherwood and Hall to relieve himself of any of the liens. But, conceding the fact, the conclusion does not follow. It clearly appears that the sale of the property was made in order to realize as much as possible on this one tract of the incumbered property. The appellant agreed to pay, and did pay, on the express agreement that the property was to be sold on foreclosure, and that he was to have the benefit of the title to be obtained by such foreclosure and sale. In other words, the effect of the agreement was that he should advance the money, but it was to be a payment on the foreclosure sale of the property. Again, it is urged that Turrill was not a party to the agreement for the foreclosure of the mortgage and application of the money, as therein provided. But Turrill is not complaining, and the fact that he was not a party to the contract cannot affect the rights of the appellant. Besides it clearly appears from the evidence that Turrill practically surrendered the property to the mortgagee for the purpose of having it disposed of for the satisfaction of the debt, or as much of it as could be realized from the sale of the property. The sale was negotiated by Hall. Turrill conveyed to the appellant for the sole purpose of carrying out the plan by which the sum of $37,500 was to be realized and applied to the indebtedness upon the terms agreed upon. As the property sold for its full value, this was all subsequent lienholders had a right to ask. Taking this view of the transaction, we are clear that the court below was right in its first conclusion, and that it was error to grant a new trial.

We do not overlook the rule that, on an appeal from an order granting a new trial, every intendment is in favor of the order of the court, but, where the question presented is purely one of law, and this court is satisfied that an error has been committed, the rule is not applicable. The order appealed from is reversed.

ROBINSON v. ROBINSON. (No. 11,903.)

JUDGMENT—DIVORCE—ALIMONY.

1. A judgment of divorce directed defendant to pay plaintiff $100 as counsel fees, and all her costs, and also the sum of $1,500 alimony. It further provided "that defendant pay to plaintiff's attorney" said $100 "as counsel fees of plaintiff in this action," and to the clerk of court "for the use of plaintiff, as plaintiff's costs in this action, the sum of $28.05." Held, that this was not a judgment in favor of the counsel or the clerk of court, (persons not parties to the action,) but was in favor of plaintiff, in whose name alone execution could issue.

2. Under Civil Code Cal. § 139, providing that, when a divorce is granted for an offense of the husband, "the court may compel him to provide for the maintenance of the children of the marriage, and to make such suitable allowance to the wife for her support during life, or for a shorter period, as the court may deem just," etc., alimony may be decreed in gross.

3. Where defendant's property is worth $5,000 there is no abuse of discretion in decreeing plaintiff alimony in the sum of $1,500, for the support of herself and two small children.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Del Norte county; JAMES E. MURPHY, Judge.

R. W. Miller, (George A. Knight, of counsel,) for appellant. L. F. Cooper and Sawyer & Barnett, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. C. This is an action for divorce on the ground of extreme cruelty. It is alleged in the complaint that there are two female children, the issue of the marriage, one under four and the other under two years of age; that plaintiff has no property or means of support; and that defendant has separate property of the value of $5,000, which yields him an income. The court found that plaintiff was entitled to a divorce and the custody of the children; that defendant's property was of the value of $5,000, and that the rents, issues, and profits thereof were $350 per annum; that the property was not "susceptible of being divided between the plaintiff and defendant alone, and that on a dissolution of the marriage between the parties it would be more just to decree the plaintiff a sum in gross or continuous alimony for the support of herself and children than to award her an individual share of said property;" that "the sum of $1,500 would be a reasonable lump sum for defendant to pay plaintiff as alimony for the support of herself and two minor children;" that "defendant should pay her the sum of $100 as her counsel fees in this action, and all her costs in this action, and that he should also pay her the sum of $1,500, in full, for all future alimony for the support of herself and her two minor children." The judgment dissolved the marriage between the parties, and awarded the custody of the children to the plaintiff, and proceeded as follows: "And it is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that defendant pay to plaintiff's attorney the sum of one hundred dollars as counsel fees of plaintiff in this action, and that the said defendant pay to the clerk of this court for the use of the plaintiff, as plaintiff's costs in this action taken, the sum of $28.05, and that the said defendant pay to said plaintiff the sum of one thousand five hundred dollars in full for all future alimony for the support of herself and her two minor children, and that said sum to be paid, amounting in the aggregate to the sum of $1,628.05, be and the same is hereby declared a lien on the following described real property which is hereby declared to belong to the defendant. * * * That all of said sums may be paid to the party entitled thereto, or to the clerk of this court for their use, and if the same be not paid, and receipts therefor filed with the said clerk within twenty days from the date of this decree, execution or order of sale of the said property may issue thereon, on demand of the plaintiff, under which execution or order of sale, the said real property, or so much thereof as will satisfy plaintiff's demand, to-wit, $1,628.05, may be sold in the manner prescribed by law for the sale of real property under execution." From this judgment defendant appeals, and the case is brought here on the judgment roll.

The judgment is objected to on two grounds: First. It is claimed that it is void in so far as it awards counsel fees and costs, because it directs the money to be paid to the attorney and clerk; and, second, it is claimed that the court had no power to award, and abused its discretion in awarding alimony in a gross sum. In support of the first point the case of Sharon v. Sharon, 75 Cal. 37, 16 Pac. Rep. 345, is cited. In that case an order was made that defendant pay as counsel fees, on or before a day named, "the sum of fifty-five thousand dollars,—that is to say, twenty-five thousand dollars to Messrs. Tyler & Tyler, or order; ten thousand dollars to George Flournoy, or order; ten thousand dollars to Walter Levy, or order; ten thousand dollars to David S. Terry, or order; and five thousand dollars to R. P. Clement, or order; and, in case any of such payments are not made on or before the time herein fixed, then the party or the parties entitled thereto shall have execution therefor, pursuant to section 1007 of the Code of Civil Procedure of the state of California," and it was held that this order "was a direct judgment for money in favor of persons not parties to the suit, and to that extent was irregular and void."

In this case there was no direct judgment for money in favor of any one but the plaintiff. The finding was that "defendant should pay her [the plaintiff] the sum of $100 as her counsel fees," and "all her costs," and the judgment simply directs him to pay the $100 to plaintiff's attorney "as counsel fees of plaintiff," and the costs to the clerk of the court "for the use of the plaintiff." It then provides that all the money, including the allowance to the plaintiff, may be paid to the clerk, and that, if the same be not paid within a time fixed, execution may issue, on demand of the plaintiff, and so much of defendant's property may be sold thereunder "as will satisfy plaintiff's demand, to-wit, $1,628.05." Now, while the judgment is in some respects not very happily worded, still we think it should be treated as a judgment in favor of the plaintiff for all the money required to be paid, on which execution can only issue in her name and on her demand. The judgment is thus distinguishable from the order made in the case of Sharon v. Sharon, and in our opinion it was neither irregular nor void. As to the second point, the Civil Code (section 139) provides as follows: "Where a divorce is granted for an offense of the husband, the court may compel him to provide for the maintenance of the children of the marriage, and to make such suitable allowance to the wife for her support, during her life, or for a shorter period, as the court may deem just, having regard to the circumstances of the parties respectively. And the court may, from time to time, modify its orders in these respects."

The question is: Had the court the power, under this section, to require a gross sum to be paid to the plaintiff for her support? We think the language broad enough to confer this power. It will be observed that the allowance may be for the wife's support during her life, and there is nothing limiting it to periodical payments. If it were so limited, it would be possible, where no security had been required, for the husband to dispose of all his property and then go away or die and thus defeat the allowance altogether. And this has been the practical construction of similar statutes in many other states. In Burrows v. Purple, 107 Mass. 432, Justice GRAY, speaking for the court, said: "This court has long been vested, by successive statutes, with authority, upon granting to a wife a decree of divorce either from bed and board or from the bond of matrimony, to allow her reasonable alimony out of her husband's estate. And the practical construction of these statutes has always been that such alimony might, at the discretion of the court, be ordered to be paid in one gross sum, instead of being made payable at stated periods. In many other states, also, the word 'alimony' is commonly used as equally applicable to all allowances, whether annual or in gross, made to a wife upon a decree of divorce, under similar statutes;" citing Parsons v Parsons, 9 N. H. 309; Whittier v. Whittier, 11 Fost. 452; Buckminster v. Buckminster, 38 Vt. 248; Sanford v. Sanford, 5 Day, 353; Lyon v. Lyon, 21 Conn. 185; Piatt v. Piatt, 9 Ohio, 37; Hedrick v. Hedrick, 28 Ind. 291; Wheeler v. Wheeler, 18 Ill. 39; and Jeter v. Jeter, 36 Ala. 391. In Jeter v. Jeter, supra, a sum of money in gross was decreed to the wife under a statute which reads as follows: "If the wife has no separate estate, or if it be insufficient for her maintenance, the chancellor, upon granting a divorce, must decree the wife an allowance out of the husband's estate, taking into consideration the value thereof and the condition of his family." And it was held that the word "allowance" as used in the statute, authorized a decree for a sum in gross. So in Piatt v. Piatt, supra, the same term was used in the statute, and it was held that under it the court was authorized to render a decree for a gross sum, or for installments payable at stated intervals. There are other cases to the same effect which might be cited, but we think the above sufficient. Assuming then that the court had power to make an allowance of a gross sum, is there anything here showing an abuse of its discretion? We think not. The sum allowed was less than a third of the value of the husband's estate, and this was for the support of an abused and injured wife, who was in feeble health, and had two small children to care for. "Having regard to the circumstances of the parties respectively," the sum seems to us quite as small as it ought to be. We therefore advise that the judgment be affirmed.

ASSUMPSIT—INSTRUCTIONS—APPEAL.

1. Assumpsit will lie to recover a balance due on a special contract to erect a building, and it is not necessary to allege the performance of all the conditions to be performed before payment was due.

2. The verdict of the jury will not be disturbed because the evidence is conflicting.

3. Instructions are properly refused when the charge of the court covers all the points in the case, including those found in the instructions requested.

4. Where, after the reversal of a judgment in a mechanic's lien suit, the case is remanded for a new trial, and the plaintiff amends his complaint and sues in assumpsit, the law of the decision on the appeal is no longer the law applicable to the pleadings.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JOHN HUNT, Judge.

Tilden & Tilden, for appellants. Hassett & Tevlin and Theodore Bradley, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. C. This action was originally brought to foreclose a mechanic's lien for $1,395.50 on a block of buildings in the city of San Francisco. The buildings were erected by plaintiff for defendants under a written contract, which provided that plaintiff should furnish all the materials, and do the work according to plans and specifications made by George Bordwell, architect, and receive therefor the sum of $9,800, payable in installments as the work progressed, the last payment to be made "when the houses shall be completed, each in all its parts, and accepted by the architect." The $1,395.50 consisted of an unpaid balance of the contract price and $375 alleged to be due for extra work and materials. The case was tried, and judgment rendered for plaintiff. An appeal was taken by defendants from the judgment and an order denying them a new trial, and the judgment and order were reversed on the authority of Loup v. Railroad Co., 63 Cal. 97 The case came on again for trial, and the plaintiff was allowed, over the objections of defendants, to file an amended complaint in indebitatus assumpsit. It contained three counts. The first alleged an indebtedness from defendants to plaintiff of $1,020.50 for work and labor done and materials furnished in the erection of a block of buildings in the city of San Francisco. The second alleged an indebtedness of $270 for extra work done and materials furnished in the erection of the said block of buildings. And the third alleged an indebtedness of $105, for putting a door in defendants' building, and constructing a sidewalk in front thereof, at their special instance and request. The prayer was for judgment for $1,395.50, the aggregate of these amounts, with interest and costs.

The defendants, by their answer, denied that they were indebted to plaintiff in the sums of money named in the complaint, or in any sums or sum whatever, and to the first two counts they pleaded the statute of limitations. They then alleged that the labor and materials sued for, except the last item of $105, were executed under a written contract, which was furnished by the parties on the 26th of April, 1876, and a copy of which was set forth and made a part of the answer. They further alleged that they complied with all the conditions of the contract on their part, and paid plaintiff during the progress of the work the sum of $9,104, but that plaintiff failed to comply with the conditions of the contract on his part; that he omitted to put in the buildings many things required by the contract and specifications, and that the value of the articles and work omitted was $450; that the buildings were not completed within the time named in the contract, and defendants were damaged thereby in the sum of $900; that the foundation was not put down to solid ground, and by reason thereof the buildings settled, to the damage of the same in the sum of over $1,000. The prayer was for judgment against the plaintiff for $1,500 and costs of suit. The case was tried before a jury, and the verdict and judgment were for plaintiff. Defendants moved for a new trial, which was denied, and have appealed from the judgment and order.

When the trial commenced, the plaintiff first introduced in evidence the building contract, a copy of which is set out in the answer, and the specifications referred to therein. He then introduced evidence showing that the terms of the contract were subsequently changed in certain respects by agreement of the parties; that he proceeded to construct and complete the buildings according to the plans and specifications; that he performed certain extra work, which was provided for by an indorsement on the contract, and for which he was to receive $270; that he also placed an extra door in one of the houses by direction of the architect at a cost of $15, and by an agreement with defendants laid a new sidewalk in front of the building, for which they were to pay him $90; that he was prevented by defendants from completing the whole work at the time named in the contract; that after it was in fact completed the architect suggested certain items of work which he wished to have done, saying that when they were done to his satisfaction he would accept the buildings as complete, and that he (plaintiff) did the suggested work, so far as it was called for by the contract; that a few days afterwards, at a meeting of the plaintiff, defendant Balletta, and the architect, the architect said he was satisfied with the building, and would accept it; that at this meeting the architect also said to plaintiff's attorney, who was present, that "he [plaintiff] had a hard contract anyhow, and that he was glad that he had finished it up, and that he had advised him not to take the contract in the first place; that he knew he lost a great deal of money on it; he said he knew he lost not less than $2,000 on the contract; he was glad it was finished;" that it was then arranged that another meeting of the parties should be held at the architect's office to figure up the amount due plaintiff, and settle the whole matter; and that in pursuance of this arrangement the parties met, the amount due plaintiff was figured up and agreed to be, including the extra work, $1,395.50; and that after that the architect called plaintiff's attorney aside, "and spoke in a low tone, and said that he wanted plaintiff to pay him $100; that he had been to a great deal of trouble in superintending the buildings, and that the amount paid him by defendant for his services was not sufficient;" that plaintiff, on being informed of this demand, refused to pay it, and the architect then said that he would charge plaintiff for lost time, and would not receive the buildings; that defendant was present, with a bag of money on the table, ready to pay plaintiff, if the architect had not stopped him from doing so. The defendants objected to the admission in evidence of the contract and specifications, on the ground that they showed an entirely different contract from the one set up in the complaint, and were therefore irrelevant and immateral; and to all the evidence showing that the terms of the contract were varied and changed, and to all evidence offered to excuse or explain the delay in the completion of the contract according to its terms, on the ground that it was incompetent, and inadmissible under the pleadings. They also moved for a nonsuit on similar grounds. The objections and motion were all overruled, and exceptions reserved.

1. The first and most important question presented relates to the amended complaint, and the plaintiff's right to obtain relief thereunder. It is contended for appellants that an action in general assumpsit will only lie where nothing remains to be done except to ascertain and determine the amount of money due the plaintiff, and that where, as in this case, the action is based on a special contract, the plaintiff must allege and prove the performance of all conditions precedent before he can recover. And it is said that all the conditions precedent were not performed here, because, under the contract, the last payment was not to be due until the buildings should be completed and accepted by the architect. It has been frequently held in this state that, notwithstanding the requirement that the facts constituting the cause of action should be stated in ordinary and concise language, the common counts may be used. Freeborn v. Glazer, 10 Cal. 337; Wilkins v. Stidger, 22 Cal. 235; Abadie v. Carrillo, 32 Cal. 172; Friermuth v. Friermuth, 46 Cal. 42; Magee v. Kast, 49 Cal. 141. In De Boom v. Priestly, 1 Cal. 206, there was a special contract for the erection of a building, which was deviated from by instructions from the defendants. The action was brought on a quantum meruit, and testimony was admitted of the value of plaintiff's services. The court refused to instruct the jury, at the request of defendants, that, "if the jury believes that there was a special contract between the parties to erect the buildings at a specified price, and according to an agreed plan, which was afterwards changed by consent, the plaintiffs are compelled to sue upon that special contract, so far as it can be traced, and cannot recover upon an implied contract for work and labor, or for materials." And it was held that the evidence was properly admitted, and the instruction refused. In Reynolds v. Jourdan, 6 Cal. 108, the plaintiffs brought an action of assumpsit for work and labor done and materials furnished in the erection of a building for defendant. In his answer the defendant set up a written contract for the erection of the building, and on the trial the plaintiffs offered the contract in evidence, and it was admitted over the objection of defendant. The court said: "When the entire performance of a special contract has been prevented by one of the parties, or where its terms have been afterwards varied by the agreement of both parties, the action for the amount due for work and labor should be in the form of indebitatus assumpsit, and not upon the contract. In such case the contract may be introduced in evidence by either party as an admission of the standard of value, or as proof of any other fact necessary to the recovery, and should be allowed to go to the jury whenever it can aid them in attaining a sound conclusion." In Farron v. Sherwood, 17 N. Y. 227, it was held that the Code had not changed the former rules of pleading, and that a party who had wholly performed a special contract on his part may still count on the implied assumpsit to pay the stipulated price, and is not bound to declare specially on the agreement. And the doctrine of that case has been affirmed in other cases. See Hosley v. Black, 28 N. Y. 438; Hurst v. Litchfield, 39 N. Y. 377. In Kerstetter v. Raymond, 10 Ind. 199, it was held that the rules of common-law pleading, which permitted evidence of special contracts to be given under the common counts, had not been changed by the Code, and that they applied—First, where the whole of the contract has been performed on the part of the plaintiff; second, where the special contract has been altered or deviated from by common consent; third, where the special contract has been performed in part, and its full performance is prevented or dispensed with by the defendant; and, fourth, where the plaintiff has not fulfilled on his part, but has, under it, done or delivered something of value to the defendant. The case of O'Connor v. Dingley, 26 Cal. 11, cited by appellants, is not in conflict with the foregoing cases. The action was assumpsit, and the evidence showed a special contract whereby the defendant was to pay plaintiff, not in money, but by note. In the opinion there are some lines of protest against the acceptance of the common counts under our reformed modes of procedure, but the decision was only that the proper action would be one for damages for failure to give the note. In view of the foregoing authorities we think the common counts may be used in a case like this, and that there was no error in the admission of evidence or in the denial of the motion for nonsuit. It is true, it does not appear that there was any formal acceptance of the buildings by the architect. But the plaintiff's evidence shows that they were in fact completed according to the terms of the contract, except as to time, and that the failure to have them done in time was the defendant's fault. It further shows that after they were completed the architect said he was satisfied with them, and would accept them. If, after this, he in bad faith, and for a selfish purpose, changed his mind, and refused to accept them, that fact cannot affect the plaintiff's right to recover.

2. There was evidence introduced by the defendants conflicting on some points with that introduced by the plaintiff. The record, however, shows only a conflict; and, in view of the well-settled rule in such cases, we cannot disturb the verdict on the ground that it was not justified by the evidence.

3. The court refused to give to the jury certain instructions asked by defendants, and then read to them its own charge. The charge covered the whole case, and stated the law applicable thereto very fully, clearly, and, as we think, correctly. It also included all the points found in the instructions refused, which were correct statements of the law, and were applicable to the case. We therefore see no error in the refusal, or in the charge given.

4. It is contended that the decision in Loup v. Railroad Co., supra, on the authority of which the former judgment was reversed, has become the law of this case, and that, under it, averment and proof that the buildings had been accepted were necessary. It was held in Sharp v. Miller, 66 Cal. 98, 4 Pac. Rep. 1065, that the reversal of a judgment and order denying a new trial places the parties in the lower court in the same position as if the case had never been tried, with the exception that the former opinion of the appellate court must be followed, so far as applicable, in the new trial. After the judgment in this case was reversed, the plaintiff amended his complaint, as he had a right to amend it. Cox v. McLaughlin, 76 Cal. 60, 18 Pac. Rep. 100. The law of the case cited was, therefore, no longer applicable to the pleadings. On the new trial the court seems to have followed and was governed by the "law of the case" in the admission of evidence as to performance, waiver, refusal, etc., and in its instructions to the jury respecting them.

5. No point is made by counsel on the statute of limitations, and we therefore find it unnecessary to consider the question as to whether the action was barred or not. Looking at the whole record, we find nothing calling for a reversal, and therefore advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

COONRADT v. HILL. (No. 12,504.)

ADVERSE POSSESSION—EASEMENTS.

1. Under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 325, as amended in 1878, relating to title by adverse possession, and requiring, in addition to such possession, the payment by the claimant of "all taxes which have been levied and assessed upon such land," a claimant is not excluded from the benefit of his plea unless the property was actually assessed, even though it may have been his fault that it was not assessed.

2. Defendant is entitled to plead adverse possession of a ditch appurtenant to his land, and running through plaintiff's land, though defendant has never paid any taxes assessed against plaintiff's land, (which did not appear to have been taxed any higher on account of such ditch,) but has always paid the taxes on his own land, whose value was enhanced by the water from the ditch.

3. So far as the defense of adverse possession or of equitable estoppel was concerned, it was immaterial whether or not the waters of a natural stream which fed the ditch were appropriated in compliance with the statute as to posting notices, etc.

4. Evidence of the convenience and necessity of the ditch to defendant's farm was admissible, as tending to show that the water-right was appurtenant to, and passed to defendant by a grant of, the land.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Butte county; W C. VAN FLEET, Judge.

Action to determine the right to an easement. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals.

Hundley & Gale, for appellant. F. C. Lusk, for respondent.

BEATTY, C. J. Clear creek is a natural stream flowing in a southerly direction through the middle of the east half of section 23 of a certain government township in Butte county. In August, 1876, the government title to the S. W. ¼ of the same section vested in John Powers, who, in the fall of that year, completed the diversion of a portion of the water of Clear creek from its natural channel to said S. W. ¼, where the same has been since continuously used by him and his successor, the defendant, Hill, for watering stock, for domestic purposes, and for irrigating their crops and orchards. This diversion and appropriation was effected by means of a dam placed in the stream about the middle of the N. E. ¼ of the section, and a ditch heading at the dam, and extending thence southerly through said N. E. ¼, and south-westerly through the S. E. ¼ to the line of said S. W. ¼. In 1879 said S. E. ¼ was patented to the California & Oregon Railroad Company in pursuance of grants contained in certain acts of congress passed in 1866, 1868, and 1869. In 1882 the plaintiff, Coonradt, acquired the title of the railroad company to the W. ½ of said S. E. ¼, across which Clear creek flows in its natural course, and through which the Powers ditch extends. Four years after thus becoming the owner of the land crossed by the Powers ditch, and riparian proprietor on the creek below the point of his diversion of the water, viz., in July, 1886, Coonradt commenced this action, in which he seeks to have it adjudged that defendant has no title to the ditch, and no right to maintain it, or to divert any part of the waters of Clear creek through it. To sustain his suit, he relies upon his riparian right to the full natural flow of the stream as against one whose land does not border upon it, and who, as he contends, has made no valid appropriation of the water which he is diverting.

The defendant relies upon three separate defenses: First, a valid appropriation of the water by Powers under license of the government while it was property of the government; second, the statute of limitations; and, third, an equitable estoppel arising out of the acts and declarations of the plaintiff, by which he (defendant) was induced to purchase the Powers land in the belief that the ditch and water-right were appurtenant to it. The findings and conclusions of the superior court were expressly in favor of defendant as to the last two defenses, and substantially supported the first. The plaintiff appeals from the judgment entered in conformity to the findings, and also from an order overruling his motion for a new trial.

We perceive no error in any of the findings or conclusions of the superior court, but it is unnecessary to consider or to pass upon all the points covered by the discussion of counsel. It is very clear to our minds that the defense based upon the statute of limitations was fully made out, and it will be sufficient to notice the points relating to that part of the case. Every fact respecting the character and duration of the possession and use of the ditch and water by defendant and his predecessor, required to establish a prescriptive right to such possession and use, is found upon testimony entirely satisfactory and substantially uncontradicted. With respect to this ground of defense, the appellant urges but one objection to the conclusions of the superior court, and that is founded upon the amendment of April, 1878, to section 325 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which requires, in addition to adverse possession, the payment by the holder of "all taxes which have been levied and assessed upon such land." With respect to this point the finding of the superior court is "that no taxes have ever been levied or assessed against said ditch and water-right, or either, at any time during their existence, for any purpose whatsoever." Notwithstanding this finding, the appellant contends that the defendant did not bring himself within the statute, and is not entitled to plead it. For, he says, this ditch and water-right were of value; they ought to have been assessed, and ought to have borne their share of taxes. If they did not, it was solely because the defendant fraudulently evaded the duty cast upon all property owners by the statute, of including in their sworn returns to the assessor all property owned or claimed by them and subject to taxation; and he argues that the defendant should not be allowed to avail himself of the benefits of a law, the policy of which he has thus circumvented.

We do not think it by any means clear that defendant was required, under a proper construction of the revenue law, to include his ditch and water-right as a separate item in his return to the assessor. This is not the sort of ditch to which section 3663 of the Political Code seems to refer. It is a small ditch, supplying water for domestic purposes, watering stock, and irrigating a small and definite tract of land. It is used solely in connection with, is appurtenant to, and passes by conveyance of, that tract of land. Civil Code, § 662; Farmer v. Water Co., 56 Cal. 11. It would seem that the ditches referred to in the above-cited section of the Political Code are those which are constructed on a large and extensive scale, not appurtenant to any particular land, but held in gross, and operated for the supply of communities and neighborhoods for mining, manufacturing, irrigating, and other purposes. But we need not decide this point, for under the law as it is written, and as it has been construed and applied in this court, the defendant was not excluded from the benefit of his plea of the statute of limitations unless the property which he claims to have held adversely was actually assessed. Ross v. Evans, 65 Cal. 440, 4 Pac. Rep. 443; Heilbron v. Water Ditch Co., 17 Pac. Rep. 65. The doctrine of these cases, however, does not entirely dispose of appellant's objection for he contends that the easement claimed by defendant in his land, although not assessed separately and eo nomine to any one, was virtually and in effect assessed to him. He says: "My land, and the entire property therein, has been assessed to me, and I have paid the taxes. But the easement claimed by defendant is an interest in my land. If his claim is well founded, I own my land minus the easement which he owns. He should pay the taxes on that, and I only upon what remains after that is deducted." In support of this position he cites the case of McNoble v. Justiniano, 70 Cal. 395, 11 Pac. Rep. 742. That was an action to recover 160 acres of land, part of a larger tract belonging to plaintiff, the whole of which had been assessed to her, and upon which she had paid all the taxes. The defendant, although he had been for 10 years in adverse possession of the demanded premises, had never returned them for separate assessment to himself, and had never offered to pay the taxes on them. It was held that his plea of the statute of limitations could not be sustained.

But this case is essentially different. There the land was assessed by the acre and in proportion to its extent. Necessarily the plaintiff had paid the full amount of taxes upon every acre of land in dispute, and the defendant had paid nothing. In this case the defendant paid taxes on the land in connection with which the ditch was used and which was benefited thereby. The evidence shows that the land with the ditch was valuable, produced good crops, and grew fruit trees, etc., and that without the water it would be comparatively useless. It is fair to presume, therefore, that the value of the water-right was no greater than the enhanced value of the land to which it was appurtenant, and that in paying taxes on his land the defendant paid taxes on the water-right. On the other hand, there is no legal presumption or necessary inference that the ditch and water flowing therein either enhanced or diminished the value of plaintiff's land. Land so situated may be damaged, or may be benefited, and it must be presumed that the assessor, seeing plaintiff's land as it was, crossed by a ditch in the sole and exclusive use of defendant, made proper allowance for its advantages and disadvantages in valuing the land. As matter of fact, the evidence shows that plaintiff was greatly benefited by the ditch. Without going above the line of his own land, he could not divert any water from the creek, although an abundance was flowing therein, so as to bring it where he could use it, and up to the day he brought this action he never had acquired any right to divert the water on the lands above him. The defendant and his predecessor, Powers, however, had for 10 years enjoyed the right of diverting the water at their dam on the N. E. ¼ of the section, and by that means were enabled to conduct it across the higher parts of plaintiff's land, who, by their permission, when they did not require the full capacity of their ditch, made use of it for his own purposes and to his great advantage. His land, therefore, during the time of the running of the statute, was worth more by reason of the ditch than it would have been without it; and if it was assessed merely as so much land, and wholly without regard to the ditch, he paid less taxes rather than more than he ought to have paid. Certain at least it is the evidence does not show and there is no ground for presuming that he paid, and defendant failed to pay, taxes on the thing to which defendant asserts a prescriptive right, and consequently the decision in McNoble v. Justiniano, supra, does not apply. In this view the exception to the testimony of the defendant as to the manner in which the assessor regarded the ditch when assessing the land becomes immaterial. In the absence of the testimony, the court would have presumed that the advantages and disadvantages of the ditch had been considered in assessing the land.

As to other errors assigned by appellant, and based upon exceptions taken to rulings of the superior court in the course of the trial, it is sufficient to say that, so far as the defenses founded upon the statute of limitations and equitable estoppel are concerned, it is immaterial whether defendant or his grantor made an appropriation of the waters of Clear creek in compliance with the Code requirements as to posting notices, etc., or not. To sustain these defenses, the actual construction of the ditch could be shown, without showing the preliminary posting or recording of notice. There was no error in admitting evidence as to the convenience and necessity of the ditch to the Powers place. Such evidence was relevant and material to the defense of estoppel, and also to show that the water-right was appurtenant to the land, and passed to the defendant by grant of the land.

The evidence admitted over plaintiff's objection, as to the actual intention and understanding of the parties at the time of defendant's purchase of the Powers place, to the effect that they all understood that the ditch and water-right was included in the sale, and was to pass by the deed as appurtenant to the land, if incompetent, was clearly not prejudicial. In the absence of such testimony, no other construction could have been given to the deed. The other assignments of error relate exclusively to the other defenses, and need not be considered. Judgment and order affirmed.

WATER-COURSES—RIPARIAN RIGHTS—ADVERSE POSSESSION.

1. A stream which had been a natural water-course was obstructed by a flood, and from that time water flowed to plaintiff's lands, situated on the stream, only in time of freshets. Plaintiff purchased the right to turn other streams into the old channel for purposes of irrigation. Defendant corporation had obtained from plaintiff's grantors the right to turn water into the stream, with the privilege of turning it out again, and of clearing the obstructions from the stream. Held that, this being a natural water-course, defendants were not entitled to take out more water than they turned in, and would be restrained from building a dam across the stream, whereby all the water would be diverted, and none would flow by plaintiff's land.

2. Though the natural flow of water after the stream was obstructed only reached plaintiff's land on occasions of freshets, yet, when the flow of water was increased by the removal of the obstructions by defendants, the increase of flow accrued to the benefit of plaintiff, and not to that of defendants, who had no right to the natural flow.

3. Where it appeared that defendants removed the obstructions for the privilege of turning other waters into the stream, and not for the right to use the natural flow of the water, the holding of defendants was not adverse to that of plaintiff.

Brown & Daggett, for appellants. A. J. Atwell and N. O. Bradley, for respondent.

WORKS, J. This is a proceeding to enjoin the construction of a dam across, and a diversion of the waters from, a certain stream known as "Packwood Creek." The complaint, after alleging the corporate capacity of the defendants, and the ownership of the plaintiff and his grantors, for 10 years last past, in and to certain real estate described, alleges "that from time immemorial that certain natural water-course called 'Packwood Creek' has been accustomed to and did and does now flow through said lands, moistening and irrigating the same, and furnishing its waters to the plaintiff and to his grantors for the irrigation of such lands, and for the use of their live-stock; that for the purpose of increasing the flow of the waters of said stream the plaintiff's grantors many years since, and long before any wrongful acts of defendants hereinafter set out, acquired the right to divert from the St. Johns and Kaweah rivers, two large streams flowing from the Sierra Nevada mountains, waters into the said Packwood creek, and acquired the right of way to and the ownership of the bed and channel of said creek, and then and ever since has and still does divert from said streams into the said creek, and thence carry down through the same to the lands of plaintiff aforesaid, for the irrigation of said lands hereinbefore described, a large amount of water, all of which rights are now the property of plaintiff; that the plaintiff has now growing in and upon the lands aforesaid a large vineyard, and a great number of acres of grain, which he is engaged in irrigating with the waters flowing in said creek, and which, without such irrigation, will dry up, die, and become lost and worthless to plaintiff, but which, by irrigation, is of great value; that the defendants have entered upon said stream, Packwood creek, above plaintiff's said land, and are now engaged in constructing a dam therein, with the avowed purpose of turning the waters thereof, which otherwise would and of right ought to flow down to plaintiff's said land, out of said creek, and into a ditch constructed by them, and that such entry and construction of such dam is without any right whatever, and is against the protest of the owner of the land through which the said stream runs; that if defendants are permitted to proceed to construct such dam it will result in immediate and great and irreparable loss and injury to plaintiff, result in the loss of his vines and crops, and that such loss and injury will not be and is not susceptible of computation or determination in an action at law."

The defendants, in their answer, deny all of the material allegations of the complaint, and by way of a special defense allege, in substance, that certain of its predecessors and grantors acquired the right to divert and appropriate waters from St. Johns river, and to transfer the same to the Kaweah river, referred to in the complaint, which rights were then owned by said defendants, and that it obtained from said parties the right to use a portion of the waters so appropriated and conveyed by them into the Kaweah river from said St. Johns river aforesaid, which rights said corporation still owns; "that, prior to the year A. D. 1867, said Packwood creek united with and formed a branch of said Kaweah river; that during the winter season of the year 1867–68, by reason of the heavy freshets, the flood and rains which then occurred, the bed and channel of said Packwood creek for the distance of about one mile, commencing at the place where said creek united with said Kaweah river, became and were filled up with earth and débris, deposited therein by the action of said freshets and floods, and by reason thereof the water then and thereafter ceased to flow through the channel of said Packwood creek, and said Packwood creek then ceased to have, and ever since has ceased to have, any natural source of supply of water." It is further averred, in substance, that while said Packwood creek was so obstructed the corporation defendant informed the grantors of the plaintiff, who then possessed all the rights and privileges of turning and conveying water through the channel of said Packwood creek, that said corporation desired and intended to obtain from the owners of the land, through which that portion of the channel of said Packwood creek above referred to ran, the right to enter upon said portion of said channel, which was filled up as aforesaid, and remove the earth and débris therefrom, and appropriate and use the channel for the purpose of conveying water from the Kaweah river through said channel, and by means of a dam convey said water from said channel through a ditch to lands in the vicinity of Tulare City, in said county; and that said grantors of the plaintiff, with full and complete knowledge of their rights in the premises, and knowing that the defendant would have to expend large sums of money in order to remove said earth and débris from said channel, and construct said dam, for the purpose of deceiving said corporation defendant, and with intent to induce it to perform labor and expend large sums of money in digging out and removing from the said channel of Packwood creek the earth and débris deposited therein as aforesaid, plaintiff's said grantor declared, stated to, and informed said corporation defendant that he did not claim or intend to claim or use said channel of Packwood creek, or the waters turned or conveyed therein by said corporation defendant, and that defendant could appropriate and use said channel for the purpose of conveying water as aforesaid; that acting upon said statements the defendant in good faith entered upon that portion of the channel of said alleged Packwood creek which had been and was filled up with earth and débris as aforesaid, and with the knowledge and acquiescence of plaintiff's said grantor, and by means of labor performed at great cost and expense of time and money, removed all earth, débris, and obstructions therefrom, and appropriated to its own use said channel for the purpose of conveying water from said Kaweah river, and turned and conveyed therein water from said Kaweah river, and at great cost and expense constructed a dam in the channel of said Packwood creek, being the same dam complained of in said complaint, and at great cost and expense dug a ditch in said channel immediately above said dam to the vicinity of Tulare City, in said county, where said waters diverted from said Kaweah river through said channel were and are, by means of said dam and ditch, conveyed and used for the purposes of irrigation; "that during the time said labor of removing said obstructions, earth, and débris, and of building said dam and ditch, was being performed, and said sum of money expended for the same, plaintiff's said grantor knew of said labor being performed, and said money being expended, and did not object to the acts of said corporation defendant in that behalf, and did not claim, or pretend to claim, that any of said acts were interfering with, or would interfere with, or injure any of his rights to the channel of said creek, or the waters conveyed therein; and that, if said obstructions, earth, and débris had not been removed from the channel of said alleged creek in the manner and to the extent they were removed as aforesaid, no water whatever could or would flow from said Kaweah river, or from any other source, into said creek, at ordinary stages of water, above the place where said corporation had placed its said dam and constructed its said ditch." It is further averred that the defendant corporation has been in the notorious, exclusive, peaceable, and continuous possession of said dam and ditch, and of said channel above said dam, adversely to the plaintiff and his grantors, more than five years immediately preceding the filing of said complaint, under a claim of right adverse to the plaintiff and his grantors, and has, during all of said time, maintained said dam adverse to the plaintiff and his grantors, and during all of said time diverted said water by means of said ditch, adverse to the plaintiff and his grantors.

The court, after finding the corporate capacity of the defendant, the ownership of the property as alleged in the complaint, finds, in substance, that from time immemorial, down to the year 1868, a well-defined, natural water-course, known as "Packwood Creek," ran through the lands of the plaintiff, and irrigated his lands, and furnished water for his live-stock, and that of his grantors; that in the spring of 1868, by an unusual flood, the head of the creek became, by the action of the waters, so filled up with débris and sand that but little water ran into the creek, not sufficient to reach the lands of the plaintiff and his grantors, and the same ceased to be and was no longer a natural water-course through said lands of plaintiff; that from the year 1868, down to the spring of 1875, Packwood creek was a water channel into which and down which water ran in times of high water, but no water in its natural flow which entered into said creek reached the land of plaintiff aforesaid; that in the year 1875 plaintiff's grantors turned a large amount of water from a stream known as the "St. Johns River," down into the Kaweah river, so as to bring it down to said creek, and thence through the creek to the lands of the plaintiff, and acquired from the owners of the land through which they turned the water the right so to do, and also acquired from the owners of the land through which said creek ran the right to use the channel thereof for the purpose of conducting the water to said lands, where they used it for irrigation, and for their live-stock to drink; that plaintiff's grantors thereupon constructed a cut leading from the St. Johns river into the Kaweah river, which flowed down to and furnished water to Packwood creek, and constructed a cut leading from Visalia creek to Packwood creek, and cleaned out said creek so it would carry all the waters which they had turned into said creek, and the waters which came in their natural flow onto plaintiff's land; and said waters flowed down and through plaintiff's said lands in the channel of Packwood creek, and were used by the plaintiff and his grantors; that after the plaintiff and his grantors had so acquired the right to use the channel of said creek, and had so used it, the defendant, in the winter of 1875 and 1876, constructed from time to time dams in the north channel of said creek, and thereby turned away from said channel by means of the dam into the defendant's ditch the waters which the plaintiff and his grantors had turned therein, which dams were in each of said years torn down by the plaintiff's grantors, and rebuilt by the defendant, and that the defendant did not at any time turn any water into the channel of said creek. After further finding the use made of the water by the plaintiff, and that the diversion thereof would cause him great, immediate, and irreparable injury, the court finds that the defendants notified the grantors of the plaintiff of their intention to clear out the channel of Packwood creek, and to construct the dam as aforesaid, but finds expressly that the plaintiff's grantors gave the defendants the privilege of turning out whatever water it turned into said channel, and no more; and that the defendants never at any time turned any water into said creek after the year 1876, and that "neither the plaintiff nor his grantors ever induced said defendant to expend any money, or do any work, on the channel of said creek, nor ever informed the defendants that he or they did not claim, or intend to claim, and use the channel of said creek; and the only right which the defendant ever had to construct or maintain any dam in either of the channels of said creek was to turn out such water as it turned in, and the defendant, as aforesaid, never turned any water into said creek, but the plaintiff's grantors, in the years 1877, 1878, and 1879, tore up the dams and obstructions placed in the north channel of said creek by the defendant, so as to let the water flow down to plaintiff's land." The court further finds that the corporation did expend $20,000 in cleaning out the head of the channel and constructing its dams, and that the plaintiff's grantors knew of the expenditure of the money, but that the same was done under the aforesaid agreement as to the amount of water to be taken from the channel. The court found against the claim of the defendants that they had been in adverse possession of the channel and ditch for the term of five years. The court further finds that at the time the action was brought the defendant corporation was engaged in reconstructing its dam, the same having been removed by the plaintiff, the effect of which dam was to turn away from said creek into defendants' ditch the waters which plaintiff and his grantors had turned therein, as well as the waters which came therein in their natural flow. As conclusions of law the court finds "that the construction or maintenance of any dam in the channel of Packwood creek by defendant is without right, and will inevitably work great and continuous injury to plaintiff, not susceptible of compensation in any action at law, and create endless litigation;" and judgment was rendered for the plaintiff accordingly. A motion for a new trial was made by the defendants, and denied, and the defendants appeal.

The first contention of the appellants is that after the year 1868 the creek in question ceased to be a natural water-course, and that from that time the natural flow of the water therein did not reach the plaintiff's lands, and that, therefore, no right of his was interfered with by their action. The evidence tends to show, and the court finds, that, prior to the year 1868, this creek was a natural water-course, and that the waters flowed therein onto the plaintiff's lands, but that in said year, by an extraordinary freshet, the head of the stream was obstructed by débris; and that from that time on only a small quantity of water flowed naturally in the stream, not in sufficient quantity to reach the plaintiff's lands, but that water did reach his lands through the channel of the stream in extreme high water. In the case of riparian owners the rule has been held to be that "when a stream flowing through a person's land is diverted into a new channel, either artificially or by a sudden flow, affecting the rights of other riparian proprietors favorably, and the owner acquiesces in the new state of the stream for so long a time that new rights accrue, or may be presumed to have accrued, such acquiescence is binding, like a public dedication, and the stream cannot be lawfully turned to its former channel." Gould, Waters, § 159; Woodbury v. Short, 17 Vt. 387. So, where the owner of the land has changed the course of the stream so as to affect other riparian proprietors favorably, and acquiesces therein for a sufficient length of time, he cannot claim the right to change the flow of the water to the detriment of such other riparian owners. Ford v. Whitlock, 27 Vt. 265.

But it seems to us that this rule, which applies to riparian owners, has no application to a case like this, where the defendants have entered upon the stream, and claim to appropriate and divert the waters therefrom under the circumstances shown by the pleadings and the evidence. The fact that the plaintiff's grantors had purchased the right of way through the channel of the creek to flow their waters brought to the same by artificial means did not, as claimed by the appellant, show that the stream was not a natural water-course. The evidence tends to show that the channel of the stream was well defined, and that the waters had formerly flowed therein naturally down to the plaintiff's land, and that it was only prevented from so flowing by the obstruction above stated. The right to such water as was brought into the stream by the plaintiff's grantors might be, and we think was, held by an entirely different claim than that which entitled them to the natural flow of the water, (Hoffman v. Stone, 7 Cal. 46; Canal Co. v. Vaughn, 11 Cal. 143; Canal Co. v. Hoyt, 57 Cal. 46; Creighton v. Irrigation Co., 67 Cal. 221, 7 Pac. Rep. 658;) but this would not affect the character of the stream, or the right to the water naturally flowing therein. Besides, respondent does not rely in his complaint solely on the ground that this is a natural water-course, but on the further ground, which is found in his favor, that the flow of the water was increased by artificial means, the right to which was purchased and used by his grantors, and thereby, in connection with the natural flow of the stream, the water was carried onto his lands.

This being a stream in which water flowed naturally, the fact that the defendants had turned other waters into it would not entitle them to take out more than they turned in. Wilcox v. Hausch, 64 Cal. 461, 3 Pac. Rep. 108. The right of the riparian owner to the natural flow of the water, under the circumstances, remained the same as before. This case was here before, when it was held that the findings were too indefinite and uncertain to sustain the judgment, and the case was reversed on that ground. Paige v. Irrigation Co., 4 Pac. Rep. 1152. This same point, and the further one that the findings are contradictory, are urged now; but we think the findings are sufficiently definite, and that they are not so contradictory as to warrant a reversal on that ground.

It is further contended that the evidence is insufficient to sustain some of the findings. Counsel for appellants review the evidence in their brief, and argue this point at length and with great earnestness, but the evidence on the several points discussed is clearly in conflict to such an extent as must preclude us from entering upon the question. In pressing their views upon us as to some of these findings, the appellants contend that the respondent, like the appellant, was a mere appropriator of the waters flowing in the stream, and not a riparian owner; but the evidence sufficiently shows to the contrary as to a part of the waters of the stream, and as the evidence shows and the court finds that, although the natural flow of the water did not reach the respondent's lands, it does appear that the waters did reach his lands in high water, and that the natural flow of the water to his place was only prevented by the obstruction at the head of the stream. There is evidence upon which the court was warranted in finding that the appellant expended its money in removing this obstruction, opening up the channel, and constructing its dam, not for the purpose of using the natural flow of the water, but as a channel through which it might conduct the waters turned into it by the appellant. This being the case, the fact that the natural flow of the water was increased by the removal of the obstruction, whereby the same would or might flow onto the respondent's lands, must be held to have accrued to his benefit, and not to that of the appellant, because it had no right to the natural flow of the water under such circumstances. The very fact that the removal of the obstruction would increase the natural flow of the water may have been an inducement for the owners of the land to consent to the use of the channel by the appellant for the purpose of flowing other waters therein. The same evidence and finding that the expenditures were made by the appellant for the privilege of flowing water turned by them into the channel of the stream, and not for the right to use the waters naturally flowing therein, or brought into the same by the respondent, show conclusively that the claim and holding of the appellant was not adverse as to any right asserted in this action. For the same reasons, the claim that the respondent was barred by the statute of limitations cannot be maintained. Certain rulings of the court upon the evidence are questioned by the appellant, but no material error was committed in any of these rulings. Judgment and order affirmed.

WEST v. CRAWFORD et al. (No. 12,894.)

CONTRACTS—CORPORATIONS.

1. Held, affirming judgment of the court below, that an agreement to form a corporation and to pay 20 per cent. of the par value of the shares subscribed, in five days after the articles of incorporation were filed, to a person designated as agent, is valid, and the amount due thereunder is exigible.

2. That the mere signing of the agreement did not make the defendant a member of the corporation, but that the exigibility of the 20 per cent. sued for depends on defendant's express promise to pay.

3. That it is immaterial that the agreement sued upon does not state where the principal place of the corporation should be.

Action by F. M. West against B. C. Crawford and D. S. Rosenbaum, for 20 per cent. of the amount subscribed by them in an agreement signed by them for the formation of a certain corporation. Judgment was entered for plaintiff. From an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal.

W. L. Dudley, E. S. Pillsbury, (Gordon Blanding, of counsel,) for appellants. J. C. Campbell, S. D. Woods, Joseph H. Budd, E. W. McKinstry, (Edward I. Jones, of counsel,) for respondent.

WORKS, J. Action on the following contract: "We, the undersigned, hereby agree with each other, and the one with the other, that a corporation shall be formed by us, under the name of 'San Joaquin Land & Water Company,' for the purpose of procuring water-rights on one or more of the rivers or streams running through the counties of Calaveras, Tuolumne, Stanislaus, and San Joaquin, in this state; purchase, erect, and construct dams, reservoirs, canals, aqueducts, and other water-ways in and by which the water so procured from said rivers, or any of the same, can be utilized for general purposes; to secure and impound springs, streams, and other water in any of said counties, and lead the water so secured to any of such canals or water-ways; to supply farmers, miners, cities, towns, and villages with any of the said waters for mining, farming, drinking, irrigation, and other purposes; to negotiate for, buy, sell, let, improve, and cultivate lands and town lots in said state; lay out town lots and colony tracts, and sell and let such town lots and colony tracts; that the capital stock of said corporation shall be $1,000,000, divided into 10,000 shares of $100 per share; and we hereby agree with each other, and one with the other, that we will take the number of shares of the capital stock of said corporation which appears opposite our respective names hereunto subscribed, and will pay 20 per cent. of the par value of the said shares so subscribed by us respectively, in five (5) days after the articles of said incorporation shall have been filed in the office of the county clerk of said county of San Joaquin, and will pay the same to F. M. West at the Stockton Savings & Loan Society Bank, at Stockton, Cal.; we hereby constitute said F. M. West as the agent to collect the amount which becomes due as aforesaid. We further nominate, constitute, and appoint L. U. Shippee, J. L. Beecher, and George Gray as our agents, and the agents of the corporation so to be formed, to negotiate for the purchase of any one or more water-rights, canals, reservoirs, aqueducts, or water-ways for said corporation, and draw from said West any or all moneys that may have been paid to him by us respectively, by virtue hereof, and use said money for paying the same; and any and all contracts which our said agents may make in said matter shall be binding upon said corporation, and also upon us. Our said agents are further authorized to employ engineers and other assistants, and have them survey routes for such canals and examine proper locations for dams, and do such other service as may be, in their opinion, for our best interest, and the interest of said corporation, to accomplish the object or purpose for which the same is to be formed. Dated November 19, 1887."

The complaint alleges the execution of the contract by various persons, including the appellants, and the facts showing that the company named in the agreement was incorporated and organized in all things as agreed upon therein; that at a meeting of the board of directors of the corporation it was ordered by the board that 20 per cent. of the subscribed stock be called in, in accordance with the agreement signed by the stockholders, and "that F. M. West be notified to notify the parties and collect the same;" that the plaintiff demanded of the defendants 20 per cent. of the amount subscribed by them, amounting to $2,000, which they refused and neglected to pay. There was a general demurrer to the complaint, which was overruled, and the defendants answered, admitting that they signed the instrument sued on, but denying that they "thereby, or at all, entered into an agreement with any of the persons whose names are attached to said agreement, or with any persons whomsoever, and allege that the signing and agreement by them was wholly without any consideration or benefit to these defendants from the plaintiff, or any other persons whomsoever," and denying all of the other material allegations of the complaint. They also answered, specially, that they did not participate in the organization of the company, and that they and others who signed the agreement repudiated the same, and notified the corporation that they would not pay the same, and that certain parties named, including the plaintiff, had procured the signing and filing of articles of incorporation of the company, for the purpose of defrauding the defendants, and without their knowledge or consent, and that certain persons, who were named as agents of the company, to negotiate for the purchase of water-rights, and draw on the plaintiff for the money to pay for the same, had since repudiated the contract and refused to act as such agents, and that they had so refused to act because of certain false representations by one Shippee, made before the agreement was signed, that certain water-rights could be purchased, and their value, upon which representation the parties relied, and were thereby induced to subscribe to said agreement; and that said water-rights were of little or no value, and said false representations were made for the fraudulent purpose of procuring said subscriptions; that said Shippee was interested in the sale of said water-rights, which was unknown to said subscribers at the time; and that upon hearing said facts they had repudiated the contract, and so notified the corporation.

The court found that the defendants "made and entered into a certain mutual agreement in writing with other persons, whose names are subscribed to the agreement in the finding set forth," being the one set out above; the incorporation of the company in conformity with the agreement; election of directors by the stockholders, and their organization by the election of officers; the making of the order calling in 20 per cent. of the stock; the payment of the same by a large number of the subscribers; the demand upon and refusal to pay by the defendants, and the delivery by defendants and a number of the other subscribers to the secretary of the corporation of the following notice: "Please take notice that we, and each of us, hereby withdraw, revoke, retract, rescind, and repudiate a certain paper or instrument in writing, dated November 19, 1887, signed by us and purporting to be an agreement for the formation of a corporation under the name of 'San Joaquin Land & Water Company,' and for the payment of certain money to F. M. West; the appointment of L. U. Shippee, J. L. Beecher, and George Gray as agents of said corporation and other purposes; and each and every part of said instrument. Stockton, Cal., February 24, 1888." That the subscribers had no notice of said revocation until after a large amount of their subscriptions had been paid, and that they did not accept said notice or agree to the terms of the same in any manner; and found against the defendants as to their allegations of fraud and their repudiation of the contract on that ground; and found in terms that "neither said defendants nor their associates, nor any of them, were induced to sign the said agreement by any false or fraudulent representations made by said Shippee, as set forth in the answer, or otherwise," but that they signed the agreement "for the purposes mentioned therein, and with the intent of carrying out the objects of said agreement, as mentioned, and for no other purpose."

Judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff for $2,000 and interest, a motion for a new trial was denied, and the defendants appeal.

Counsel for appellants have favored us with a long and able brief on the question of corporate powers and duties, involving grave questions of constitutional and statutory construction. But as this action does not in any way present any such questions, this discussion has tended to confuse the real question at issue and hinder rather than aid us in arriving at a conclusion. The action is not brought by a corporation, nor is this an attempt to enforce an assessment made by a corporation. The contract sued on is twofold; it amounts to a subscription to the stock of a corporation to be thereafter organized, and in addition it is an express promise to pay to the plaintiff in this action 20 per cent. of the amount of such subscription. The simple question, then, is whether or not this promise to pay the plaintiff can be enforced. The subsequent incorporation of the company named in the contract was a matter of no consequence, except that it fixed the time when the money should become due and payable, the agreement being to pay five days after the articles of incorporation should be filed. The subsequent action of the board of directors, ordering the collection of 20 per cent. of the money subscribed, was wholly unimportant. If this action is maintainable at all, it is not by reason of any such action on the part of the corporation, but by virtue of the mutual promise of these parties to pay to the plaintiff the amount of money named. Counsel insist that the corporation, when organized, had no power to levy an assessment exceeding 10 per cent. at any one time, and that to require the payment of a greater sum of the original subscribers to the stock would have been a discrimination against such stockholders, and therefore invalid, as against public policy. This may be conceded, but it does not meet the case. Here is a positive agreement on the part of the parties who subscribed to this stock to pay a fixed and certain sum of money, at a certain time, to a certain party. It is clear from the contract itself that it was not the intention that the liability to pay the sum of money named should in any way depend upon an assessment being made by the corporation after its organization. This is quite clear from the fact that the payment is fixed so soon after the organization of the company that such an assessment and its enforcement would have been impossible. Therefore the parties must be understood to have bound themselves to pay the sum of money agreed upon, without any reference whatever to an assessment being made by the company.

Again, it is urged that Mr. West after the collection of the money might appropriate the same to his own use, and the defendants not get the benefit of the payment made by them as a payment upon the stock subscribed for. But this, again, it seems to us, is beside the question. If they saw proper to contract to pay the money to West it was at their own risk. If the money should not be applied as they evidently expected, it would not, in our judgment, in any way affect their liability to pay according to their contract. So the question as to whether these parties, or any of them, subsequently acted with the corporation is a matter entirely immaterial in this case, and the same may be said with reference to the question whether the parties named as trustees to receive from West the money paid in, and use the same for certain purposes, acted or refused to act in that capacity. They were not the trustees to collect the money from the contractors, but to receive it from West after it was paid in, and apply it as agreed upon. Therefore, whether they subsequently received, or were willing to receive, the money and act as trustees, was wholly immaterial. It is true, as contended by counsel for the appellants, that the mere signing of this agreement to subscribe to the stock of the corporation did not make the defendants members of such corporation. To do so, the statute must have been complied with by the signing of the articles of incorporation, or otherwise complying with its provisions. Railroad Co. v. Tibbits, 18 Barb. 297; Railroad Co. v. Owen, 32 Barb. 616; Dorris v. Sweeney, 64 Barb. 639. But it seems to us that the question whether they thereby became members of the corporation or not is immaterial to this controversy. The right to recover here, as we have said, depends wholly upon their express promise to pay the money to the plaintiff in this action, and if the suit cannot be maintained on that ground it is quite clear to us that the judgment of the court below is erroneous.

It is further contended by the appellants that this action cannot be maintained for the reason that the contract itself is illegal and against public policy; and authorities are cited to show that a contract made in violation of the statute, or otherwise against public policy, cannot be enforced. But we are unable to see anything in this contract that contravenes any statute, or that can be said to be in any way against public policy. The further point is made that the contract itself does not provide or set out all of the acts necessary to be done in order to incorporate the proposed company, and particularly that it does not appear from the contract sued upon where the principal place of business of the corporation should be; but this, again, it seems to us, is immaterial. The contract simply makes it necessary, in general terms, that the company shall be incorporated, because the money does not become due until such incoporation takes place; but the findings show that the articles of incorporation contain all that the statute requires, and that the company was, in fact, legally incorporated. This, it seems to us, is all that it was necessary to show on this branch of the case; and it was not necessary that these facts should be set out in the contract agreeing to pay the money to the plaintiff. The point made by the appellants that the complaint is insufficient, and the cause of action not made out by the evidence, because of the fact that the parties named as agents to purchase water-rights and expend the money agreed to be paid therefor are not made parties plaintiff, cannot be maintained, for the simple reason that these agents had nothing to do with the collection of the money from the subscribers to the agreement, nor was there any obligation to pay to them. They were made agents for the purpose of purchasing water-rights and expending the money after the same had been paid to or collected by West. Therefore they were not interested in the action now being prosecuted, and would not have been proper parties. The same may be said with reference to other objections made by the appellants based upon the fact that these trustees failed to act as such. We regard all of these matters as being entirely immaterial to the question before us. So the objection made that the court erred in refusing to permit the defendants to prove the failure of these trustees to act is also unfounded. It is contended that the company was not incorporated as provided by the statutes of 1872, relating to the incorporation of water companies, (St. 1871-72, p. 733,) but it was organized as provided by the Civil Code, which applies to all corporations, and this was sufficient. The contention that the incorporation was illegal because the purposes of its incorporation, as named in the articles, were too numerous and "not susceptible of union," is equally groundless.

It is insisted that the agreement sued upon was not binding until all of the capital stock had been subscribed for, but we see nothing in the agreement indicating such an intention on the part of the signers, nor does any reason occur to us for so holding. There are authorities to the effect that a party agreeing to subscribe to a certain number of shares of a corporation to be organized cannot be held liable to pay assessments on his subscription until the whole of the stock is taken. Steam-Boat Co. v. Sewall, 78 Me. 167, 3 Atl. Rep. 181; Railroad Co. v. Veazie, 39 Me. 571; Cotton Mills v. Abbott, 9 Cush. 423; Railroad Co. v. Gould, 2 Gray, 277; Hughes v. Manufacturing Co., 34 Md. 316. But the contract under consideration bears evidence of a different intention on the part of its signers. They contract to pay a sum of money to a third party, and not to the corporation. We must presume that they contracted with knowledge of the fact that a valid incorporation of the company mentioned might take place under our Code without the whole of the stock being subscribed. Therefore, it cannot be presumed that their promise to pay was on condition that the whole of the stock should be taken. If this was their intention, it should have been expressed in the agreement. The parties mutually agreed with each other—that is, with those who signed the contract—to pay a certain sum of money to the plaintiff. He was thereby made a trustee of an express trust, and authorized to collect the money agreed to be paid. Code Civil Proc. § 369; Winters v. Rush, 34 Cal. 136; Considerant v. Brisbane, 22 N. Y. 389. The parties by their mutual agreement made the plaintiff their trustee, to collect and receive the money to be paid. He was not in any sense the trustee of the corporation. There is nothing to indicate that the money was ever to go to the corporation. On the contrary, the contract shows on its face that it was not. When collected by the plaintiff it was to go into the hands of the other trustees, to be used by them in the purchase of water-rights. How these water-rights were to be transferred to the corporation, if at all, is not stated, but this omission cannot affect the liability of the parties to pay their debt. Their mutual promise, one to the other, was a sufficient consideration for the promise of each, and the contract was valid and binding. Turnpike Road Co. v. Lancaster, 79 Ky. 552; College v. Hendley, 49 Cal. 347; George v. Harris, 4 N. H. 533; Academy v. Cowls, 6 Pick. 427; Funk v. Hough, 29 Ill. 145. The appellants offered to prove by the witness Shippee that he was the owner of certain water-rights mentioned in the agreement sued on, and interested therein, but the evidence was excluded. This is complained of as having been "peculiarly erroneous." We see no error in this ruling. There was no mention in the agreement of any particular water-right that should be purchased. This was left entirely to the trustees to determine. There was nothing in the agreement binding its signers to buy any water-right belonging to Mr. Shippee, or any one else. Therefore, the evidence was not only immaterial, but the question objected to should not have been allowed, for the reason that it assumed a fact that did not exist, viz., that certain water-rights were "mentioned in the exhibit and specified as rights to be purchased." Certain minutes purporting to be the minutes of the stockholders of the company were admitted in evidence on behalf of the plaintiff, and this is alleged as error. Counsel have pointed out many reasons why the court erred in admitting these minutes, the principal of which are that the proper notices of the meetings were not given, and the meetings were not held at the office of the company. We think these minutes were improperly admitted, not on the ground stated, but for the reason that they were wholly immaterial. Their admission, however, is no ground for reversing the case, for the reason that no injury could have resulted to the appellants on account of this evidence. As we have said before, the action of the corporation with regard to these matters was entirely immaterial. The incorporation of the company was proved by other evidence, showing a compliance with the provisions of the Code, and this was all that was necessary.

Finally the appellants make the point that the agreement sued upon was against public policy and void, for the reason that it attempted and purported to create an express trust in relation to real property. But this contention has no foundation, for the simple reason that there was nothing in the contract creating any such trust, or in any way relating to real estate, so far as the question here presented is concerned. When the time comes for the investment of the money some such question may arise, but it is not presented here. After favoring us with 116 pages of brief, counsel close the same by saying: "Many grave errors in regard to rulings on evidence, to the form and substance of the findings, and to the overruling of appellants' motion for a nonsuit, appear in the transcript. The points of error are so numerous that it would unduly extend this brief to repeat them in detail. They are believed to be sound, and are confidently relied upon by appellants, and this honorable court is respectfully referred to the grounds of appellants' motion for nonsuit, elaborately stated at pages 95 to 100 of the transcript, and to the specification of errors at pages 109 to 162 thereof." We do not feel it our duty, after the full investigation we have given to the points raised and discussed in the case, to search the record for errors, however grave they may appear to counsel, where not specifically pointed out to us. Judgment and order affirmed.

JENNINGS v. LE BRETON et al. (No. 11,918.)

HIGHWAYS—ASSESSMENTS—EXECUTORS.

1. Act Cal. April 1, 1872, § 12, authorizing any person aggrieved by the act of the superintendent of highways in accepting street improvements, or in relation to any assessment therefor, to appeal to the board of supervisors, gives the only remedy to any person so aggrieved, and, after the acceptance of any such work, a land-owner cannot defend an action for an assessment on the ground that the work was not completed.

2. Section 9 of said act provides that the assessment shall not be made out until the work is completed to the satisfaction of the superintendent. Sections 21 and 24 provide that the deputy superintendent may perform the duties of the superintendent, except as to the acceptance of work done, and make it the duty of the city surveyor to survey and measure all work, and provide that his official certificates shall be prima facie evidence of their truth. Plaintiff introduced the certificate of the surveyor that he had examined the work, and found it to be in compliance with the contract, and an entry in a book in the superintendent's office, signed by the deputy, which stated that the work had been completed and accepted. There was no other documentary evidence to show whether the superintendent had accepted the work. The superintendent of the work testified that he did not remember personally examining the work, but he did not state whether he had approved it, or, if so, upon what evidence. Held that, as the superintendent was not required to personally examine the work before accepting it, but might approve it on the reports of subordinates, the evidence warranted the finding that the superintendent had accepted the work.

3. An assessment of the expense of an improvement, apportioned according to the frontage of property on the street improved, is constitutional; that question being stare decisis.

4. Where an executor files his resignation and final account, and the court appoints an administratrix de bonis non, in the absence from the record of the court minutes, an acceptance of the resignation and a revocation of the letters testamentary will be inferred, and it will be presumed that the executor complied with Code Civil Proc. § 1427, requiring an executor to deliver up all the assets in his hands as a condition precedent to his right to resign.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; WALTER H. LEVY, Judge.

W. C. Belcher, for appellants. J. C. Bates and J. M. Wood, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. The action is to recover an assessment amounting to $1,898, for grading Bay street, between Larkin street and Van Ness avenue, in the city of San Francisco, levied upon lot numbered 5 on the diagram of the assessment, having a frontage of 137½ feet on that part of Bay street alleged to have been graded. Judgment was given for plaintiff, and the defendants appeal from the judgment, and from an order denying their motion for a new trial. The grading was ordered in pursuance of an act of the legislature to authorize the board of supervisors of San Francisco "to order Bay street graded, and to change its grade," passed April 1, 1878, and was done between July 18, 1878, and July 23, 1879. This act authorized the board to order the grading of the whole or any part of Bay street from the east line of Larkin street to the east line of the Presidio reservation, "without receiving any petition from any person therefor." It also changed the originally authorized grade of said street in several places. The assessment and all proceedings leading to it were had under the general street improvement law, as modified by the act of April 1, 1878, supra. This is the second appeal of this case. The former appeal was under the title of Jennings v. Le Roy, (63 Cal. 397.)

1. The appellants contend, in the first place, that the assessment is invalid because the work required by the contract was never completed. The contract for grading had in it this clause: "The road-way, when completed, to have a proper crown to the center from the bottom of the gutter-ways." The grading was wholly in sand dunes, where the sand was much drifted and moved about by the force of the wind. It was proved that when the contractor quit the work of grading, the road-way had a plain surface, without crown or gutter-ways, and that immediately afterwards the drifting sand began to be deposited on the road-way; and the evidence tended to prove that on account of the natural softness of the sand the road-way was never passable for heavily loaded wagons; and also that the excavation made by the grading had become nearly filled by the drifting sands, at the time of the trial of this case in November, 1885. For these reasons it is contended that the work was not completed. Section 7 of the act of April 1, 1872, (St. 1871-72, p. 809,) in force at the time this work was done, provides that the work "must in all cases be done under the direction and to the satisfaction of the superintendent of public streets, highways, and squares;" and the contract under which the work was done in this case was drawn and executed accordingly; and the trial court found as facts that the work was done according to the contract, "under the direction and to the satisfaction of said superintendent, and that said work was duly approved and accepted by said superintendent." No fraud in the assessment or in any of the proceedings prior thereto is charged in the answer; and it is not disputed that the plaintiff made a prima facie case in the usual way, by introducing in evidence the assessment, diagram, warrant, etc., with the proper indorsements. Section 12 of the act of 1872 provides that "all persons, whether named in the assessment or not, feeling aggrieved by any of the acts or determinations of the said superintendent of public streets, highways, and squares, in relation to the acceptance of work or to the assessment, or to any act, proceeding, matter, or thing done, suffered, or committed by him, shall within fifteen days after the issuance of said assessment, as provided, appeal to said board of supervisors, as provided in this section." On such appeal the board is authorized to correct, alter, or modify the assessment, and may annul the same; "and may make any order or decision in relation to any contract or the performance thereof, or in relation to any of the acts of the contractor, or the said superintendent, etc., prior to the date of the hearing of said appeal." It seems to be well settled that the defendants had no other remedy for the alleged failure of the contractor to complete the work, or for misconduct of the superintendent of streets in approving or accepting the work before it was completed, than by appeal to the board of supervisors, as provided in section 12 of the act of 1872, from which the above extracts are taken; and that by failing so to appeal they waived the objections here made. Emery v. Bradford, 29 Cal. 75; Nolan v. Reese, 32 Cal. 485; Chambers v. Satterlee, 40 Cal. 498; Himmelmann v. Hoadley, 44 Cal. 278; Dorland v. McGlynn, 47 Cal. 47; Dyer v. Parrott, 60 Cal. 551; Boyle v. Hitchcock, 66 Cal. 129, 4 Pac. Rep. 1143.

2. The second objection to the validity of the assessment is that as a matter of fact the superintendent of streets did not accept or approve the work, and that the finding that he did so is not warranted by the evidence. The law does not prescribe any particular mode or form in which the superintendent shall manifest his approval or acceptance of work done under a street contract, nor does it require the approval to be expressed in writing. As the assessment and the warrant thereto attached are not to be made or given until "after the contractor of any street work has fulfilled his contract to the satisfaction of the superintendent, or board of supervisors, on appeal," (section 9,) the assessment and warrant, in due form, are certainly prima facie evidence that the work was completed to the satisfaction of the superintendent, and that he approved and accepted the same, if they do not imply as much. Moreover, the statute so provides, and appellants' counsel so admits. In addition to this the plaintiff introduced, from the office of the superintendent, the official certificate of the city and county surveyor, dated on the day the work is alleged to have been accepted, to the effect that he had examined the work of grading in question, and found it to be of official grade and width; and also introduced an entry in a volume of superintendent of streets' reports kept in the superintendent's office, a certificate of S. N. Roberts, deputy superintendent of streets, to the effect that the work had been performed and completed in accordance with the terms of the contract. But there was no other evidence on the part of plaintiff tending to prove that the work had been done to the satisfaction of the superintendent, or that he personally approved and accepted the same, than that he personally made and signed the assessment, diagram, and warrant, in due form, and that the warrant was countersigned by the auditor of the city and county. And it was admitted that the records of the street department contain no other evidence relevant to the matter of approval or acceptance of the work. Upon this issue the defendants called L. M. Manzer, who was superintendent of streets during the time the work was being done, and made the assessment in question, and who testified in answer to questions by defendants' counsel as follows: "Question. Did you in 1879 yourself personally inspect the work done under the Jennings-Dyer contract for the grading of Bay street, between Larkin and Van Ness, whether by Jennings or Buckman? Answer. I did not; that is, I do not remember that I did. It is not usual for me to do so. Q. If you had, you would have remembered it? A. I think so." No other question was asked him. He was not asked, and did not state, upon what evidence he became satisfied that the work had been completed according to the contract; nor whether he had personally approved and accepted the work; nor in what way he had expressed or manifested his satisfaction, approval, or acceptance; yet it appears that personally he did not examine or see the work, and therefore must have acted upon the representation of others; probably, solely upon the certificates and reports of the city surveyor and the deputy superintendent. The statute (section 24,) makes the official certificate of the city surveyor "prima facie evidence in all courts in this state of the truth of its contents." And section 21 provides that deputy superintendents may perform all or any of the duties of the superintendent, "except the acceptance or approval of work done." Under this authority it would seem that the deputy may superintend the work, measure it, and report all material facts relating to it to the superintendent, though he may not accept or approve the work as completed. There is no express requirement that the superintendent shall personally examine, measure, or estimate the work before approving or accepting it; nor do we think such requirement is necessarily implied in the express provision that the work "must, in all cases, be done under the direction and to the satisfaction of the superintendent." The statute (section 24) provides that "the city and county surveyor shall be the proper officer * * * to survey, measure, and estimate the work done under contracts for grading streets." For what purpose is he required to survey, measure, and estimate the work done under grading contracts, and officially to certify to the result, if not to furnish to the superintendent evidence to be considered in judging whether or not the work has been done to his satisfaction? Must the superintendent, in the absence of any express requirement, personally repeat the surveys and measurements made and reported to him by his deputies, and by the city surveyor, before he can approve or accept the work? We think not, even though it may be, and doubtless is, his duty, as far as practicable, to give his personal attention to all work being done under contract, and to such extent, if possible, as to prevent fraudulent collusion between contractors and his subordinate officers and assistants. And since the law does not require the superintendent to file, or record, or even to express, in writing, his satisfaction with, or his approval of, the work, we think the admittedly prima facie proof that the work was completed to his satisfaction, and that he personally approved and accepted it, was not overcome by the evidence on the part of the defendants; and, therefore, that the finding of the trial court to that effect was justified by the evidence. This conclusion renders it unnecessary to decide whether or not a failure of the superintendent to accept and approve the work personally may be remedied by appeal to the board of supervisors.

3. The third objection to the assessment is that it was not levied in proportion to benefits, and was therefore beyond the constitutional power of the state and municipal governments. Upon this point the learned counsel for the appellants has submitted an able argument, evincing thorough research and critical examination of all the leading cases and text-writers upon this much-debated question, but it comes to this court too late. On the former appeal of this case the act of April 1, 1878, (St. 1877-78, p. 931,) alone was objected to on constitutional grounds, and all such objections were overruled. 63 Cal. 397. But, as that act made no apportionment of the assessment at all, the question here made did not arise on that appeal. The objection here made is that the mode of apportionment, viz., in proportion to frontage on the improvement, as authorized by the general street improvement law of 1871-72, (page 804,) and for many years before, is unequal, and not in proportion to benefits, and therefore unconstitutional. Twenty-four years ago these questions were deliberately considered by this court, and decided against the views of the learned counsel for appellants in Emery v. Gas Co., 28 Cal. 346, in which it was decided that the legislature may delegate to municipal corporations authority to assess real property to pay the expenses of local improvements, and to apportion the assessment in proportion to the frontage of the land assessed on the improvements; and that this is a constitutional mode of the exercise, by the legislature, of the sovereign right of taxation, which does not in any degree depend upon the right of eminent domain, nor involve the taking of private property for public use, in the sense of the constitutional prohibition. We are not aware that any of these propositions has been overruled or qualified, but understand that they have been repeatedly affirmed. Emery v. Bradford, 29 Cal. 75; Taylor v. Palmer, 31 Cal. 250; Chambers v. Satterlee, 40 Cal. 497; People v. Lynch, 51 Cal. 19; Whiting v. Townsend, 57 Cal. 515; Whiting v. Quackenbush, 54 Cal. 306; Lent v. Tillson, 72 Cal. 426, 14 Pac. Rep. 71. We are therefore not at liberty to accede to the earnest and respectful request of the learned counsel for appellants to open and reconsider these questions.

4. The last point made by counsel for appellants is that the finding that plaintiff was administratrix of the estate of Jennings is not justified by the evidence. Jennings died testate, and letters testamentary were duly issued to A. E. Buckman in February, 1879. On June 14, 1880, Buckman filed in the probate court his resignation, and on the same day filed in said court his final account. On June 18, 1880, plaintiff filed a petition for her appointment as administratrix. On the 29th of June, 1880, the court ordered her appointment, and letters of administration, with the will annexed, were issued to her on August 6, 1880. It appears that in connection with Buckman's final account plaintiff introduced as evidence the minutes of the court of June 25, 1880, in the matter of the Jennings estate, relating to and settling that final account. This order is not set out in the transcript, but appellants' counsel does not contend that it was not regular; and in support of the action of the court in appointing the plaintiff four days thereafter it must be presumed to have been a regular order settling the final accounts of Buckman, which implies that Buckman did all things necessary to be done on his part to complete the settlement; and, among them, that he delivered up all the estate in his hands to the custody of the court, or to a person appointed by the court to receive it, as required by section 1427 of the Code of Civil Procedure, if such delivery was necessary to complete his settlement. But, whether the settlement implies that he delivered up the estate or not, it must be presumed that he did so, if that was necessary to the support of the subsequent action of the court, since there is no evidence to the contrary. Luco v. Bank, 70 Cal. 340, 11 Pac. Rep. 650; Estate of Allen, ante, 426. The precise point, however, insisted upon by appellants' counsel is that there was no record evidence that Buckman's resignation had been accepted, or that his letters had been revoked on the 29th day of June, when the plaintiff was appointed; but we think the action of the court shown by the record, as above stated, was equivalent to, and substantially amounted to, an acceptance of Buckman's resignation, and a revocation of his letters testamentary.

The facts of this case are essentially different from those in the case of Haynes v. Meeks, 20 Cal. 288, cited by counsel for appellants. In that case it was proved by the records of the probate court that Smith,—the first administrator,—after having acted about three years, during which time he had sold real property by order of the court, filed his resignation on December 31, 1853. Thereupon the court ordered him to turn over the papers and effects of the estate to the public administrator, and to make with him a full settlement before the next term of court, and declaring that when he did so he and his sureties should be released. At the next term (January, 1854) he presented his report, showing a balance of funds in his hands more than sufficient to pay all the debts of the estate; but the court only approved a part of this report, and then ordered him to pay all the outstanding debts, and to make a final settlement at the next term of court, and at the same time revoked the former order of December 31, 1853, by which he had been directed to turn over the estate to the public administrator. About four months after these orders, (in May, 1855,) one Aspinwall applied to be appointed administrator of that part of the estate then unadministered, and in June following was appointed. Under these circumstances it was held that the appointment of Aspinwall was void. FIELD, C. J., said: "A resignation is not a matter absolutely in the power of an administrator, to be made at any time he may choose. The statute only confers upon him a conditional right to resign. Its language is that he may resign, 'provided he shall first settle his accounts, and deliver up all the estate to such person as may be appointed by the court.' Smith never complied with this condition, and it nowhere appears that the court ever dispensed with it. The court did * * * order him to turn over the estate to the public administrator; * * * but in the following month it vacated the order, and directed him to apply the moneys in his hands to the payment of the outstanding claims. And the subsequent proceedings show a recognition by the court of his continued existence as administrator of the estate. * * * So, too, the allegation by Aspinwall, in the petition for his appointment, that the 'administration of Smith had fully ceased and determined,' is without force against the record evidence to the contrary." In the case at bar it sufficiently appears by the record, as we have seen, that Buckman did comply with the condition precedent to his right to resign, by delivering up all the estate in his hands. Nor is there any record evidence, or any kind of evidence, that he ever acted as executor, or that the court ever recognized him as such after his final settlement on the 25th day of June. There is nothing whatever tending to dispute the prima facie presumption that all the conditions necessary to authorize the court to appoint the plaintiff on the 29th day of June then existed. We think the judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: FOOTE, C.; HAYNE, C.

PEOPLE v. DUNNE. (No. 20,545.)

MURDER—EVIDENCE—MISCONDUCT OF JUROR.

1. Where, on a trial for murder, defendant testifies that he did not shoot deceased until he was shot at, but other witnesses testify that defendant shot first, and the testimony shows that all defendant had to apprehend was a trespass on his property, a verdict of guilty of murder in the second degree will not be disturbed.

2. Where the testimony of physicians was conflicting as to whether deceased died from blood poisoning caused by the wound, the verdict will not be set aside.

3. The fact that a juror was engaged in an earnest conversation with the prosecuting witness, while inexcusable, is not sufficient to raise a presumption that the juror was improperly influenced thereby.

4. After a physician had testified that deceased died from blood poisoning, resulting from the wounds received, a question on cross-examination, as to whether blood poisoning would ensue where a wounded person drank excessively of intoxicating liquors, was properly excluded, when there was no evidence of such conduct on the part of deceased, nor any offer to prove such conduct.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Siskiyou county; EDWIN SHEARER, Judge.

James F. Farraher, for appellant. G. A. Johnson, Atty. Gen., and J. S. Beard, Dist. Atty., for the People.

SHARPSTEIN, J. Appellant was accused, by information of the district attorney of Siskiyou county, of the crime of murder, committed by shooting and mortally wounding one John Pearson. Appellant was found guilty of murder in the second degree. Counsel for appellant in his brief says he admits the shooting, "but maintains (1) that in inflicting these wounds he acted in self-defense; (2) that Pearson did not die from the effects of the wounds thus inflicted."

The verdict of the jury is against appellant on both of these propositions, and we cannot disturb it, so long as there is sufficient evidence to justify it. Aside from the testimony of defendant in his own behalf, we are unable to find any evidence upon which to base a defense of justifiable or excusable homicide. He says that he did not shoot at deceased until after deceased had shot at him. The other eye-witnesses state that he shot first. That, taken in connection with the evidence, which shows that defendant had no reason to apprehend any other or greater wrong than a trespass on his premises, would justify the jury in finding that the shooting by appellant was not done in self-defense. At the time of the shooting deceased was not committing any trespass, but was on a public highway, where he had an undoubted right to be. We think the evidence upon which appellant relies to support his first point tends rather to prove a motive than a defense for the shooting.

Upon the point that Pearson did not die of the wounds inflicted upon him by the shooting, we think the evidence sufficient to support the finding that he did. Dr. Robertson, a witness called by the prosecution, testified that he treated the deceased for a gunshot wound in the arm and hand, on the 20th day of October, 1887, and that he did not see him again until the 30th of the same month, at which latter time he found him in the acute stage of blood poisoning; that he grew gradually worse, and died three or four days afterwards. Witness performed an autopsy on the body, and states the condition and appearance of the lungs, heart, and liver, and continues by stating that in his opinion the cause of death was from the effects of acute blood poisoning, the immediate cause of death being extreme congestion of the lungs, and an insufficient aeration of the blood; and concludes as follows: "It is my opinion that these were caused by blood poisoning resulting from the wounds he received in his arm and hand." Conceding, which we do not, that other medical testimony tended, in some degree, to contradict that of Dr. Robertson, we could not on that ground disturb the verdict of the jury. We think the circumstance of one of the jurors, at some time during the trial, engaging "in a close and earnest conversation with the prosecuting witness" is not of itself sufficient to raise a presumption that the juror was thereby improperly influenced. At the same time we avail ourselves of this occasion to express our disapprobation of such conduct. It is inexcusable. After the witness Robertson had testified as above stated, defendant's counsel, on cross-examination, propounded the following question to him: "Suppose that a party had a wound inflicted upon him, and after that wound had been inflicted the party drank excessively of intoxicating liquors, would that have any effect, or would that probably produce blood poisoning?" To which the district attorney objected, on the ground that it was not cross-examination, and was immaterial and irrelevant, because it was an hypothetical question, not based upon the evidence in the case. The court sustained the objection, and defendant excepted. We think that in the absence of any evidence that deceased, after receiving the wounds inflicted on him, drank any intoxicating liquor, or any statement of the counsel who propounded the question that he expected to prove that deceased did drink intoxicating liquor after he was wounded, the ruling of the court was not erroneous. We think, however, that the district attorney might safely, and without any nelgect of duty, have withheld his objection. It is seldom, if ever, that an answer to an irrelevant question can prejudice a prosecution. Jurors are not so easily imposed upon or confused by irrelevant evidence as many prosecutors seem to suppose.

Witness Doggett was asked by defendant's counsel if he had ever seen the defendant working on his claim before that year. The question was objected to by the district attorney, and the objection sustained by the court, and defendant excepted. The witness then stated that defendant "had a wheel-pump there, and had started to sink down," and that "there were cribs out there that he had his wheel on." Defendant's counsel then asked the witness: "How much do you consider the evidence that you saw of mining and expenditure, in the way of labor there, would be worth?" Objected to as incompetent and irrelevant. Objection sustained, and exception. We think the ruling correct. The case, we think, was fairly submitted to the jury by the instructions of the court. We think there is no error in those given, or in refusing to give those requested and refused, for which the judgment and order denying the motion for a new trial should be reversed. Judgment and order affirmed.

Ex parte Sternes. (No. 20,480.)

Habeas Corpus—Evidence.

Petitioner was arrested on the charge of kidnapping, and examined, and committed by the justice. He applied to the supreme court to be released on habeas corpus, pending the decision of which an information was filed against him for the same offense for which he had been committed. On the hearing of the habeas corpus before the court in bank, (five justices present,) evidence offered to show that the commitment was ordered by the justice on no other evidence than that petitioner had arrested a person by virtue of a warrant, and that, therefore, the commitment was "without reasonable or probable cause," was excluded, (four justices concurring,) on the ground that the filing of the information was conclusive as to probable cause. The case was subsequently submitted on briefs, but when it was taken up for decision it was found that, on account of the retirement of the chief justice, "the concurrence of four justices present at the hearing," required by Const. Cal. art. 6, § 2, could not be had, and a rehearing was ordered, and the case resubmitted upon the original briefs. Held, that the ruling excluding the evidence was a final disposition of the question involved, and that petitioner must be remanded.

In bank. Habeas corpus.

Charles W. Kitts and A. L. Hart, for petitioner. W. D. Long, Dist. Atty., (C. W. Cross, of counsel,) for respondent.

Beatty, C. J. This is a proceeding upon habeas corpus. It appears from the petition upon which the order for the issuance of the writ was based that in April, 1888, the petitioner, George H. Sternes, was deputy-sheriff of Yuba county; that a warrant for the arrest of one Ah Fong, issued by the superior court of said county, was placed in his hands for service; and that he executed the writ by arresting Ah Fong in Nevada county, and bringing him before the superior court of Yuba county, at Marysville. It is further alleged in the petition that said Ah Fong thereafter procured a warrant to be issued by a justice of the peace in Nevada county, commanding the arrest of petitioner on a charge of kidnapping, and that, being arrested upon such warrant and taken before said justice of the peace, petitioner had an examination, and upon proof of said arrest of Ah Fong under said warrant issued by the superior court of Yuba county, and the delivery of the body of Ah Fong to said court in Marysville, and without other proof of the commission of any offense, said justice made an order holding the petitioner to answer upon said charge of kidnapping, and thereupon committed him to the custody of George Lord, sheriff of Nevada county. This petition was filed September 26, 1888, and on the same day the late chief justice made an order directing the issuance of the writ of habeas corpus as prayed, returnable before this court on the 22d day of October following, and ordered that pending the hearing the petitioner be admitted to bail. On the 22d of October the respondent, Lord, filed his return, showing that the petitioner had been in his custody, and had been confined by him in the county jail of Nevada county, under and by virtue of a commitment for kidnapping, a copy of which is annexed to the return; that after service of the writ of habeas corpus he had discharged the petitioner on bail; and that subsequent thereto, on October 18, 1888, an information had been filed by the district attorney of Nevada county, accusing petitioner of said crime of kidnapping. The court, sitting in bank, five justices present, including the late chief justice, thereupon proceeded with the hearing. It appears from the notes of our official reporter, and statements of members of the court, that counsel for petitioner offered in evidence certified copies of the depositions taken at the examination of petitioner by the committing magistrate, for the purpose of establishing the ground upon which he claimed that his imprisonment was unlawful, viz., that he had been "committed on a criminal charge without reasonable or probable cause." Pen. Code, § 1487, subd. 7. To the introduction of this testimony respondent's counsel objected upon the ground that the filing of the information by the district attorney put an end to all inquiry in this proceeding as to the existence of reasonable or probable cause for holding the petitioner to answer. Four of the justices present at the hearing, including the late chief justice, concurred in sustaining this objection. Justice Paterson did not concur in the ruling. But under the decision of the four other justices the testimony was excluded. None of these occurrences at the time of the hearing have been made matter of record, the minutes of the clerk merely showing that the cause was orally argued by counsel for petitioner and for respondent, and submitted upon briefs to be filed. In the printed briefs subsequently filed counsel for petitioner elaborately argue the proposition that if a person has been held to answer on a criminal charge, without reasonable or probable cause, he has an undoubted right to be discharged upon habeas corpus, and that his right to be so discharged cannot be impaired by the subsequent filing of an information by the district attorney, and more especially where the information is filed after the issuance and service of the writ of habeas corpus. Counsel for respondent in their brief completely ignore the argument made on behalf of petitioner, and rest entirely upon the claim that the whole question was decided and finally disposed of at the hearing. When, however, after the final submission of the cause, it was taken up for decision, it was found that, on account of the retirement of the late chief justice, "the concurrence of four justices present at the hearing," which is made by the constitution (article 6, § 2) essential to a judgment of this court in bank, could not be obtained, and it became necessary to set aside the previous order of submission and to direct a rehearing. This having been done, counsel have again submitted the case upon the briefs already filed.

From the foregoing statement it will appear that the condition of the cause is decidedly anomalous. It is an original proceeding in this court, and evidence is necessary in support of the allegations of the petition in order to make out the ground upon which the petitioner claims his discharge. The only evidence offered for that purpose at the hearing was by the ruling of a competent number of the sitting justices excluded from consideration. This order did not need to be in writing, like the determination of a cause, (Const. art. 6, § 2,) and seems to have been a final disposition of the question involved. At all events, the case was submitted at the time and has been resubmitted without the evidence upon which alone—conceding the correctness of the proposition so ably argued by his counsel—we could order the petitioner's discharge. For this reason, therefore, and without deciding any other question presented by the record, we feel constrained to remand the prisoner. It is so ordered.

CORPORATIONS—SUITS BY STOCKHOLDERS.

1. A suit to procure relief for the misappropriation of the funds of a corporation is properly brought by the stockholders, without any demand on the directors to bring such suit, where the complaint alleges that the corporation is under the control of the defaulting directors, and that such demand would be useless.

2. Such a suit is not barred by the statute of limitations where the defaults are said to have occurred between August 1, 1882, and May 1, 1885, and the suit is brought July 1, 1885; Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 338, providing that suits for relief on the ground of fraud shall be brought within three years of the discovery of the fraud.

3. Where a general demurrer is filed to a complaint containing two counts, on the ground that the causes of action are barred by the statute of limitations, the demurrer must be overruled, if a good cause of action is stated in either count.

4. An averment that the plaintiffs were owners of the stock of the corporation before suit brought, and ever since 1881, sufficiently alleges ownership of the stock.

5. Such suit may be brought by any one or any number of stockholders.

6. The directors who are charged with having connived in such defaults are proper parties defendant in such action.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; T. H. REARDEN, Judge.

Messrs. Moyle and Holling, stockholders in the Andes Silver Mining Company, sued Michael Landers and others, directors of said company, to obtain relief from certain frauds perpetrated by the directors. A demurrer to the complaint was sustained, and plaintiffs appeal.

L. E. Bulkeley, for appellants. H. C. Sieberst, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. The complaint contains two counts. The defendants demurred to the whole complaint, and "to the second alleged cause of action set out in the plaintiffs' complaint," which we shall consider as a demurrer to the second count of the complaint.

The demurrer was sustained, and, plaintiffs declining to amend, final judgment was given and entered in favor of defendants. From this judgment plaintiffs have appealed.

The object of the action is to procure relief from certain alleged fraudulent misappropriations of the funds and property of the corporation defendant the Andes Silver Mining Company by some of its directors. The defendants contend that the complaint is defective in this: That the action should have been brought by the corporation as plaintiff, and not by the present plaintiffs, who are stockholders of the corporation. The general rule undoubtedly is that an action of this character must be brought in the name of the corporation. The recovery, if any, belongs to the corporation, and must go into its coffers. But there are exceptions to this rule. One is where a demand is made on the corporation to bring such action, and it refuses to bring it. This demand must be considered and passed on by the managing authority of the corporation, which is its board of directors. But where such a demand would be useless, as where the peccant directors still control the affairs of the corporation, such a demand would be regarded as useless, and will not be insisted on. We think the averments of the complaint show that the corporation is still under the control of the alleged defaulting directors, or their tools and servants, and that it sufficiently appears that a demand to sue would have been nugatory. In such a case the law dispenses with a demand, and allows a stockholder to bring the action to which the corporation, as is here the case, must be a party.

It is contended, further, that the causes of action set forth in the complaint are barred by the statute of limitations, and that such appears on the face of the complaint to be the case. The action is brought for relief on the ground of fraud, in which case the cause of action is not to be deemed to have accrued until the discovery by the aggrieved party of the facts constituting the fraud. Such is the law of this state fixed by statutory enactment. The action, under such circumstances, is not barred if the discovery of the facts constituting the fraud has been made within three years before the commencement of the action. Code Civil Proc. § 338. Now, it seems to us that the defaults set forth in the second count of the complaint, hereinafter pointed out, were not discovered until within three years before action brought.

The defaults referred to are as follows: An overallowance of $3,850 to Michael Landers on account of expenses of trips to Virginia City, Nev.; the transaction with regard to the purchase of furniture of Burnham, for which it is averred $800 was allowed, of which sum only $346.45 was used in the purchase, and the balance was retained by Michael Landers, while the furniture bought was taken by said Landers to his private residence, and there used by him from the time of the purchase; the misappropriation of funds to pay the assessments on the stock of the directors of the Andes Silver Mining Company; the misappropriation of a portion of the proceeds of the sales of certain shares of the stock of the corporation above named. The above defaults are alleged to have occurred, the first in August and September, 1882, the second on the 1st of August, 1882, the others in December, 1882, August, 1883, and since the 1st of May, 1885. The action is averred to have been commenced on the 1st day of July, 1885. The above defaults are averred to have been committed and discovered within three years before this date, as will be seen by comparison of the dates above given.

As the demurrer which embraces the first count is a demurrer to the whole complaint, if a good cause of action not barred by the statute of limitations is stated in either count, the demurrer, on the ground above stated, must be overruled; this being in accordance with the long-settled rule that where the demurrer is to the whole complaint it is not well taken, if any count of the complaint is legally sufficient. The averment as to the ownership of the stock is sufficient. The averments are that the plaintiffs, Moyle and Holling, were owners of the stock of the Andes Company above named before the beginning of the action, and have been such owners ever since some time in the year 1881. We can see no tenable objection to the joinder of Holling with Moyle as plaintiff. Any one or any number of stockholders may unite in bringing such action. In our opinion the directors made defendants are properly made such. They are at any rate proper parties, and, indeed, it is highly proper that they should be made such, as the defaults set forth in the second count of the complaint are alleged to have occurred with their connivance. As to the other defaults set forth in the complaint, and whether or not they are barred by the statute of limitations, we think it proper to say nothing. We have said enough to warrant us in holding that the court below erred in sustaining the demurrer to the complaint, for which reason the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to overrule the demurrer to the complaint, and the second count thereof, to permit the defendants to answer, and for further proceedings in accordance with law. So ordered.

Greenwood v. Adams et al. (No. 12,742.)

Taxation—Pleading—Evidence.

1. A tax-sale certificate, reciting that the lands were assessed to a person named, "and all known owners or claimants, and, when unknown, to unknown owners or claimants," and a tax-deed with like recitals, are void.

2. The holder of an invalid tax-deed cannot aid it by introducing in evidence the delinquent assessment roll.

3. The holder of an invalid tax-deed cannot claim, either in law or equity, that his purchase at the tax-sale vested the state's lien in him.

4. It is no abuse of discretion to impose, as a condition of leave to file a second supplemental answer setting up title under a tax-deed obtained on the day of the trial under a sale made two years previously, the payment of $20, and, if a continuance should become necessary by reason of such answer, the payment of costs.

5. Where there is no motion for a new trial, and the appeal is not taken within 60 days after entry of judgment, the question whether the findings were justified by the evidence cannot be raised.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Luis Obispo county.

V. A. Gregg, for appellants. S. M. Swinnerton, for respondent.

Belcher, C. C. Action to quiet title to certain lands in the county of San Luis Obispo. Judgment for plaintiff. Appeal by defendants.

The defendants by their original answer denied plaintiff's ownership of the lands described in the complaint, and by a supplemental answer they alleged that since the commencement of the action they had acquired title thereto in fee. At the trial it was admitted that John Q. Greenwood held title to all the lands described in the complaint under patents issued by the United States in 1870. The defendants then, in support of the issues on their part, introduced in evidence a certificate of sale for non-payment of taxes made to them by the tax collector of San Luis Obispo county, under date of March 3, 1884. The certificate recited that the lands were assessed for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1884, for state and county taxes, "to J. H. Greenwood, and all known owners or claimants, and, when unknown, to unknown owners or claimants." Defendants next offered in evidence a tax-deed, made to them in pursuance of the certificate, and dated March 27, 1885. The deed purported to convey the lands described as fully and absolutely as the tax collector could lawfully convey the same, "together with all and singular the tenements, hereditaments, and appurtenances thereto belonging or in any wise appertaining, of the said J. H. Greenwood, and all owners and claimants thereof, known and unknown." The plaintiff objected to the deed being received in evidence, on the ground that it was void and irrelevant and immaterial. The court sustained the objection, and defendants reserved an exception. We see no error in the ruling. It has been frequently held in this state that an assessment of real property to some person named, "and to all owners and claimants, known or unknown," is void, and that a certificate or deed reciting such an assessment is also void. Grotefend v. Ultz, 53 Cal. 666; Grimm v. O'Connell, 54 Cal. 522; Daly v. Ah Goon, 64 Cal. 512, 2 Pac. Rep. 401. The recital in the certificate here is in substance the same as that in the cases cited.

The defendants next asked leave to file a second supplemental answer setting up that they had acquired title to the lands in controversy under a tax-deed made to them on the day of the trial. The plaintiff objected, but the court offered to allow the answer to be filed on payment of $20, and, if a continuance was made necessary thereby, on payment of costs. The defendants excepted to the conditions proposed, and thereupon the court denied the application. An application to file a supplemental answer is addressed to the sound legal discretion of the court, (Harding v. Minear, 54 Cal. 502,) and in granting such an application the court is authorized to impose such terms as may be just and proper. The answer which defendants wished to file set up a tax-deed made in March, 1887, and based on a tax-sale made in March, 1885,—nearly two years before the action was commenced. They had ample time, therefore, if they needed the deed, to have obtained it, and set up their rights under it in their original or first supplemental answer. Under the circumstances, we see no abuse of discretion in the ruling of the court.

The defendants next offered in evidence the delinquent assessment roll of property in the county for the year 1884. The plaintiff objected to the evidence as irrelevant and immaterial, and the court sustained the objection. There was no error in this ruling, for, as said of the plaintiff in Grimm v. O'Connell, supra, (page 524,) one "must recover, if at all, on his tax-deed, supported by evidence of the regularity of the prior proceedings, if the same are attacked. He cannot recover on the tax-roll or delinquent list."

The defendants next introduced in evidence two certificates of sale and tax-deeds of portions of the land made to them for delinquent taxes of the year 1884–85; and it is urged that under these deeds they acquired title to the land described therein, and the court should have so found. We cannot consider this point, for the reason that, as there was no motion for new trial, and the appeal was not taken within 60 days after the judgment was entered, the question as to whether the findings were justified by the evidence or not cannot be raised.

Finally, the defendants offered in evidence the deed made to them during the trial, but, on objection of plaintiff, it was excluded. No copy of the deed is found in the bill of exceptions, but it is urged that this and all the other rulings complained of were erroneous, because, when defendants purchased the land at the tax-sales, the lien of the state vested in them, and could only be divested by a repayment of the purchase money, and that they were entitled to have the amount so paid out repaid before any decree could be entered against them. We fail to see any force in this point. Parties who purchase property at tax-sales acquire the title to the property if all the proceedings for the levy of the taxes and the sale are regular and in strict conformity to law, but, if not so, they acquire no rights to the property which either a court of law or equity can enforce. As the case is presented before us we cannot say that appellants had acquired any rights to the property in controversy which were disregarded by the court below, and we therefore advise that the judgment be affirmed.

We concur: FOOTE, C.; HAYNE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is affirmed.

WORKS, J. The facts and points made in this case are the same as in Moran v. MARTIN v. HUDSON. (No. 12,917.)

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; J. B. CAMPBELL, Judge.

Church & Cory, for appellant. Wharton & Short and D. S. Terry, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Rules 5 and 6 of this court provide specifically how transcripts on appeal to this court shall be arranged and printed, and in rule 6 it is said: "The chronological arrangement of the several parts of the transcript, and a strict compliance with the other requirements of this rule, will be exacted of the appellant or party filing the record here in all cases by the court, whether objection by the opposite party be made or not; and for any failure or neglect in these respects which is found to obstruct the examination of the record the appeal may be dismissed." It has become quite common for attorneys to overlook or evade these rules, and for this reason the court finds it necessary to bring the matter to their attention. The case before us presents a flagrant disregard of the rules referred to, and we might properly dismiss the appeal, but we prefer to give counsel an opportunity to correct the error, if they desire to do so. It is ordered that the submission of the case be set aside, that the transcript on file be stricken out, that the appellant be allowed 30 days within which to print and file a transcript conforming to the rules of the court, the cost of which shall be borne by him and not taxed as costs, and that upon failure to comply with this order the appeal be dismissed.

Raisch v. City and County of San Francisco. (No. 11,759.)

Street Contracts—Extension of Time.

1. An agreement extending the time for completion of a street contract, made after the expiration of the time originally agreed upon, is void against the city, as well as against property owners, under Act Cal. April 1, 1872, which makes time of the essence of such contracts.

2. It is immaterial that such extension was made with knowledge on the part of the city that the work had not been finished, and that upon the faith of such extension the contractor expended money in good faith.

3. Where the street contract sued on provided that the city would levy a special assessment to pay the contractor, but should not be liable for the contract price except as otherwise provided by statute, and the work was not done within the time provided, plaintiff was not entitled to recover upon a quantum meruit without alleging and proving either that no assessment had been made, or that, if made, there had been a failure to enforce the same, through no fault of his.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; M. A. Edmonds, Judge.

Garber & Bishop and George Flournoy, Jr., for appellant. D. H. Whittemore and William M. Pierson, for respondent.

Paterson, J. This is an action to recover the sum of $3,728.50, claimed to be due from defendant to plaintiff for work done under a contract between the plaintiff and the superintendent of streets. It is alleged in the complaint that the board of supervisors on August 22, 1876, adopted a resolution of intention to lay asphaltum sidewalks on Third street from Market to Mission; that the resolution was published for 10 successive days; that a resolution ordering the work was passed September 11, 1876; that notice of the proposed work was duly published and posted by the clerk; that plaintiff, among others, put in a sealed proposal, and accompanied it with a certified check in the sum of $500; that on October 2, 1876, the contract for doing said work was awarded to plaintiff, which award was afterwards duly published; that thereafter, October 13, 1876, the superintendent of streets in his official capacity and plaintiff entered into an agreement wherein plaintiff agreed to perform the work in a good and workman-like manner, etc.; that plaintiff gave bonds in the sum of $1,000, and $500; that said contract was duly recorded; that plaintiff duly performed all the conditions according to the terms of the contract, and to the satisfaction of the superintendent; that the contract price of the work was $3,728.50. The complaint then alleges that in December, 1863, that portion of Third street in question having been constructed to the satisfaction of the superintendent and committee of streets, said committee recommended the adoption of a resolution by the board of supervisors accepting said portion of Third street, "excepting the sewering necessary in Third opposite the small or subdivision streets;" that such resolution, after being passed to print and published five days, was adopted by the board on January 4, 1864, and signed by the mayor. The only allegation of non-payment of plaintiff's demand is "that on the 2d day of January, 1877, plaintiff presented to said board of supervisors a demand for the payment of said sum of $3,728.50 for said work, but that said board rejected and disallowed said claim, and refused to pay the same." The amended answer sets out, in substance, that the only contract between plaintiff and the superintendent of streets for said work was made on October 12, 1876. A copy of the contract is annexed to the answer. By the terms of this contract the plaintiff was to perform the work in a good and workman-like manner, commencing the same within five days, and completing the same within twenty days after the date of said contract, at the rate of $4.50 per front foot for sidewalks, and $75 for each crossing; and that the said superintendent should make an assessment to pay for the same; and that the said city and county should in no case be liable therefor, (except where otherwise provided in the acts mentioned in said contract,) or for any delinquency in said assessment. It is further alleged that the plaintiff did not perform the work in a good or workman-like manner, or within the time specified in said contract, and that no extensions of said time were ever given, or permitted to be given, except certain attempted extensions, none of which were given within the 20 days specified in the contract. The answer denies that the board of supervisors ever acquired jurisdiction to adopt a resolution accepting that portion of Third street referred to, or that the street was ever constructed to the satisfaction of the superintendent or said committee, or that the resolution of acceptance was ever published, or legally passed. The answer further alleges that certain specific sums, amounting to $549.40, were at various times paid and accepted by the plaintiff on an assessment which had been made by the superintendent pursuant to the contract.

It is claimed by counsel for the appellant that, inasmuch as it is not shown, either by the pleadings or in the findings, that the portion of Third street in question had ever been constructed so as to give the board jurisdiction to accept it, and that the alleged acceptance was partial only, the proceedings of the board were void, and the defendant was not liable, under any circumstances, for work performed on said street. In view of the conclusion we have reached upon another point in the case, we deem it unnecessary to pass upon this question. The court found the fact to be, as alleged by defendant, that the work was done under the contract set forth in the answer; that the work was not performed within the 20 days mentioned in the contract, but was performed within the time given in certain extensions; that the resolutions granting said extensions were not given within the 20 days mentioned in the contract, but were given before the work was completed, "with full knowledge that said work was not completed, and to induce said plaintiff to complete the same."

It has been held in many cases that neither the board of supervisors nor the superintendent of streets possesses the power to grant any extensions of time for the performance of work under such a contract, after the expiration of the time limited in the contract, and that any order granting such extension is absolutely void. Beveridge v. Livingstone, 54 Cal. 54; Fanning v. Schammel, 68 Cal. 428, 9 Pac. Rep. 427; Dougherty v. Coffin, 69 Cal. 454, 10 Pac. Rep. 672. It is claimed, however, by respondent that the rule laid down in these cases does not apply in an action brought against the city on a contract for performing the work for the city; that the cases cited were between contractors and property owners, and were based upon the principle that in all proceedings in invitum an assessment cannot be imposed without a strict compliance with the law. There is nothing said, however, in the cases cited, which limits the rule to actions upon assessments against abutters. The decisions in those cases seem to have been based upon the idea that the statute itself makes time the essence of contracts for street work. The provision which is construed to prohibit the extension of the time of performance after the expiration of the time named in the contract, or any previous extension, evidently was not intended simply to protect abutters, because the same provision in terms applies where the owners themselves undertake to perform the work. St. 1871-72, p. 808. It seems to have been the intention of the legislature to secure punctual completion of street improvements, whoever might undertake them, and to prevent the revival of contracts long after they had expired, and at a time when, under a new contract, the improvement might be made more cheaply. The object is equally important whether work is to be paid for by the city or by the owners, and there is no reason why an improvement upon an unaccepted street should be completed within the time prescribed in the contract, while contractors for work on accepted streets should be permitted to perform the work at their leisure, under grants of extensions made through the grace or improvidence of the board of supervisors. "Accepted streets" are generally in those portions of the city in which traffic and travel are greatest. It would seem that greater promptitude should be required with respect to them than in the case of "unaccepted streets," where a fewer number would suffer from the effects of torn-up pavements, débris, etc. The provision which forbids extensions of time after the expiration of the contract time is general and comprehensive, and applies to all contracts made under the act.

There is nothing in the language used to limit it to any particular class of contracts, or to any particular class of streets, and we could not, without ingrafting an exception upon the statute, sustain the contention of the appellant in this regard.

The fact that the extension was made with the knowledge that the work had not been finished, and that upon the faith of such extension plaintiff expended money in good faith, as is found by the court below, cannot cure the invalidity of the extension. A knowledge that the work has not been completed is presumed always from the fact of extension. There would be no necessity for an extension of time, if the work were finished. It is doubtless true, also, that when work is performed under a contract of this sort, after the contract has expired, it is done upon the faith of the extension; but, "where there is no power or authority vested by law in officers or agents, no void act of theirs can be cured by aid of the doctrine of estoppel." 2 Herm. Estop. 1365; Martin v. Zellerbach, 38 Cal. 300; Thompson v. Doaksum, 68 Cal. 593, 10 Pac. Rep. 199; Zottman v. San Francisco, 20 Cal. 96.

There are other matters fatal to a recovery by plaintiff herein. It was expressly agreed by the parties to the contract that the city and county should not "be liable for any portion of the expense of the work aforesaid, nor for any delinquency of the persons or property assessed," except where it is otherwise provided in the acts referred to. If the plaintiff can hold the city and county liable at all under this contract, it must be upon a failure to obtain payment through the assessment; and to recover it would be necessary for him to allege and show, either that no assessment had been made, as provided in the contract, or that after the issuance of such assessment the property holders had resisted the assessment, and had not paid the amounts assessed to them. No such thing is averred, proved, or found herein. Furthermore, it is alleged in the answer that some of the lot-owners have paid their assessments, amounting in all to $549.40. Upon this issue the findings are silent. The court has found, it is true, that the city has paid no part of the $3,728.50, but there is nothing to show how much, if anything, has been paid by the abutters.

If it be claimed that the plaintiff is entitled to recover upon a quantum meruit, it is sufficient to say that there is nothing in the complaint and nothing in the findings to sustain a judgment for the plaintiff on any such theory. The complaint counts entirely upon the express contract, and the findings follow it. There is no averment that the work performed by plaintiff was worth anything. Plaintiff's action is founded upon a contract which shows upon its face that it was made under the provisions of the act of April 1, 1872. The contract shows upon its face that it was the intention of the parties thereto to be governed by the provisions of that act. That is to say, if defendant can be held liable at all, it is clear that the parties understood that the plaintiff was first to exhaust his remedy against the owners and their land by an assessment before the city should in any event be liable. The provisions of the act have become a part of the contract, and the rights of the parties should be measured by them. It is a contract to make an assessment to pay for the proposed improvement. There is no allegation or finding that the defendant or its agents have refused to comply with the terms of the contract, and there is no finding that the assessment agreed to be made was not in fact made, as alleged in the answer. Therefore, if there could be a recovery upon an implied contract or quantum meruit, upon a failure to follow the mode prescribed by law, plaintiff is not entitled to recover here, because, as we have seen, there are no averments or findings of fact from which such implied contract could arise. It will not do for the plaintiff to say that an assessment, if issued, could not have been enforced; that the abutters could not have been compelled to pay for the work. It is not entirely clear that such would be the fact, (San Francisco v. Certain Real Estate, 42 Cal. 513; State v. Newark, 37 N. J. Law, 424;) but, assuming it to be so, before the plaintiff can recover on an implied contract, he must show either that no assessment has been made, or that, if made, there has been a failure to enforce it through no fault of his own. Judgment reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

CRIMINAL LAW—PLEAS.

1. Pen. Code Cal. § 1017, provides that pleas must be oral, and entered upon the minutes in substantially the following form, if defendant plead a former conviction or acquittal: "The defendant pleads that he has already been convicted [or acquitted] of the offense charged by the judgment of the court of," specifying the time, place, and court. If he plead once in jeopardy: "The defendant pleads that he has been once in jeopardy for the offense charged," specifying the time, place, and court. Defendant's pleas, as entered on the minutes, (though his counsel offered written pleas which were much fuller,) were: "First, defendant pleads not guilty of the offense charged; second, a former acquittal; third, once in jeopardy." Held, that the two latter pleas were insufficient.

2. Under Pen. Code, § 1185, providing that a motion in arrest of judgment may be "founded on any defects in the indictment or information mentioned in section 1004," a bill of exceptions, prepared for and used only upon a motion in arrest, cannot properly contain a written plea offered by defendant; and the contents of such writing cannot be looked to in this court to aid the pleas actually entered on the minutes.

3. Under Pen. Code, § 1008, providing that the allowance of a demurrer to an indictment or information is a bar to another prosecution, unless the court, "being of the opinion that the objection on which the demurrer is allowed may be avoided in a new indictment or information, * * * directs a new information to be filed," it is not necessary that the court actually render such opinion; it is sufficient if the court directs the district attorney to file a new information.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Yolo county; C. H. GAROUTTE, Judge.

Information against Arthur O'Leary for practicing medicine without a certificate. Defendant was convicted. The opinion of the commissioners is reported in 16 Pac. Rep. 884. Pen. Code, § 1008, provides that, "if the demurrer is allowed, the judgment is final upon the indictment or information demurred to, and is a bar to another prosecution for the same offense, unless the court, being of the opinion that the objection on which the demurrer is allowed may be avoided in a new indictment or information, directs the case to be submitted to another grand jury, or directs a new information to be filed. * * *"

R. Clark, for appellant. Geo. A. Johnson, Atty. Gen., for the People.

PATERSON, J. The defendant was charged in the information with having practiced medicine without having first obtained a certificate authorizing him to do so as required by the "Act to regulate the practice of medicine in the state of California." Deer. Pen. Code, 625–629. The language of the information is sufficiently full and explicit in charging the offense, and we think that the court did not err in overruling the demurrer. The appeal is from the judgment only. The bill of exceptions contains none of the evidence. We cannot say, therefore, that the court erred in refusing certain instructions referred to in appellant's brief. In the former decision filed herein (16 Pac. Rep. 884) it was held that "the pleas of former acquittal and once in jeopardy, as the defendant asked to have them entered, were in substantially the form required by the Code." In support of this proposition there was quoted in the opinion a portion of the contents of a written plea offered by defendant's counsel, and it was said: "If the clerk failed to make the entry as fully as he ought to have done, the defendant cannot be made to suffer for that failure." The pleas actually entered upon the minutes of the court were as follows: "First, defendant pleads not guilty of the offense charged; second, a former acquittal; third, once in jeopardy." The jury found the defendant guilty, but did not find on the issues of former acquittal and once in jeopardy. The pleas, as entered upon the minutes, were insufficient. Section 1017, Pen. Code, prescribes the form for such pleas. If the defendant plead a former conviction or acquittal the form is as follows: "The defendant pleads that he has already been convicted [or acquitted] of the offense charged by the judgment of the court of ——, [naming it,] rendered at ——, [naming the place,] on the — day of ——." If he plead once in jeopardy, the form is as follows: "The defendant pleads that he has been once in jeopardy for the offense charged, [specifying the time, place, and court.]" The object of these forms is plain. The people should be informed of the circumstances as to time, place, and court. None of these circumstances are named in the plea actually entered upon the minutes of the court below; and we cannot resort to the written document, which, it is claimed, was filed at the time the plea was entered in aid of the plea actually entered. Section 1017, supra, provides that "every plea must be oral, and entered upon the minutes of the court in substantially the following form: * * *" The bill of exceptions in the record before us was prepared for and used only upon the motion in arrest of judgment. The bill of exceptions does not purport to be a bill prepared to present exceptions to the rulings of the court, upon any other matter than that of the motion in arrest of judgment. The written plea referred to is not properly in the bill of exceptions. Section 1185, Id., prescribes the grounds upon which a motion in arrest of judgment may be made. It is "founded on any defects in the indictment or information mentioned in section 1004."

There was no error in the ruling of the court below upon the defendant's motion in arrest of judgment, and, the pleas referred to not being in the form required by the Code, it was not necessary for the jury to find on them.

We see no merit in the contention that the defendant should have been discharged from custody because the court below failed to render an opinion that the objection to the information to which the demurrer had been sustained could be overcome by filing another. The court directed the district attorney to file a new information, and this was a sufficient compliance with section 1008 of the Penal Code. It was not said in People v. Jordan, 63 Cal. 219, that the court must, in addition to directing the district attorney to file a new information, render an opinion that the objection to the information could be overcome by filing another. Judgment and order affirmed.

SIMONS v. MILLS. (Nos. 13,082, 13,083.)

ARBITRATION AND AWARD.

1. Under a submission to arbitrators of all questions in difference between the parties concerning the business of brick-making, in which they had been engaged as partners, so that all rights of action arising therefrom may be conclusively settled, the arbitrators have power to determine what amount of the uncollected assets are due to each party.

2. It is no objection to an award that the arbitrators took advice relative to the questions before them if they decided on their own judgment.

In bank. Appeals from superior court, Los Angeles county; A. W. HUTTON, Judge.

A. N. Metcalfe and W. T. Williams, for appellants. M. C. Hester, for respondent.

THORNTON, J. Appeal from a judgment entered on an award of arbitrators, and also from an order denying a motion to vacate the award. We see no error in the proceeding brought here to be reviewed on appeal. The submission provided that it should be entered as an order of court. The matters were such as could be submitted to arbitration under the statute. The court below had jurisdiction of the proceeding. No objection appears to have been made in the court below that the submission was not entered as required by law, and therefore should not be considered here. The motion to set aside the award was made on the grounds of misconduct of the arbitrators, and that the arbitrators exceeded their powers. Painter was not an arbitrator. Though the arbitrators consulted with him, they acted on their own judgment in making their determination.

This clearly appears from the affidavits of the arbitrators. The question presented as to the determination by the arbitrators is similar to that of the verdict of a jury where it is agreed that each juror shall set down in figures what shall be the amount of their verdict, and divide the whole sum by 12 to fix the amount, without agreeing to be bound by it, then afterwards agreeing to determine the same upon consideration of the evidence. A verdict so found has been held to be good. Wilson v. Berryman, 5 Cal. 45.

We do not think the arbitrators exceeded their powers under the submission. The matters referred to the determination of the arbitrators related to a certain difference which had arisen between the parties, growing out of partnership transactions in making and selling bricks. The articles of copartnership were made part of the submission, and were attached to it as an exhibit. The submission provided that the arbitrators "shall decide upon the amounts of money that each party hereto may owe the other party hereto at the date of this submission, arising or becoming due upon any of the transactions, acts, or omissions referred to in the preambles to this submission, and, having found such amounts, shall therefrom arrive at their award, and said award may be entered as a judgment," etc. It is declared in the submission that the reference to arbitrators is made "in order that all matters in difference now existing between" the parties, "in reference to said brick-making business," and "that all rights of action of each of said parties against the other arising out of said brick business may be conclusively settled." This the arbitrators proceeded to do, and determined, first, that of the profits Simons had received in money, in excess of his share, $1,926.73, for which sum Mills was entitled to a judgment against him. There were bills due the concern, not collected at the date of the submission, a list of which is appended to the award, as to which the arbitrators made the following finding: "That there are still assets existing under the terms of said agreement in the shape of 'bills receivable,' which are due to said Mills as trustee for said Simons and Mills under the terms of said agreement, and of which, after collections are made and expenses of collection paid, Simons will be entitled to two-fifths, and Mills to three-fifths." We are of opinion that the arbitrators were called in, under the terms of the submission, to determine what amounts were due to each of the uncollected assets, styled in the above finding "bills receivable." Under the articles of partnership all moneys received on account of the business of brick-making were to be paid to and disbursed by the parties of the first part. These parties of the first part were originally Mills and one Rosenberger. Mills acquired by purchase Rosenberger's interest, and Mills then represented the parties of the first part. The above finding of the award is objected to by counsel for Simons as giving Mills the authority to collect the uncollected assets. But this view is erroneous. Mills had that authority under the articles, and the statement in the finding is a reference to and recital of that authority, as existing under the terms of the partnership agreement, and properly directs that after Mills has collected the bills referred to Simons will be entitled to two-fifths and Mills to three-fifths of such moneys; in other words, that when Mills collects the moneys referred to he will owe Simons two-fifths of such collections, and he (Mills) will be entitled to retain three-fifths, expense of collection to be deducted. This division of the moneys to be realized on collections made is also in accordance with the terms of the agreement of partnership. The amount due by Mills to Simons when he has made the collections referred to was thus determined, and correctly determined. We think this was within the powers conferred on the arbitrators by the submission. We find no error in the records, and the judgment in one case, (13,082,) and the order denying the motion to vacate the award in the other case, (13,083,) are affirmed. Ordered accordingly.

Sharon v. Sharon. (No. 11,991.)

Appeal—Record—Res Adjudicata—Marriage—Evidence.

1. Where certain exhibits, claimed to have been used in evidence, are referred to in the body of the statement on motion for new trial, as, "Plaintiff's Exhibit, No.—, [giving the number,] see end of statement," and such exhibits are set out in an appendix to such statement, properly numbered, preceded by the recital, "The following are the exhibits offered and read in evidence on behalf of the plaintiff, and mentioned in the foregoing statement," they are thereby sufficiently identified and incorporated in, and made a part of, such statement.

2. The certificate of the judge that "the foregoing statement on motion for a new trial has been settled and allowed by me" includes and authenticates such exhibits, as a part of such statement, although the certificate is attached to the body of the statement and precedes the exhibits. Kimball v. Semple, 31 Cal. 657; People v. Bartlett, 40 Cal. 146; Bush v. Taylor, 45 Cal. 112; Thompson v. Patterson, 54 Cal. 542, distinguished on this point.

3. Where such exhibits appear to have been included in the statement, in the manner above stated, the fact that some of them have been omitted from the transcript is not ground for striking out the whole statement. The remedy of the respondent is to suggest a diminution of the record, and have them brought up. Thornton, J., dissenting.

4. Depositions, being on file, may be made part of the statement, by calling for them by the words "here insert" at the proper place; and when the transcript is made up they should be copied, in full, where called for.

5. Where an exhibit is omitted from the statement, and no objection is made, and the attorneys for respondent indorse on the statement, "The foregoing statement agreed to by us," and the same is thereupon signed by the judge, the objection that such exhibits have been omitted is waived, and such omission presents no cause in this court for striking out the statement, or any part of it.

6. Where counsel stipulate that all depositions on file may be "read and referred to on the hearing of defendant's motion for a new trial herein as part of the foregoing statement," and the same "shall be printed in the transcript on appeal," and "form a part of the statement," a strict compliance with the requirements of the statute as to the manner of making them parts of such statement is waived.

7. The point that the subject-matter of this action has been adjudicated and determined against the respondent by a United States circuit court cannot be presented for the first time in this court by the presentation of the proceedings and judgment of said court, where it appears that, conceding said last-named judgment is paramount to that of the court below, both of said courts had jurisdiction of the subject-matter and the parties, and that, without the pendency of the action in the federal court being brought to its attention, the court below proceeded to final judgment.

8. The fact that two courts of concurrent jurisdiction render judgments antagonistic to each other, involving the same subject-matter, does not prove that the judgment of either is void, or, necessarily, that either is erroneous, but, the question being which shall prevail, the question may be raised when an attempt is made to enforce the judgment in the court below.

9. Whether the federal court had, or had not, jurisdiction, and the question as to which of the judgments referred to should prevail, not decided.

10. Where two appeals are taken in the same case,—one from the judgment, and the other from the order denying a new trial,—a judgment of this court on the appeal from the judgment, which has not been acted upon by the court below, or the parties, does not become the law of the case, so far as to affect the right or power of this court to determine any and all questions presented on the appeal from the order denying a new trial, to the extent, if necessary, of modifying the former decision. THORNTON, J., dissenting.

11. Where there are two such appeals, the whole case must be held to be under the control of this court until the whole is disposed of and the cause remanded for further proceedings in the court below. THORNTON, J., dissenting.

12. Where there is a substantial conflict of evidence, the findings of the court below will not be disturbed on the ground that such findings are not sustained by the evidence.

13. A finding that the plaintiff and defendant lived and cohabited together in a way usual with married people, and that they assumed towards each other marital rights, duties, and obligations, is not sustained by evidence that after executing a contract of marriage they secretly occupied the same bed, concealed the fact that such a contract had been executed, or that they were husband and wife, and held themselves out to the public as single and unmarried people, occupied separate dwelling places, had no common home, and in all things conducted themselves towards the public as unmarried people. THORNTON, J., dissents on ground of former adjudication.

14. The mere fact that parties who have agreed to become husband and wife thereafter have sexual intercourse is not sufficient, of itself, to show a consummation of the marriage, or that they have assumed towards each other marital rights, duties, and obligations, within the meaning of section 55 of the Civil Code. THORNTON, J., dissents on ground of former adjudication.

15. Consent to marry is not enough under section [illegible] of the Civil Code. It must be followed by solemnization or a mutual assumption of marital rights, duties, and obligations. Cohabitation is a "living together as husband and wife," and will amount to a consummation or mutual assumption of marital rights, duties, and obligations, but sexual intercourse in the manner usual with man and mistress, and without living together as husband and wife, will not amount to such consummation. THORNTON, J., dissents on ground of former adjudication.

16. Whether, giving full credit to it, the evidence proves a mutual assumption by the parties of marital rights, duties, and obligations, is a question of law, and not a question of the weight of evidence.

17. The validity of a written marriage contract otherwise valid as a consent to marry, is not affected by a covenant therein by one of the parties that the contents of the writing and its existence shall be kept secret for a certain time after its execution, unless the other party shall see fit to make it known.

18. Evidence on the part of the plaintiff that she had, long prior to any difficulty between herself and the defendant, shown to a third party what she alleged to have been a marriage contract between them, and which the defendant claimed to have been a forgery, was competent, as tending to show its genuineness.

19. A witness cannot be impeached by evidence of particular wrongful acts, nor is it proper to question the witness as to such matters on cross-examination. THORNTON, J., reserves his opinion.

20. But where such a question is asked, but no answer is required or given, no available error is committed.

21. Where a question as to a particular wrongful act is asked, and objected to, and the court states to counsel what he may ask, and he proceeds to ask further questions as directed by the court, but within the objection already made, a further objection to each of the questions so asked is not necessary to raise the question of the competency or relevancy of the evidence in this court.

22. Whether the question put is pertinent or not, the witness may decline to answer on the ground that to do so would tend to criminate him; but, where the question is not pertinent, the party introducing him may object thereto, and his objection should be sustained, whether the witness objects to answering or not. THORNTON, J., reserves his opinion.

23. The testimony of a witness as to conversations with a party to an action cannot be excluded on the ground that the witness was an attorney at law, and the communication was confidential, unless it appears that he was the attorney for the party, and the communication was made in the course of professional employment.

24. And it must appear that the communication was in fact confidential, or at least that it was so regarded at the time by the party making it.

25. The burden is upon the party seeking to suppress the evidence to show that it is within the terms of the statute relating to confidential and privileged communications.

26. The presumption is that all communications between attorney and client are confidential, but this presumption may be rebutted.

27. Where the witness has testified, and his testimony is stricken out, on motion, on the ground that the same relates to communications that were confidential, the question as to the correctness of such ruling is properly preserved by an exception thereto, and may be presented to this court by assigning the same as an error of law.

28. That a witness who has testified to a conversation is not positive that the person with whom he had such conversation was the party, but gives it as his opinion that she was, his testimony cannot be stricken out on the ground that he has not identified the person. Whether he has or not goes to the weight to be given to the evidence, and not to its competency or relevancy.

29. Where the plaintiff had testified that during a certain time she was the wife of the defendant, evidence of a statement by a third party, in her presence and hearing, during said time, that she, the plaintiff, desired to bring a suit against the defendant for breach of promise of marriage, was competent and material.

Action by Sarah Althea Sharon against William Sharon, since deceased, for a decree declaring valid an alleged marriage, by contract, without solemnization, between defendant and plaintiff; for divorce, and a share of the community property. The court below declared the contract valid, and granted the divorce and a share of the community property. From an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial, Frederick W. Sharon, as executor, appeals. For former decisions, see 7 Pac. Rep. 456, 635, 639; 8 Pac. Rep. 614, 709; 9 Pac. Rep. 187; 16 Pac. Rep. 345.

Wm. F. Herrin and S. M. Wilson, for appellant. D. S. Terry, J. G. Maguire, and W. T. Baggett, for respondent.

Works, J. This action has been before this court on an appeal from the judgment. The findings were held to support the judgment, and the judgment was affirmed. Sharon v. Sharon, 75 Cal. 1, 16 Pac. Rep. 345. The present appeal is from the order denying a new trial, and presents for our consideration, in addition to errors alleged to have occurred during the trial, the question whether the findings of the court below, on the main issues in the case, are supported by the evidence. Preliminary to these questions arising on the merits, we are called upon by both the respondent and the appellant to determine certain objections to the consideration of the case. The respondent contends that the statement on motion for a new trial, as it appears in the transcript, was not properly made up and authenticated, and on that ground moves to strike out what purports to be such statement. She also moves to strike out certain parts of the transcript, purporting to be a part of the statement, on the ground that such parts are not included in the statement as certified by the judge of the court below. The objection most relied upon in respect to these motions is that certain exhibits used in evidence do not appear in the body of the statement, but are referred to therein, and included in what may be called an appendix, following the authentication of the judge, and mainly in a separate volume of the record. The record in this cause consists of five large volumes in no way connected with each other or identified as belonging to the same action except by the number and title of the case, and the consecutive numbers of the volumes and pages. The certificate of the judge to the statement appears in volume 3 of the transcript, and is as follows: "The foregoing statement on motion for a new trial has been settled and allowed by me and is correct." In the body of the statement certain exhibits are referred to as follows: "Plaintiff's Exhibit No. —, [giving the number,] see end of statement." Immediately following the authentication of the statement by the judge are certain exhibits preceded by the following statement: "The following are the exhibits offered and read in evidence on behalf of the plaintiff, and mentioned and referred to in the foregoing statement," "Plaintiff's Exhibit No. 1," followed by such exhibit in full; and so on with the others in their order, as referred to in the statement, where introduced in evidence. The point made is that the exhibits appear by the statement to have been a part of the evidence in the case; that the reference to them in the manner above stated does not make them a part of the statement; and that, therefore, the statement is a mere "skeleton," and the whole of it should be stricken out. In support of this contention counsel cite Kimball v. Semple, 31 Cal. 657; People v. Bartlett, 40 Cal. 146; Bush v. Taylor, 45 Cal. 112; Thompson v. Patterson, 54 Cal. 542. The case of Kimball v. Semple differs materially from the one at bar. There the court said: "This statement, however, is but a skeleton statement. It states, for example, that certain patents, deeds, etc., were introduced in evidence, and then says: '(here insert patent,)' '(here insert deed,)' '(here insert all of deed except acknowledgment,)' '(here insert descriptive part of deed and conditions,)' etc.; but the transcript does not contain the deeds, patents, descriptive portions," etc. The transcript before us does not call for the exhibits by a mere "here insert," and then omit them. They are called for by reference to them by their numbers, and to the place where they will be found at the end of the statement. Instead of being omitted they are found in the transcript at the place referred to. The other cases cited are to the same effect as Kimball v. Semple, and do not support the objection made. The documents referred to are set out in the statement. The reference to them in the body of the statement, and the introductory matter preceding such exhibits, where they appear at the end of the statement, are amply sufficient to identify them.

But it is further contended that the authentication of the judge precedes these exhibits, and that, as he only certifies to the correctness of the "foregoing" statement, they are not covered by his certificate, and are not, for that reason, authenticated at all. There might be some force in this position if it were not for the fact that the "foregoing" calls these exhibits into, and makes them a part of, the statement. But, as they are so brought into it, it is wholly immaterial whether the exhibits precede or come after the judge's certificate. Kirstein v. Madden, 38 Cal. 160. It is further claimed that a part of these exhibits do not appear in the transcript, either in the body of the statement, or in what we have called the "appendix." If they do not, the remedy of the respondent was to suggest a diminution of the record, and have them brought up. They appear to have been made a part of the statement, but do not appear in the transcript. In the case of Kimball v. Semple, supra, cited and relied upon by the respondent, this court said: "Some portions of the record may be accidentally omitted, or some error made, and not discovered till after the transcript is filed. Such accidental omissions may be corrected on suggestion of diminution of the record, in pursuance of rule 12. But when a diminution of the record has been suggested, and an order directing the clerk to certify up the part desired, it is still the duty of the appellant to see the order complied with." This court will not entertain a motion to strike out the entire statement because of the omission to insert in the transcript and bring up some paper called for and made a part of such statement, until the proper steps have been taken to have the paper certified up by the clerk of the court below.

In respect to certain depositions, they are called for as follows: "(Here insert the deposition of C. D. Cushman.)" The deposition is not inserted at this place, but does appear in another place in the record, viz., with the exhibits at the end of the statement, and is there identified as "Deposition of C. D. Cushman." Unlike the exhibits, it

.s not referred to as being set out at this place. But we think the respondent has effectually estopped herself to object to the statement on this ground. If the statement did not contain the evidence necessary to present the questions relied upon properly, the time to make the objection was at the settlement of the statement. Not only did she fail to raise the question of the sufficiency of the statement in this respect, but her then attorneys indorsed upon it: "The foregoing statement agreed to by us." Two objections were then made to the settlement of the statement, not affecting its form; the first being that the court had no jurisdiction, for the reason that an appeal had already been taken from the judgment; and the second, that the same was not prepared and served within the time allowed by law. In this condition of the record the respondent cannot be heard to question the sufficiency of the statement as a whole, conceding that the deposition was omitted entirely.

The motion to strike out parts of the record goes to the exhibits and depositions above referred to, and is based upon the ground that such papers are not properly authenticated. To sustain this motion would be a convenient and easy way of disposing of the case. It would take out of the statement evidence absolutely necessary to sustain the findings in favor of the respondent, and compel us to reverse the case on that ground. The respondent could not properly complain of the court for making this disposition of her case, at the instance of her own attorneys, but we are firmly convinced that the motion is not maintainable, and must be overruled.

As to the exhibits, we have shown above that they are so referred to and made parts of the statement as to bring them under the judge's certificate. Therefore they are properly authenticated. So far as the motion goes to certain affidavits, used in support of the motion for a new trial, the appellant has furnished us with the judge's certificate, authenticating the affidavits used by the appellant, and he admitted at the argument that the affidavits purporting to have been used by the respondent in opposition to the motion are the affidavits actually used by her, which disposes of that part of the motion. As to the depositions, they were a part of the files in the case, and we think, in addition to what is said above with reference to them, that they were properly called for in the statement by a "here insert," and, if not in the proper place in the transcript, they could be brought up by an order of this court. Papers on file with the clerk may be called for by a mere reference, and afterwards inserted. Darst v. Rush, 14 Cal. 83; Connor v. Morris, 23 Cal. 450. Besides, there appears in the transcript this stipulation, signed by the attorneys for both parties: "It is hereby stipulated and agreed by and between the respective parties hereto that the whole or any portions of the depositions on file in this case, which were used on the trial thereof, may be read and referred to on the hearing of defendant's motion for a new trial herein as part of the foregoing statement, and that the whole of said depositions, or the portions so read or referred to, shall be printed in the transcript on appeal from the order refusing or granting a new trial herein, and shall form a part of defendant's statement on motion for new trial or on appeal." This stipulation must be held to be a waiver of the strict requirements of the statute with respect to the manner of setting out these depositions in the statement, if the statute had not been complied with.

This action is for a decree declaring valid an alleged marriage by contract, without solemnization, between the deceased, William Sharon, and the respondent, for a divorce, and for a division of the community property. The mariage alleged was by a written contract, which the plaintiff claimed to have been genuine. The deceased, on the contrary, maintained the alleged contract to be a forgery. The court below determined that the contract was valid, rendered a decree so declaring, and granting the respondent a divorce and a share of the community property. The defendant moved for a new trial, which was denied, and it is from this order denying a new trial that the executor is prosecuting this appeal.

Shortly before the commencement of this action the defendant commenced an action in the circuit court of the United States, Ninth circuit, district of California, against the respondent, as Sarah Althea Hill, in which he alleged, in substance, that he was a resident of the state of Nevada; that he and the respondent were both unmarried; that she was claiming to be his, the said Sharon's, lawful wife, and had assumed his name; that she was pretending that they had entered into a written contract of marriage, and did in said writing jointly do and perform all and singular the acts required by section 55 of the Civil Code of the state of California to constitute a marriage between them, and thereby became, and had ever since been, husband and wife according to the laws of the state of California; that said claims and pretensions were false and maliciously made by her for the purpose of injuring him, the said Sharon, in his property, his business, and his social relations, for the purpose of obtaining credit by the use of his name with merchants and others, and thereby compelling him to maintain her, and for the purpose of harassing him into the payment of large sums of money to quiet her said false pretensions, and for the purpose of harassing and injuring his estate and his true heirs at law and next of kin in the event of his death, and of compelling his heirs at law and legatees to pay her large sums of money to quiet her false and fraudulent claims and pretensions; that the respondent was not, and never had been, the wife of him, the said Sharon, by a solemnization of marriage, contract, declaration in writing, or otherwise; that they did not, on the day and year alleged, or at any other time, at the place alleged or elsewhere, jointly or otherwise, make in writing or otherwise, the said alleged written contract of marriage; that the respondent claimed to have in her possession said written contract of marriage, executed as above stated, but that the instrument held by her, and claimed to be such contract, was false, forged, counterfeit, and fraudulent; that he never made or signed the same or any part thereof, and that the same was null and void as against him, and ought in equity and good conscience to be so declared, and ordered to be delivered up to be annulled and canceled. The substance of the prayer of the bill was that it be adjudged and decreed that the said Sarah Althea Hill was not, and never had been, the wife of the said Sharon; and that they did not make the said joint declaration of marriage, or any marriage between them; and that she be perpetually enjoined from making said allegations, representations, and pretensions of marriage with him; and that said false and forged contract of marriage be decreed and adjudged to be false, fraudulent, and forged, and to be delivered up to be canceled and annuled. There was an answer traversing the material allegations of the bill, and alleging the pendency of this action in the court below. By a supplemental answer it was shown that the court below had in this action, since the filing of the defendant's answer, filed its findings and decree, wherein it was adjudged that the agreement sought to be canceled in that suit was a genuine contract of marriage between the parties, and that said parties became, by reason of said contract, and other matters, and were, husband and wife. The circuit court, upon a full hearing of said cause on its merits, entered a decree in favor of the complainant therein, declaring that said pretended declaration of marriage was never executed by said parties, and that the same was false, counterfeited, fabricated, forged, and fraudulent, and as such was utterly null and void, and that the same be delivered up to the clerk of said court to be canceled. Said decree also contained the following: "And it is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the respondent herein, Sarah Althea Hill, her heirs, assigns, executors, administrators, and all persons claiming any interest thereunder by or through said respondent and her and their agents and attorneys, be, and they and each and all of them are, hereby perpetually enjoined from alleging the genuineness or the validity of said instrument, and from making any use of the same in evidence or otherwise to support any right claimed under it, or making any claim, or setting up any right, interest, or claim of any kind under or by virtue of said instrument or declaration of marriage, either as wife of complainant, or for any interest in property, or right of any kind or nature against said complainant, his heirs, executors, administrators, or successors in interest, and that complainant recover his costs of suit." See Sharon v. Hill, 11 Sawy. 290, 26 Fed. Rep. 337; Sharon v. Terry, 36 Fed. Rep. 337. This decree was rendered subsequent to the decree of the court below, and has since been revived in the name of the personal representatives of the said William Sharon, now deceased. Sharon v. Terry, supra. In conformity to said decree above mentioned, a writ of injunction has issued out of the circuit court enjoining the respondent, in the language of said decree, from in any way using or asserting any rights under said pretended marriage contract.

The appellant has filed in this court these proceedings in the United States court as a bar to the respondent's rights under the judgment in the court below, and by virtue thereof asks this court to declare the marriage contract a forgery, and give effect to the decree of said United States court. The kind of judgment to be entered by this court to give effect to said last-named decree is not pointed out in the brief of the learned counsel for the appellant. They assert with confidence that they are entitled to some relief, but what it shall be is left to the court to find out. The point made and relied upon by the appellant as to this branch of his case is that the court below, and the federal court, had equal and concurrent jurisdiction of the subject-matter and of the parties; that the contract declared to be invalid by the federal court is the basis and foundation of the respondent's action now before us, and that the federal court having first taken cognizance of the case, its judgment must prevail over that of the state court, in which the action was commenced at a later day, no matter in which court final decree was first rendered. This presents for our consideration the somewhat novel and important question whether this court can, upon undisputed evidence of the facts relied upon by the appellant, step aside from the strict line of its appellate jurisdiction to adjudicate upon the effect of these conflicting decrees. The general rule undoubtedly is that this cannot be done. This is conceded by counsel for appellant, but they contend that there are exceptions to the rule, and that in extraordinary cases where, but for the right of an appellate court to look beyond the record on appeal, great wrong and injustice must result, the court will exercise such right. There are cases which give countenance to this contention, and in which appellate courts have, in furtherance of justice, considered matters dehors the record, and acted upon them. Poole v. Seney, 70 Iowa, 275, 24 N. W. Rep. 520, and 30 N. W. Rep. 634; Waldron v. Ely, 2 N. J. Law, 79; Steelman v. Ackley, Id. 165; Anderson v. Radley, 4 N. J. Law, 1034; Dakota Co. v. Glidden, 113 U. S. 222, 226, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 428; The Peggy, 1 Cranch, 103, 109; U. S. v. Preston, 3 Pet. 57; Yeaton v. U. S., 5 Cranch, 281; Smith's Com. §§ 772, 774; Com. v. Duane, 1 Bin. 601, 608. But a careful examination of these cases discloses the fact that the matters brought to the attention of the appellate courts show, beyond controversy, either that the judgments appealed from were invalid or erroneous, and that in case such matters were disregarded by the courts, the parties contending against the judgments appealed from must be left without any remedy if the same should be affirmed. These cases differ materially from the case at bar in both these respects. If this court should consider the offered evidence, and give it all the weight that is claimed for it by the appellant, it would not prove either that the order appealed from is erroneous, or that the judgment rendered by the court below is invalid. The case, as presented by the record on appeal and the offered evidence, is simply this: Conceding that the subject-matter of the two actions was the same, and that the federal court had jurisdiction in the premises,—both of which the respondent denies,—here are two courts of concurrent jurisdiction, both of which have assumed and are exercising jurisdiction over the same subject-matter and the same parties. The federal court has first taken jurisdiction, but this fact is not called to the attention of the state court in any legal way, and it proceeds to final judgment. Subsequently the federal court renders a judgment contrary to and in direct conflict with that of the state court. Does this prove that the judgment of the state court is either void or erroneous? Not so. But, as a matter of public policy, one or the other of these conflicting judgments must be held to prevail over the other, whether right or wrong; which one, is not for us to say. Both of the judgments may be valid, and, as they may have been rendered upon different evidence, it may be that neither of them is erroneous. It is purely and solely a question, therefore, as to which one of them shall prevail over the other, and this is a question that cannot be determined on this appeal.

The appellant is not without his remedy. If the order appealed from should be affirmed, and an attempt be made to enforce it upon the remittitur of this court being set down, the question as to the force and effect of the two judgments could then be determined by a direct proceeding for that purpose.

We do not regard it as at all necessary to extend this necessarily long opinion by attempting to review and distinguish the above cases cited by counsel, except in the general way above stated. We are quite clear that they do not cover this case.

Counsel have argued at great length the question whether the federal court had jurisdiction in the action before it, and as to the effect of the conflict in the jurisdiction and final judgments of the two courts; but the conclusion we have reached renders it unnecessary for us to consider these questions.

Before passing to an examination of the questions directly presented by the record, it may be well to consider and determine what effect the decision of this court on the appeal from the judgment has upon the present appeal. It is contended by the respondent that so far as the question as to what is necessary to constitute a valid marriage is concerned, the decision on the former appeal has become the law of the case, and couclnsively binding upon this court, as well as upon the parties to the action. In view of this contention it may be important to ascertain definitely what was actually decided on the former appeal. As to the acts and conduct of the parties tending to show a valid marriage, the court below found:

"(2) That on the 25th day of August, A. D. 1880, the plaintiff and defendant each signed a certain declaration of marriage in the words and figures following, to-wit:

"'In the city and county of San Francisco, state of California, on the 25th day of August, A. D. 1880, I, Sarah Althea Hill, of the city and county of San Francisco, state of California, aged 27 years, do here, in the presence of Almighty God, take Senator William Sharon, of the state of Nevada, to be my lawful and wedded husband, and do here acknowledge and declare myself to be the wife of Senator William Sharon of the state of Nevada. SARAH ALTHEA HILL.'

"'August 25, 1880, San Francisco, Cal. I agree not to make known the contents of this paper, or its existence, for two years, unless Mr. Sharon himself see fit to make it known. S. A. HILL.'

"'In the city and county of San Francisco, state of California, on the 25th day of August, A. D. 1880, I, Senator William Sharon, of the state of Nevada, aged 60 years, do here, in the presence of Almighty God, take Sarah Althea Hill, of the city of San Francisco, California, to be my lawful and wedded wife, do here acknowledge myself to be the husband of Sarah Althea Hill. WILLIAM SHARON, Nevada. August 25, 1880.'

"Which was the only written declaration, contract, or agreement, of marriage ever entered into between said parties; and at the time of signing said declaration plaintiff and defendant mutually agreed to take each other, as, and henceforth to be to each other, husband and wife.

"(3) That afterwards and about the —— day of September, 1880, the plaintiff and defendant commenced living and cohabiting together in the way usual with married people, although their cohabitation was kept secret, and so continued for the space of more than one year, and down to the 25th day of November, 1881, and during all of said time the plaintiff and defendant mutually assumed towards each other marital rights, duties, and obligations.

"(4) That during the time plaintiff and defendant so lived together, defendant visited her relations with her, escorted her to places of amusement, and introduced her to respectable families, and to members of his own family, and wrote to her several letters while absent from her, in which he addressed her as 'My Dear Wife.'

"(5) From the foregoing facts the court finds that plaintiff and defendant intermarried in August, 1880, and that the allegations of paragraphs 2 and 3 of the complaint as to the fact of marriage are true, except in so far as the declaration therein referred to is alleged to be in compliance with section 75 of the Civil Code of this state."

These findings were binding on this court, on the appeal from the judgment, the evidence not being in the record.

Three material facts were distinctly found in favor of the respondent: First, the execution of the contract; second, that the plaintiff and defendant, after the execution of the contract, commenced living together in the way usual with married people; third, that they mutually assumed towards each other marital rights, duties, and obligations. These findings completely covered the requirements of section 55 of the Civil Code, which provides: "Marriage is a personal relation arising out of a civil contract, to which the consent of parties capable of making it is necessary. Consent alone will not constitute marriage; it must be followed by a solemnization, or by a mutual assumption of marital rights, duties, or obligations." But the court found one fact favorable to the defendant, viz., that their cohabitation was kept secret, and so continued for more than one year. Therefore the sole and only question presented to this court for decision on the appeal from the judgment was whether or not, assuming that every act necessary to constitute a valid marriage had been done by the parties, the fact that one or more of those necessary requirements of the statute had been kept secret would nullify the same, and render the same invalid. This is clearly demonstrated by some of the language of the prevailing opinion in the case, in which it is said: "The court below found as facts that during a certain period after the consent to marry 'the plaintiff and defendant lived and cohabited in the way usual with married people, * * * and mutually assumed towards each other marital rights, duties, and obligations.' If, as we have said, they might mutually assume marital rights and duties, although their relation was kept secret, the insertion of the words 'towards each other' does not vitiate the finding, and the finding of facts is conclusive on this appeal." 75 Cal. 36, 16 Pac. Rep. 361. Also the following: "Our conclusion is that the provision of the Code requiring a mutual assumption of marital rights and duties to follow consent does not make it indispensable to the validity of the marriage that the relation between the parties shall be made public. The section of the Code does not purport to require it. The policy of the common law does not demand it, and the policy of the common law has not been changed by statutory enactment." 75 Cal. 37, 16 Pac. Rep. 361. Also in the concurring opinion of Mr. Justice TEMPLE: "Persons capable of marriage consented to present marriage. Thereafter they cohabited in the way usual with married persons for more than one year, during which time they mutually assumed towards each other marital rights, duties, and obligations. The cohabitation and supposed marriage was, however, kept a secret, pursuant to an agreement in writing, made at the time of the mutual consent to present marriage." 75 Cal. 49, 16 Pac. Rep. 367. Doubtless much was said in the opinions on that appeal that was unnecessary to a decision of the question presented, but the point raised was clearly defined and cannot be misunderstood. We have said this much in order to show that nothing was then decided that can in any way interfere with or prevent a full and fair consideration of the questions presented by this appeal.

The decision there was that the findings supported the judgment. The main question presented here is whether or not the findings are sustained by the evidence. In other words, is the evidence sufficient to show that the parties did execute the contract, live and cohabit together in the way usual with married people, and mutually assume towards each other marital rights, duties, and obligations? And in the consideration of these questions of fact, as we shall see further on, the fact of secrecy, found by the court below, must become a most important element in determining whether their cohabitation was such as is usual with married people, and whether they did mutually assume towards each other marital rights, duties, and obligations. But lest a discussion of the questions arising here may result in a conflict between the former decision and the present one, we prefer to meet and decide the question whether the doctrine that a decision once made in an action is forever after the law of the case is applicable to this case in its present status. In support of the contention that the former decision is binding upon us here, counsel for respondent say: "The validity of the contract of marriage set forth in the findings was directly involved in, and directly adjudicated on, that appeal, and no question concerning its validity can now or hereafter be agitated in this court;" and cite as supporting this position: Gwinn v. Hamilton, 75 Cal. 265, 17 Pac. Rep. 212; Reclamation Dist. v. Goldman, 65 Cal. 636, 4 Pac. Rep. 676; Clary v. Hoagland, 6 Cal. 685; Davidson v. Dallas, 15 Cal. 75; Mulford v. Estudillo, 32 Cal. 131; Jaffe v. Skae, 48 Cal. 540; Donner v. Palmer, 51 Cal. 636; Megerle v. Ashe, 47 Cal. 632; Heinlen v. Martin, 59 Cal. 181; Doyle's Estate, 73 Cal. 570, 15 Pac. Rep. 125. We have shown above that counsel are mistaken in their statement that the former decision directly adjudicated upon the validity of the contract of marriage, as now presented. It did determine the validity of the contract as presented by the findings of the court below. The authorities cited sustain the general and well-established rule that a question presented and decided by an appellate court becomes thereafter the law of the case, and a guide in all subsequent proceedings therein, and that the rule is binding on the appellate court if the case again comes before it after having gone down to the lower court for further proceedings, the facts on the second appeal being the same as on the first. The reason of the rule is apparent. This court having declared the law, and the parties and the court below having acted upon it, as a matter of policy the law, as thus declared and acted upon, whether right or wrong, cannot afterwards be changed. But for this salutary rule litigation might go on indefinitely to the great detriment, not only of the parties concerned, but of the public. But we are clear that the reason of the rule does not apply here, and that where the reason does not exist the rule itself is not applicable. The law of this state permits two appeals in the same case,—one from the judgment, and the other from the order denying a new trial. Both of these appeals have a direct effect on the judgment, and, if successful, may vacate it entirely or modify it, as the court may determine. These appeals may both be prosecuted and be pending in this court at the same time, as was the case here until the appeal from the judgment was disposed of. The fact that this court has declared a rule of law in deciding the appeal first reached for decision, and upon which no action has or can be taken until the second appeal is also disposed of, cannot, by reason of the rule invoked by the respondent, prevent the court from fully investigating and deciding the second appeal to the extent of modifying or wholly changing its former decision, if it be satisfied that an error has been committed. The case must be regarded as within the control of this court until both appeals are determined. See, as bearing on the point that the disposition of one of the appeals allowed by the statute does not affect the rights of the party under the other, Fulton v. Hanna, 40 Cal. 278; Walden v. Murdock, 23 Cal. 548; McDonald v. McConkey, 57 Cal. 325. The rule has no application where the facts presented on the second appeal are materially different from those on which the decision was rendered. Nieto v. Carpenter, 21 Cal. 454; Meeks v. Railroad Co., 56 Cal. 513; Cross v. Zellerbach, 63 Cal. 623; Dodge v. Gaylord, 53 Ind. 365.

We come now to an examination of the points made by the appellant on the merits. The first point is that the finding that the alleged marriage contract was executed by the defendant is not sustained by the evidence. There is direct and positive evidence in support of this finding, which brings the case clearly within the well-established rule that where there is a substantial conflict in the evidence this court will not disturb the finding. The second point is that the evidence does not sustain the finding that "the plaintiff and defendant commenced living and cohabiting together in the way usual with married people, although their cohabitation was kept secret, and so continued for the space of more than one year," and that "during all of said time the plaintiff and defendant mutually assumed towards each other marital rights, duties, and obligations." Both of these branches of the finding complained of will be examined together; and, in order to consider the evidence, and apply the law thereto in such way as to be understood, it becomes absolutely necessary to set out the material facts which the evidence in favor of the respondent tends to prove, and a part of the evidence itself, which might otherwise be profitably omitted.

The alleged marriage contract bears date August 25, 1880, and the respondent claims that it was executed as of that date. The contract itself contains a stipulation on the part of the respondent that she will keep its contents a secret for two years. Giving full faith and credit to the respondent's evidence in support of these findings, it appears that the contract was written by her at the dictation of Mr. Sharon, and signed by them; that, upon the contract being signed, they immediately separated, she going to the Galindo hotel in Oakland, and he to Virginia City, Nev. Soon after, and before Mr. Sharon's return, the Galindo hotel was destroyed by fire, and the respondent removed to the Baldwin hotel in San Francisco. It does not appear that there was any communication between the parties during his absence at Virginia City. He returned a few days before the 25th of September, which was just after the respondent had removed to the Baldwin. On the 25th of September he wrote her several notes, sent by a private messenger. They were as follows:

"My Dear Allie: Can you see me in the parlor of the Grand at five o'clock? Want to put you on your guard about some matters. Answer. Yours, WILLIAM SHARON. Monday, September 25, 1880."

"Palace Hotel, San Francisco, September 25, 1880. My dear Miss Hill: Can you meet me this evening, say about 5 o'clock, in parlor of the Grand Hotel? Something I want to tell you about of interest to yourself. Will not do to meet you at the Baldwin, so if you cannot see me at the Grand, name a place and hour. Very truly, WM. SHARON."

"Palace Hotel, San Francisco, September 25, 1880. My Dear Allie: There are reasons why I should not call. But as we have tried to meet, and failed, will call in twenty minutes after you get this, and explain. Yours, W. SHARON. Will call at your room."

The respondent testifies that he had called to see her before the 25th, when these different letters were written, "nearly every evening and every afternoon; he was there constantly;" that upon his visit after sending the last above note he said there was no use talking, she must leave the Baldwin, and go either to the Palace or the Grand; that his coming there, and being with her so much, created a good deal of comment; that some parties were going to attempt to put up a job on them, so as to expose them, and he would have to come out and acknowledge the marriage. He accordingly gave her a letter to Mr. Thorn of the Grand, as follows:

"My Dear Sir: The bearer, Miss Hill, a particular friend of mine, and a lady of unblemished character, and of good family, may want rooms. Give her the best, and as cheap as you can, and oblige, WM. SHARON. Sep. 25th, 1880."

She accordingly took rooms at the Grand. Mr. Sharon, she says, was away a good deal of the time following, but when in the city he had rooms at the Palace Hotel, and she at the Grand. He paid for the furniture to furnish her room, and money with which to pay her expenses, amounting to $500 a month, as agreed upon, between them. She visited him at his rooms, sometimes taking meals with him there, sometimes spending the evening or the night with him. She at one time, when he came down from Virginia City, gave a musical for him at her rooms, to which a number of persons were invited and were present. Whether the guests knew the musical was given for him or not does not appear. She at one time went with him to his place at Belmont, near the city, taking a lady friend with her, she says, for the reason that "I did not care to go down alone, as it was not known that we were married." She visited Belmont at several different times subsequently, but always in company with others; never with him alone. At some of those times, she says, she went to assist him in entertaining company. The following are some of his invitations to her to take meals with him:

"My Dear A.: Come and take dinner. Answer."

"Miss H.: Have ordered a nice dinner, and have a sample bottle of wine I want you to try."

"My dear Allie: Come over and join me in a nice bottle of champagne, and let us all be gay before Christmas. December 21, 1880."

She was invited to and attended a general reception given at the marriage of his daughter, and was given blank invitations by him to fill up and send to her friends.

She testifies in general terms: "During the fall of 1880, down to the time Mr. Sharon went east, I spent my nights with Mr. Sharon in his own apartments at the Palace Hotel. I used to go everywhere with Mr. Sharon. He scarcely went anywhere that I did not go with him; either riding or driving, or attending to business, or going to Oakland on business, that he did not take me with him." He frequently introduced her to friends and acquaintances, but always as Miss Hill. The court below found that he "never introduced her as his wife, nor spoke to her as such in the presence of other persons." There were certain letters purporting to be from him to the respondent, and which she says were written by him, addressed, "My Dear Wife." They were as follows:

"My Dear Wife: In reply to your kind letter I have written Mr. Thorn, and inclosed same to you, which you can read, and then send it to him in an envelope, and he will not know that you have seen it. Sorry that anything should occur to annoy you, and think my letter will command the kind courtesy you deserve. Am having a very lively and hard fight. But think I shall be victorious in the end. With kindest consideration, believe me, as ever, WM. SHARON."

"My dear Wife: Inclosed find $310 to pay bills with, etc. W. S. August 29, 1881."

"My Dear Wife: Inclosed send you by Ki the balance, $250, which I hope will make you very happy. Will call this evening for the joke. Yours, S. April 1st."

"Palace Hotel, San Francisco, October 3, 1881. My Dear Wife: Inclosed $550, which will pay expenses till I get better. Will then talk about your eastern trip. Am much better to-day; hope to be up in three or four days. Truly, S."

About the 24th of August these parties began to have difficulty. He charged her with having abstracted some of his papers, which she denied; and she testifies he demanded her signature to a paper to the effect that she was not Mrs. Sharon, and agreeing to pay her $500 a month for life, which she refused to sign. She was then turned out of the rooms at the Grand Hotel, under instructions from him. This was in December of 1881. In connection with her removal from the hotel she wrote the following letters to him, which throw light upon the relations the parties then bore to each other:

"My Dear Mr. Sharon: I have written you two letters and received no reply, excepting to hear that they have been read & commented upon by others than yourself. I also hear you said you were told that I said I could and would give you trouble. Be too much of a man to listen to such talk, or allow it to give you one moment's thought. I have never said such a thing, or have I had such a thought. If no woman ever makes you any trouble until I do, you will go down to your grave without the slightest care. No, Mr. Sharon, you have been kind to me. I have said I hope my God may forsake me when I seise to show my gratitude, & I repeat it, I would not harm one hair of your dear old head, or have you turn one restless night upon your pillow through any act of mine. If you are laboring under a mistake, and not bringing the acquisition for the purpose of quarreling with me, the time will come when you will find out how you have wronged me, & I believe you too much of a man at heart not to send for me & acknowledge it to me. But in your anger you are going to the extreme. I have no way of proving to you my innocence, but God knows I am innocent, as much so as your own daughter, who is now in England. But when I say you are going to the extreme, I mean by calling Thorn or any of your relatives or outsiders, and letting them know of your anger—it simply gives them an opportunity of saying ill-natured things of me, which are unnecessary. Mr. Sharon, I have never wronged you by word or act, and were I to stay in this house for a thousand years I should never go near your door again until you felt willing to say to me you had spoken unjustly to me. You once said to me, 'There was no woman that could look you in the face & say, "William Sharon you have wronged me.'" If that be the case don't let me be the first to utter the cry. I had hoped to always have your friendship & best will throughout life, and always have your good advice to guide me, & this unexpected outburst & uncalled-for actions was undeserved. If you would only look at how absurd and ridiculous the whole thing is, you surely would act with more reason. Why should I do such a thing? What was I to gain by doing so? Pray give me credit for some little sense. I valued your friendship more than all the world. Have I not given up everything and everybody for it, & one million of dollars would not have tempted me to have risked its loss. I feel humiliated to death that Thorn or any one else could have it to say I was ordered out of the house. I have a world of pride, & I ask you to at least show me the respect to let Thorn have nothing more to say or do in the affair. I have always been kind to you, & tried to do whatever I could to please you, & I hope at least in your unjust anger you will let us apparently part friends, & don't do or say anything that could create or make any gossip. Think how you would like one of your daughters treated so. If you have any orders to give or wish to make known, make them known in any other way than through your relatives, or through Thorn. Don't fight me. I have no desire or wish to in any way be unkind to you. I have said nothing to any one about the letter I have received, nor do I wish to even speak to Thorn on the subject. You have placed me in a strange position, senator, & all the pride in me rebels against speaking upon the subject. I have been looking at some very nice places, but I cannot get them until some time during the coming month. If you still desire me to go away, make it known to me, & I will obey you. As ever, A."

"Palace Hotel, San Francisco, ——, 188–. My Dear Mr. Sharon: I cannot see how you can have any one treat me so—I, who have always been so good and kind to you—the carpet is all taken up in my hall—the door is taken off and away—and it does seem to me terrible that it is you who would have done—I met Mr. Thorn in the hall as I started to come over to see you, and asked him if you had order such a thing done—& he said that I must move out; that it was your wish—I told him that I had written you a note when I received his, and told you if you wished me to go to send me word—for it was not convenient to get the place I wanted until some time in this month—he said that you had told him to see that I went—so I said no more, but came over to see you—Ah, Senator, dear Senator, do not treat me so —whilst every one else is so happy for Christmas, don't try to make mine miserable—remember this time last year—you have always been so good, don't act so—now—let me see you and talk to you—let me come in after Ki has gone, if you wish—& be to me the same Senator again—don't be cross to me—please don't—or may I see you, if only for a few minutes—be reasonable with me, and don't be unjust—you know you are all I have in the world—& a year ago you asked me to come to the Grand—don't do things now that will make talk—you know you can find no fault with me—may I see you for a few minutes, & let us talk reasonably about all this—I know you will —I know it is not in your nature to be so hard to one that has been so much to you —don't be unjust—Say I may see you.—"

"Mr. Sharon: I received a letter from Mr. Thorn in regard to my room. Of course I understand it is written by your orders, for no human being can say aught of me except with regard to yourself. Now, Mr. Sharon, you are wronging me; so help me God, you are wronging me. I am no more guilty of what you have accused me than some one who never saw you; and would you, who asked me to come to this house, whom I have been up with nights and waited on and cared for, and would have done anything on earth to help you, be the one to wrong and injure me,—a man whom the people have placed enough confidence in his honor to put him in the United States senate, to stoop to injure a girl, and one whom he has professed to love? Is——"

From the way this letter terminates a part of it must have been missing. She took up her residence at a private house after leaving the Grand, and during the summer of 1882 they seem to have adjusted their difficulties to some extent, and she again visited him at his rooms; but there is nothing in these visits tending in any way to strengthen the respondent's case. At one time she secreted herself, and saw Sharon and another woman undress and go to bed together in his room, and afterwards told it as a laughable joke, and this at a time when she testifies she was his wife. Again, at another time, evidently when she began to think it necessary that she should have some proof of her intimacy with him, she secreted a young girl, not yet 20 years of age, and who seems to have become a kind of a confidant of hers, behind the bureau in his room to see Sharon and herself go to bed together, and hear what was said, and the girl remained there until they had retired and he had fallen asleep, and then crept out of the room.

The defendant testified positively that the relation of husband and wife never existed between him and the plaintiff; that she was his mistress, for which he agreed to and did pay her $500 a month; that the alleged marriage contract was never signed by him, and that he never addressed a letter to her as "My Dear Wife;" and there was evidence strongly tending to show that the contract and addresses to these letters were forgeries. It seems to us that this evidence shows conclusively that these parties did not live and cohabit together "in the way usual with married people." They did not live or cohabit together at all. They had their separate habitations in different hotels. Her visits to his room and his visits to hers were occasional and apparently as visitors. They had no common home or dwelling-place. This did not constitute a living together, or cohabitation. Yardley's Estate, 75 Pa. St. 207; Ohio v. Connoway, Tapp. 90. Their acts and conduct were entirely consistent with the meretricious relation of man and mistress, and almost entirely inconsistent with the relation of husband and wife. It may be said that the public manner in which he received her, and introduced her to his friends, was inconsistent with his claim that she was his mistress, and not his wife. This might be so with some men, but the record before us bears unmistakable evidence of the fact that this man had sinned so long and so openly in this respect that he did not care to conceal his wrong-doing even from his own family. Besides, it must be remembered that there was nothing openly improper in their relations, in connection with their association with other persons. She was received and treated as a mere lady friend and acquaintance, and not otherwise. That any greater intimacy existed between them than would have been proper as between friends of the opposite sex was carefully concealed from the public.

Again, it may be said that this branch of the finding was immaterial; that it was not a question whether they had lived and cohabited together in the way usual with married people, but whether or not they had mutually assumed marital rights, duties, and obligations; and, although this point is not directly made by the respondent, we are inclined to that view, except so far as it was necessary to show cohabitation, or a living together as husband and wife in order to sustain the other branch of the finding, and for that reason pass to the real question in the case, viz., whether the evidence was sufficient to sustain the finding that they "mutually assumed towards each other marital rights, duties, and obligations." The contentions of opposing counsel on this important question turn mainly upon the understanding they have as to what is necessary to constitute the mutual assumption required by the statute, and their views of the statute are radically different, and in our opinion the construction claimed by each of the parties is strained and unwarranted. The position of the appellant is that to constitute a mutual assumption of marital rights, duties, or obligations, it is not sufficient that such rights, duties, and obligations be fully and mutually assumed by the parties, as between themselves, but that they must be openly and publicly assumed. This is based on the theory that this mutual assumption is intended by the statute to take the place of a solemnization of the marriage, and must be such as to furnish evidence, on the part of third parties, who are disinterested, of the fact of marriage. We can easily conceive of a case where parties have fully assumed all of the rights, duties, and obligations of husband and wife in such way as to fill the requirements of the statute without making known the fact to the public, yet without any direct act of concealment, or any intention to conceal their true relation towards each other. For example, if a couple should consent to marriage, as the statute requires, and take up their abode in some place uninhabited as yet by others, and live openly and in good faith as husband and wife, in the way usual with married people, we are quite clear that it could not be said that because of the fact that their assumption of the rights and duties of husband and wife was unknown, the marriage should be held to be invalid. The contention of the respondent is thus expressed in her brief: "We repeat, the first mutual act, be it of sexual commerce, or the assumption of any other right, duty, or obligation, of the marital relation, after the execution of the written contract of marriage, instantly establishes the relation of husband and wife." The exigencies of her case drive her to this position. If it cannot be upheld the conclusion reached by the court below must inevitably be wrong.

Let us see to what this would lead us. It means, supposing a case, that where a couple are associated together in the meretricious relation of man and mistress, and in the habit of meeting occasionally, solely for the purpose of gratifying their passions, and, while so connected, they consent, no matter how informally, to marry, and thereafter continue to live precisely as before, the mere fact that sexual intercourse, under such circumstances, follows after the consent, amounts to a mutual assumption of marital rights, duties, and obligations, and from that time they are husband and wife. It means, therefore, that, in some cases at least, this requirement of the statute amounts to nothing. It means that a couple may consent to marry; may live precisely as if they are unmarried, and their relations meretricious; to the world they may appear to be unmarried, and their children, if they have any, appear to be bastards; if they conclude to violate their "consent" to marriage they may go their ways; that they were husband and wife cannot be proved, and their children are bastards indeed. We cannot so far reflect upon the law-making powers as to hold that such was their intention. The case before us presents the strongest possible argument against this construction. Take the respondent's statements to be true in every respect. She entered into this contract believing it constituted a legal marriage. She consented to conceal from the world her true relation to the defendant, and place herself in a position that might, and if she should be detected in the act of treating him as a wife, would, inevitably, brand her as his mistress. He could deny her, and she would be helpless, and her character would be ruined. On the other hand, such a construction would enable a designing and unprincipled woman to impose herself on a man as his wife without right and against his will. We think just such results were intended to be prevented by the statute we are considering, and that in requiring that they should assume marital rights, duties, and obligations it was clearly intended that they should so conduct themselves towards each other as to give evidence to those with whom they might come in contact that they were husband and wife.

With these general observations we notice some of the authorities relied upon by counsel. Counsel for respondent cite no authorities in favor of their position, and dismiss the question so important to their client in a general statement of their views covering three pages of their brief. The New York Code, from which ours was taken, did not contain the clause we are considering. Code, N. Y. § 34. It must be assumed, therefore, that by the change made our legislature intended to add something more to the contract of marriage than was necessary under the New York Code. Section 35 of the New York Code and section 57 of our own do not relate to what shall be necessary to constitute a valid marriage, but to the manner in which it shall be manifested and proved. Section 36 of the New York Code and section 56 of our own provide who shall be capable of marriage. It is said in the prevailing opinion on the former appeal that "consummation," as used in sections 56 and 57 of our Code, means "simply sexual intercourse, copulation, nothing more nor less." If this be conceded, it is unimportant, as section 55 does not use the term. If it had been intended to prove that mere consummation, in the sense indicated, following consent, should amount to marriage, no doubt this well-defined legal term would have been used as it was in the following sections. That it was not used is amply sufficient to show that the legislature intended that something more than mere consummation, by copulation, should be required. As to what the meaning of the language is, we quote with approval the following language in the dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice McFARLAND on the former appeal: "Again, what plainer and more obvious construction can be put upon the language in question than to say that the legislature meant by it that kind of conduct which generally, and we might say universally, characterizes married people who have assumed marital rights, duties, and obligations? The legislature must be presumed to have had that common knowledge which all people have of the familiar and habitual social customs of the country with respect to the marriage relation, and of the usual deportment of persons who have assumed that relation. Now, can it be pretended that married people usually (or at all) refuse to recognize each other as husband and wife in the presence of others; that they never speak of each other as husband and wife; that they never so live together that their residence, however humble,—though it be but a room in a garret,—is the recognized home of a family, with its usual relations and associations; that they so carefully guard their conduct that they are never reputed, or even suspected, among their acquaintances and friends to be husband and wife; that they never indulge in any deportment whatever that would intimate in the slightest way to any human being except themselves that they were married? It seems difficult for any human understanding not too much swayed by artificial distinctions and attenuated niceties to receive such conduct as an 'assumption of marital rights, duties, or obligations.' What marital rights has a woman 'assumed,' who could not even protect herself against apparent shame by asserting the honorable name of wife? What marital obligations of protection can a man fulfill towards a woman whose wifehood he publicly repudiates? And how can society enforce its rights in a relation of which it can have no knowledge, and of the existence of which it has no grounds of suspicion? And what of the children, if any, of such a marriage? Is there to be no one whom they can call 'father' or 'mother?' And what possible protection could there be against fraudulent pretenses of marriages, made, perhaps, for the first time after the deaths of alleged husbands or wives?"

We may gather from common-law rules and the decisions of the courts of other countries and states some idea as to what has been regarded as requisite to a valid marriage, but the language of our Code is peculiar, and stands alone. Whatever may have been the common-law rule on the subject, the express language of the Code must control, if we can ascertain its meaning. But certainly, if consent and consummation by sexual intercourse were sufficient to constitute marriage at common law, it clearly appears to have been the intention of our legislature to change that rule, and require something more. But where proof of marriage depends on the conduct of the parties towards each other, authorities are ample to show that the evidence in this case was wholly insufficient to prove such marriage. Cohabitation, which is evidence of the assumption of marital rights, duties, or obligations, must be a "living together as husband and wife." Cannon v. U. S., 116 U. S. 55, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 278; Calef v. Calef, 54 Me. 365; Yardley's Estate, 75 Pa. St. 211; 1 Bish. Mar. & Div. § 777, and note; 3 Amer. & Eng. Cyclop. Law, 308; 2 Com. Dig. 194; Clark v. Cassidy, 64 Ga. 662; Port v. Port, 70 Ill. 488. At common law, and under statutes authorizing marriage by consent, without formal ceremony, if the parties agree presently to take each other for husband and wife, and from that time live together professedly in that relation, proof of these facts is held to be sufficient to constitute marriage. Hutchins v. Kimmell, 31 Mich. 126; Teter v. Teter, 101 Ind. 134. Certainly nothing less than this can be held to be sufficient under the latter clause of section 55. The proof of the contract is not enough. There must be evidence sufficient to show that they assumed the relations of husband and wife, which calls for the same degree of proof, if cohabitation be depended upon, as was required at common law to establish the marriage. In our judgment sexual intercourse is not necessary to the validity of a marriage of the kind we are considering. If the parties agree to marriage, and commence to dwell together, in pursuance of the contract, as husband and wife, they have assumed marital rights, duties, and obligations, and are legally married, although sexual intercourse is not had until later, or not at all. The commencement of true and open matrimonial cohabitation, under such an agreement, is a mutual assumption of marital rights, duties, and obligations, while mere copulation without such cohabitation is insufficient. The courts have used the word "consummation" generally as the completion of the marriage relation, and not necessarily as the act of sexual intercourse. Clayton v. Wardell, 4 N. Y. 238; Lewis v. Ames, 44 Tex. 341; Bashaw v. State, 1 Yerg. 193; Clark v. Cassidy, 64 Ga. 662; Newbury v. Brunswick, 2 Vt. 160; Robertson v. Cole, 12 Tex. 363. And even where a marriage per verba de future cum copula is allowed, the marriage does not become consummated by copulation unless the parties so intend, (Peck v. Peck, 12 R. I. 488; Stoltz v. Doering, 112 Ill. 234; Hebblethwaite v. Hepworth, 98 Ill. 126;) and where the fact is to be established by the conduct of the parties, under a statute like ours, the copulation must be under such circumstances as to give evidence of the fact that it is not illicit. Under our statute two things must be proved to constitute a marriage, viz., the contract and the mutual assumption of marital rights, duties, and obligations. The proof of one of these cannot establish the other. Therefore the assumption required must be proved by something more than copulation; and nothing less than cohabitation in the manner above stated will establish the necessary fact where it depends for its proof upon the acts and conduct of the parties towards each other and the public. Hebblethwaite v. Hepworth, supra. In the light of the statute and these authorities, does the evidence sustain the clause of the finding under consideration? Cohabitation is evidence from which marriage may be presumed. 1 Fras. Husb. & Wife, 391. So the presumption that parties have assumed marital rights, duties, and obligations towards each other, under the statute, may be established by like evidence. But by what stretch of judicial interpretation of the statute, upon what rule of evidence or of common sense, can it be held that parties assume a relation by uniformly and persistently denying it, or upon what principle of law or evidence can it be presumed that parties are husband and wife from evidence that they have lived as single and unmarried people, and held themselves out to the world as such? These parties had no common home or place of abode. They held themselves out to their relatives, friends, acquaintances, and the world as unmarried. The respondent never at any time assumed the name of her alleged husband. There is nothing to show that they had taken upon themselves the mutual duties and obligations of the sacred and confidential relation of husband and wife. Their private letters and notes, with the single exception of the addresses "My Dear Wife" on some of them, which are so vigorously attacked as forgeries, do not contain a single word indicating that such a relation existed between them, no mention of it, no reference to each other as husband or wife, no words of affection or endearment, nothing that one might expect to find in communications between husband and wife. But the strongest and most conclusive evidence to our minds that no such relation existed, or was supposed by the respondent to exist, is presented by her letters to him when she was about to be turned out of doors at his instance. She appeals to his friendship, but not to his love, or to his duties and obligations as a husband. She pleads her service to him as a friend, and as a nurse, but not as a wife. No claim of her right to his protection; no assertion of her rights as a wife. It is past all belief that any woman could have passed through an experience so bitter and humiliating, and allow herself to be thrust into the street by her own husband, and in her many appeals to him make no mention of the relation that existed between them. We are clear that the evidence was insufficient to sustain this finding. It is not a question of the weight of the evidence, but whether, giving full credit to it, it proves the assumption by these parties of marital rights, duties, and obligations. It is a question of law, and not of fact, and, as matter of law, we hold the evidence to have been insufficient.

The appellant contends that the court erred in allowing the respondent to prove by the witness Martha Wilson that the respondent, in October, 1880, exhibited to her the alleged marriage contract, and the conversation that occurred between them at the time with reference to it. The evidence of the existence of the paper at the early date mentioned was competent. It at least tended to show that it had not been forged subsequent to the commencement of difficulties between the parties, when the temptation to manufacture evidence would seem to have been the strongest. As to the conversation, it consisted of a statement that the respondent had requested the witness to keep secret the fact that she had seen the paper. We cannot see how the defendant could have been injured by this. The evidence that the respondent was attempting to keep the contract a secret tended to show that the writing was a forgery, rather than that it was genuine, and that the contract, if genuine, was not made in good faith, and for that reason could not amount to a sufficient basis for the alleged marriage. Therefore, the ruling was harmless. Another female witness for the defendant was asked by the plaintiff on cross-examination: "How many gentlemen have you gone with besides your husband, when your husband was not present, to the California House, and taken luncheon?" in connection with which plaintiff's counsel proposed to show "that this lady is in the habit of visiting houses that are not reputable, and a good deal more, even, than that." The question was objected to on the ground that it was irrelevant, immaterial, and incompetent. The court overruled the objection. This ruling was erroneous, and the statement of counsel in connection with it was improper. A witness cannot be impeached by evidence of particular wrongful acts, nor is it proper to question the witness with reference to such matters. Code Civil Proc. § 2051; Hinkle v. Railroad Co., 55 Cal. 627; People v. Hamblin, 68 Cal. 101, 8 Pac. Rep. 687; Com. v. Shaw, 4 Cush. 593. But the witness was not required to, and did not, answer the question, and therefore the ruling resulted in no injury. The answer of the witness, if given, might have shown that she had been guilty of no wrong or impropriety. A witness, having testified favorably to the defendant, on cross-examination by the plaintiff testified that her husband was dead; that he had left a will, of which she was the sole legatee; that he died of paralysis and softening of the brain, and that she could not tell the exact state of his mind. Whereupon the following occurred: "Question. Was he of sound mind? Did you consider him of sound mind when he made his will? Counsel for Plaintiff. I object to it on the ground that it is irrelevant and immaterial. The Court. You may ask whether, at the time he made the will, he was imbecile, and that she went into the court and said that he was of sound mind. (To which ruling defendant's counsel then and there duly excepted.) Counsel for Defendant: Q. Did you not, at the time he made that will, know that he was not in a sound and disposing mind, and able to make a will? A. When my husband made that will he was sick. Q. Did not you know when your husband made that will that he was utterly unable to take care of himself, and of weak mind, and unable to make a will? A. Yes, I did. I was the executrix and sole devisee in that will. I do not know that when that will was admitted to probate I swore that he was of sound mind. I said whatever my lawyers told me to say. I never read a single paper." This evidence could have been offered for no other purpose than to impeach or discredit the witness; and for that purpose, or any other, it was clearly incompetent and immaterial. As we have said above, a witness cannot be impeached, on cross-examination or otherwise, by proof of specific wrongful acts. The matter about which she was questioned was entirely foreign to the case, and was wholly immaterial, except to discredit the witness, and thereby break the force of her testimony. Counsel for respondent contend that the questions following the statement of the court as to what the plaintiff might ask were not objected to, and therefore no question is presented for our consideration. The first question, which was improper, was objected to. The court then stated in reply to the objection just what the plaintiff might ask, to which the defendant excepted, and the improper questions, authorized by the court in advance, were asked and answered. It was not necessary for the defendant to renew his objections to the questions, as they were asked, so long as they were within the direction of the court as to the extent to which the examination might go. Again, it is claimed that the right to refuse to answer the questions was a personal privilege of the witness, and that the questions could not be objected to by the defendant. But this point has no merit. The weight which should be given to the testimony of the witness was a question in which the defendant was interested. He had the right to object to any questions on cross-examination which tended to weaken the evidence of the witness on direct examination, and which were improper, without reference to the question whether the witness might also refuse to answer on the ground of privilege. If the questions had been pertinent the right to object to them or refuse to answer would have rested with the witness alone. Clark v. Reese, 35 Cal. 89, 95. But the question here was not pertinent, and for that reason was subject to the objection of the party.

A witness, being called for the defendant, testified that he was an attorney at law, and said further: "I know Miss Hill. I have seen her in this court-room, and I met her once before. That was a year ago, on the corner of Montgomery and California streets. She was with Mrs. Samson. I had two conversations previous to that, in the same month of March, a year ago, with Mrs. Samson. At that time Mrs. Samson introduced me to Miss Hill. She said: 'This is the lady I have spoken to you about, that desires to bring an action against Mr. Sharon for breach of promise of marriage.' Now, the plaintiff here, if this was the lady, she had a veil on. I never saw her before or since, until I came here in this court-room. Mrs. Samson said she had fifty letters. I told her three or four letters—good, square promises from old Sharon—was all I should want. She said she hadn't time to look over them, but she would in a few days; and I told her when she got ready to come into my office, and fetch the papers with her. The ladies were coming down from Montgomery street, from the north going south, on the west side of the street, and after the conversation I passed on. It was, I suppose, about 4 o'clock in the afternoon. This was in March, 1883,—about the 28th or 29th of March." And on cross-examination he testified: "I do not remember how she was dressed. She had a dark veil on at the time, and I don't swear positively that that is the woman, but I believe this is the lady. I did not see her face except through the veil. I was admitted to practice in the supreme court of this state a year and a half ago. At the time of the conversation referred to I was a lawyer. I was not her lawyer. If she had employed me instead of you, then, of course, I would have been in a different position. She employed you instead of me. * * * When Mrs. Samson introduced me to the lady, who was veiled, she said, 'This is the Miss Hill,' and I think I bowed to the lady, and the other conversations Mrs. Samson spoke about, which you didn't want to hear; and this lady said, 'Well, I have fifty letters from Mr. Sharon.' I told her all I wanted was three good, square letters that had a good, square promise. The reply that she made was that she hadn't yet looked over her letters sufficiently, but that she would come back in a few days. This is the last I saw of her. I never saw her since until I saw her here in this court-room. I cannot say that the statement that I made to her about the three letters was advice given her as a lawyer, because I was not her lawyer. Mrs. Samson brought this lady to me for the purpose of making her a client; and I had a talk with her with the understanding that she was to get these letters, select the three with the promises in them, and bring them to me. I understand it to be the duty of a lawyer to keep secret what he hears from his client, but I do not understand it is the duty of a lawyer, if he is called upon to testify in court, that he can claim his privilege as a lawyer to testify to anything he hears from anybody who is not his client and not given to him in a confidential manner. * * * I think Mrs. Samson first spoke to me about the case about the 18th or 19th of March, in front of the Nevada Bank, or somewhere along there. She asked me how I was getting along. She says, 'I have got a case for you that there is $100,000 in; do you want to make it?' I said, 'Yes.' She said, 'You will have to furnish some money. Have you got any?' I said, 'I have got $6,000 or $7,000 in this bank. If it is a legitimate case I want it.' 'Well,' says she, 'it is.' I says, 'What is it?' Says she, 'It is a breach of promise case against Mr. Sharon.' I said, 'Oh, is that all?' She said it was, and I met her again. The next time I met her she said: 'Well, what do you think of that case now?' I said, 'I never gave it a thought.' She said, 'I am going to fetch the lady down.' I said, 'All right; fetch her down.' The next time I met her was on the sidewalk in front of my office. I did not take her up into my office. I had never met Miss Hill before." The plaintiff then moved to strike out the whole of the testimony of the witness "on the ground that it was a privileged communication, and that he had no right to disclose it," and the motion was sustained, and the evidence stricken out, to which the defendant excepted. This ruling was erroneous for two reasons,—it was not shown that the witness was the attorney for the plaintiff, or that the communication was confidential, if he had been. The witness testifies positively that he was not her attorney, and the facts testified to by him show that he was not. And the communication that took place was on a public street, and in the presence of, and mostly with, a third party, and was not, for that reason, in any sense, confidential, or in the course of his employment.

The Code provides: "An attorney cannot, without the consent of his client, be examined as to any communication made by the client to him, or his advice given thereon, in the course of professional employment." Code Civil Proc. § 1881. The burden is upon the party seeking to suppress the evidence to show that it is within the terms of the statute. Earle v. Grout, 46 Vt. 113; Weeks, Attys. § 147. And it must appear that the witness learned the matter in question only as counsel, or attorney or solicitor for the party, and not in any other way, and that it was received professionally, and in the course of business. Hager v Shindler, 29 Cal. 61; George v. Silva, 68 Cal. 272, 9 Pac. Rep. 257; Hatton v. Robinson, 14 Pick. 423; Goltra v. Wolcott, 14 Ill. 90; Granger v. Warrington, 3 Gilman, 309; De Wolf v. Strader, 26 Ill. 225; Borum v. Fouts, 15 Ind. 52; Bank v. Suydam, 5 How. Pr. 254; Flack v. Neill, 26 Tex. 273. And communications made by a third person, with a view to employ the witness as an attorney for the party, are not privileged as confidential, unless it be shown that such communications were authorized to be made by the party for whom such person assumed to act. Lynde v. McGregor, 13 Allen, 178. Nor does the rule apply to conversations had between the attorney and a third party, or between the third parties in the presence of the attorney and client. Gallagher v. Williamson, 23 Cal. 333; Railway Co. v. Yeates, 67 Ala. 164; Moffatt v. Hardin, 22 S. C. 9; Levers v. Van Buskirk, 4 Pa. St. 316. The communication must be confidential, and so regarded, at least by the client, at the time. The presumption is that all communications between attorney and client, in the course of professional employment, are confidential, but this is a presumption that may be rebutted; and, if it clearly appears that the same were not intended by the client to have been confidential, they are not privileged. Hager v. Shindler, 29 Cal. 63; Gower v. Emery, 18 Me. 82. The respondent contends that there was no error in this ruling, for the reason that the witness did not positively identify her as being the person who was present at the time the conversation took place. But the witness testified that he believed her to be the person. If he was mistaken in this it could easily have been proved. But, whether it could or not, the point made goes to the weight to be given to his testimony, and not to its competency, and could not justify the order striking it out.

Again, it is urged that the question is not properly presented. Counsel say that the question submitted to the court below was a question of fact to be determined from evidence, and that, in order to present the question properly, it must have been specified in the statement that the evidence was insufficient to sustain the finding of the court that the witness was incompetent. This would be a novel practice, indeed, and one that we are not inclined to adopt. While it is true that the question of the competency of the witness was one of fact, the evidence upon which the court ruled against the testimony and struck it out appears in the record, and the question as to the correctness of the ruling is directly and properly presented by an exception to the ruling. It is further contended that the evidence was immaterial, and to strike it out worked the appellant no injury. The statement in the presence of the respondent, that she was the person who desired to bring an action against Mr. Sharon for breach of promise of marriage, was inconsistent with her claim that she was then his wife, was a declaration against her interest, and, if not true, called upon her for a denial. Having failed to deny it, the fact that such statement was made, and her failure to controvert its truth, were competent and material evidence against her.

As to the main question, whether the communication was confidential or not, counsel for respondent cite a number of cases, but they are not in conflict with the rules above stated. Some of the cases hold that communications made in contemplation of an employment, although the employment did not occur until later, or the attorney for some reason subsequently refused to accept employment, should be protected, (Young v. State, 65 Ga. 525;) and others, that it is not necessary that a fee should have been paid at the time of the communication. Cross v. Riggins, 50 Mo. 336; Bacon v. Frisbie, 80 N. Y. 394, McLellan v. Longfellow, 32 Me. 494. We do not question the correctness of these decisions, but they do not reach this case. There is no evidence here that these communications were made in contemplation of the employment of the witness, or that the respondent intended, at any time, to employ him, or to take his advice, as her attorney.

The appellant contends that the contract of marriage, conceding its execution, was void on account of the clause of secrecy contained in it. In discussing this question counsel have confounded the contract or consent required by the statute, and the other requirement that the parties shall assume marital rights, duties, and obligations. They say: "We insist that an agreement for absolute secrecy of the marriage relation is void, as contrary to good morals, within the true intent and meaning of the third subdivision of section 1667 of the Civil Code." And their whole argument proceeds upon the assumption that the agreement was to keep secret the marriage relation. It is this assumption alone that gives force to their argument. But there was in fact no agreement or stipulation in the contract that the marriage relation claimed to have existed between these parties should be kept secret. The stipulation was: "I agree not to make known the contents of this paper, or its existence, for two years, unless Mr. Sharon himself see fit to make it known." This stipulation did not in any way operate to prevent the full and open assumption by them of marital rights, duties, and obligations, nor could it prevent her from declaring that they were husband and wife. This written consent was not necessary to the validity of the marriage. Had they commenced at once to live together as husband and wife, under a verbal consent to become such, and had mutually and openly assumed marital rights, duties, and obligations, the marriage would undoubtedly have been upheld. We have decided that, decause they did not assume such rights, duties, and obligations, or, in other words, concealed and kept secret the marriage relation, there was no valid marriage, but we are quite clear that the secrecy clause in the contract, if the statute had been complied with in this respect, would not have rendered the marriage invalid, and that is the real question involved. Nor do we think it would render the contract void as a consent to marriage, if the statute in other respects had been complied with. Taking this view of the clause of secrecy, it is unnecessary for us to discuss the effect of a strictly secret marriage, which is by stipulation of the parties to be kept secret thereafter. The parties here did keep the marriage and their relation as husband and wife a secret, if there was a marriage, and for that reason we have held above that the marriage was not consummated, but the question was presented by evidence outside of the contract itself, and could not arise in any other way. Order reversed, and cause remanded.

We concur: BEATTY, C. J.; SHARPSTEIN, J.

MCFARLAND, J., (concurring.) I concur in the judgment. I also concur in all the points decided in the opinion of Mr. Justice WORKS, and in nearly everything that is said in that opinion. It is barely possible, however, that the opinion might be construed as indicating that the decision of this court on the appeal from the judgment was correct; that is, that the findings support the judgment of the court below, and that its invalidity appears only upon a review of the evidence upon this appeal from the order denying a new trial. I could not concur in that view. I am as fully convinced now as I was on the other appeal, that the findings present a case of logical felo de se, and show conclusively, on their face, that the parties did not commence "living and cohabiting together in the way usual with married people," and had not "mutually assumed towards each other marital rights, duties, and obligations." In all other respects I concur in the opinion of Mr. Justice WORKS.

THORNTON, J., (concurring.) This is an appeal by defendant from an order denying his motion for a new trial. I agree with what is said in the opinion of Justice WORKS as to the record here, except what is said with reference to certifying exhibits left out of the statement on a suggestion of diminution of the record. I do not understand that on its being made to appear that the record has been diminished by the omission to insert a part of it that this court can order certified to it anything but what is contained in the record in the court below. To constitute a part of the record the exhibits offered in evidence must be inserted in the statement. This may be done by copying them into the statement, inserting them in hæc verba, or by stating their substance or contents. The statement must be complete, must have all the evidence engrossed in it, when allowed and certified by the judge. When the exhibits are not inserted as pointed out above, they are not part of the record of the court below, whether on file or not, and cannot be brought to this court by its order on any suggestion of diminution. I have examined the statement as to the exhibits said not to be inserted in it, and find that the contents of several of them do appear in the statement. All of the exhibits referred to are "plaintiff's exhibits." Number 21 is inserted in hæc verba on p. 1199 of volume III. The contents of Exhibit 9 are stated in Cushman's deposition, which I think are properly here. It is there entitled "Exhibit C." Exhibit 23 was an invitation given by Sharon to his daughter's wedding, and the contents were stated by plaintiff in her testimony when it was produced, and marked as an exhibit. Exhibit 24 was a blank envelope which contained an invitation to Miss Sharon's wedding, which had been furnished to plaintiff. In the envelope, with the invitation, was a card "to go on a train," which had to be presented at the train. The plaintiff stated that it was such a card. Exhibit 26 is Dobinson's visiting card, so stated by the plaintiff when giving her testimony. Exhibits 51, 54, and 55 appear to be letters shown a witness, (Mrs. Shawhan,) who admitted they were in her handwriting. They were signed "1,132." Could they be material to any issue before this court? Exhibit 71, according to plaintiff's testimony, was a bill and receipt for meals furnished her from a restaurant. Exhibit 8 was a letter produced by a witness, (Cushman,) who stated that it was in the genuine handwriting of the defendant, Sharon. The engrossed statement, in the form in which it now appears in the transcript, was stipulated to be correct by the attorneys for the plaintiff, and on this statement the motion for a new trial was heard. It could not have been heard until the statement was filed, (Code Civil Proc. § 660,) and it could not have been filed until it was engrossed and certified to be correct by the judge, (Id. § 659.) This statement, as it appears here, must have been used on the motion for a new trial, and the statement so used, by the words of the statute, is to go into the record, to be used on an appeal from an order denying a new trial. Section 661, Id. I think that no exhibits at all material have been left out of the record; that those not inserted were omitted because they were regarded by the counsel for both plaintiff and defendant as immaterial.

As regards the depositions, it may be said that the stipulation of the attorneys of plaintiff on the record covers them; and plaintiff cannot object, in the face of this stipulation, to their being regarded as properly in the statement.

In passing on the questions presented by counsel in this case, it becomes necessary to determine what was determined in Sharon v. Sharon, 75 Cal. 1, 16 Pac. Rep. 345. The appeal in 75 Cal. was from the judgment, and this is an appeal from an order denying a motion for a new trial in the same case. The opinion of the court in the former appeal was drawn up by Justice MCKINSTRY and concurred in by SEARLS, C. J., and TEMPLE and PATERSON, JJ. To determine what was ruled on the former appeal we have to examine that opinion. In my judgment the following propositions were there decided to be law and applicable to the case: First. That an agreement between a man and a woman to become husband and wife, made per verba de præsenti, is not invalidated by the fact that it contains a collateral promise by one of the parties not to make the marriage known for two years, without the consent of the other. Second. That under section 55 of the Civil Code it is not necessary to the validity of a marriage, not attended by a solemnization, that the present consent to marry should be followed by a public mutual assumption of marital rights, duties, and obligations. Third. That sexual intercourse may be inferred from cohabitation; that evidence that a man and woman have had sexual intercourse, whether direct, or consisting of proof of a further fact from which the intercourse may be inferred, as cohabitation, is, when preceded by the present consent of the parties to marry, evidence that the parties have actually assumed all the duties incident to marriage. Fourth. That present consent to marry, kept secret, followed by secret cohabitation, is sufficient to constitute marriage. Near the close of the opinion it is said: "The court below found as facts that during a certain period after the consent to marry 'the plaintiff and defendant lived and cohabited in the way usual with married people, * * * and mutually assumed towards each other marital rights, duties, and obligations.' If, as we have said, they might mutually assume marital rights and duties, although their relation was kept secret, the insertion of the words 'towards each other' does not vitiate the finding, and the finding of facts is conclusive on this appeal." 75 Cal. 36, 16 Pac. Rep. 361. As summing up the ruling in the opinion it is said: "Our conclusion is that the provision of the Code requiring a mutual assumption of marital rights and duties to follow consent does not make it indispensable to the validity of the marriage that the relation between the parties shall be made public." 75 Cal. 37, 16 Pac. Rep. 361. Although the word "public" is used in the portion last quoted from the opinion to qualify the nature of the relation, it should be observed that in the portion previously quoted (which, by a few sentences, precedes the portion last quoted) the qualifying words are, "although this relation was kept secret." It seems to me that the fair construction of the opinion is that it was intended to lay down the rules of law set forth in the propositions above stated, as applicable to the relation between the parties, though it was during the whole period of their intercourse kept secret. In holding that the findings sustained the judgment, the points above stated were, in my view, necessarily held. If they had not been, the court could not have determined to affirm the judgment. Justice TEMPLE concurred in the prevailing opinion, and expressed his views in plain and direct terms. He said: "The word 'consummation' was avoided in section 55, because it has come to be a euphemism for the more indelicate word 'copula,' and thereby has acquired a more narrow meaning than was intended. Therefore the phrase which only indicates the assumption of the contract relation was used. But in section 57 the word 'consummation' is substituted for the phrase. It cannot mislead here, for it has been defined; but it shows that the mutual assumption of marital rights, duties, or obligations is of the nature of consummation,—something in the nature of part performance of the consent to present marriage; though that is not limited to the copula. 'Sec. 57. Consent and consummation may be manifested in any form, and may be proved under the same general rules of evidence as facts in other cases.' 'Subsequent consummation, as well as consent, may be manifested in any form. What can this mean except exactly what I have claimed for it? And if in any form, why not by secret cohabitation, where the husband claims the right, believing himself a husband, and the wife submits because she believes herself a wife?'" 75 Cal. 51, 16 Pac. Rep. 368.

The points ruled as above stated arose in the case, and were argued by counsel. They cannot in any respect be regarded as obiter dicta. The points decided in a cause by this court constitute "the law of the case." This has been frequently held by this court. It was substantially so held in the case of Dewey v. Gray, 2 Cal. 377, which was the first case in this court in which the doctrine of the law of the case was applied. In Clary v. Hoagland, 6 Cal. 685, the court (by MURRAY, C. J.) said: "It is well settled that when a case has been taken to an appellate court, and its judgment obtained on points of law involved, such judgment, however erroneous, becomes the law of the case, and cannot on a second appeal be altered or changed." Id. 687, 688. "A previous ruling by the appellate court," said the court, by FIELD, J., in Phelan v. San Francisco, 20 Cal. 45, "upon a point distinctly made may be only authority in other cases, to be followed and affirmed, or to be modified or overruled, according to its intrinsic merits." The same proposition is stated again as sound law in the opinion in Leese v. Clark, Id. 416, 417, and it is further said in that opinion: "The decision is no longer open for consideration, whether right or wrong. It has become the law of the case." See cases cited in Leese v. Clark, supra, and Mulford v. Estudillo, 32 Cal. 131; Megerle v. Ashe, 47 Cal. 632; Jaffe v. Skae, 48 Cal. 540; Donner v. Palmer, 51 Cal. 636; Heinlen v. Martin, 59 Cal. 181. It is true that what has been decided as the law of the case is applicable only while the facts are the same,—substantially unchanged. Megerle v. Ashe, supra; Donner v. Palmer, supra. It is contended here, conceding the rule as to the "law of the case" to be as stated above, that it does not apply to this case,—that it only applies where the cause is sent back to the court a quo for some further proceeding to be there had in it; as, when a judgment or order denying a new trial is reversed, and the cause remanded to be again tried. In Leese v. Clark, the question of the conclusiveness of the former decision in this court is considered. It is there said: "But in the case in which the decision is made it is more than authority; it is a final adjudication, from the consequences of which the court cannot depart, nor the parties relieve themselves." After stating that this has been the uniform doctrine of this court for years, and after repeated examinations and affirmations it cannot be considered as open to further discussion, and that it is the doctrine of the supreme court of the United States and of the supreme courts of several of the states, citing several authorities for the statements made, the opinion proceeds thus: "And the reason of the doctrine is obvious. The supreme court has no appellate jurisdiction over its own judgments. It cannot review or modify them after the case has once passed, by the issuance of the remittitur, from its control. It construes, for example, a written contract, and determines the rights and obligations of the parties thereunder, and upon such construction it affirms the judgment of the court below. The decision is no longer open for consideration. Whether right or wrong, it has become the law of the case. This will not be controverted. So, on the other hand, if upon the construction of the contract supposed this court reverses the judgment of the court below and orders a new trial, the decision is equally conclusive as to the principles which shall govern on the retrial. It is just as final to that extent as a decision directing a particular judgment to be entered is as to the character of such judgment. The court cannot recall the case and reverse its decision after the remittitur is issued. It has determined the principles of law which shall govern, and, having thus determined, its jurisdiction in that respect is gone. And if the new trial is had in accordance with its decision, no error can be alleged in the action of the court below."

The same rule is laid down in Ex parte Sibbald, 12 Pet. 488. In that case the supreme court had entered its decree reversing in part the decree of the superior court of East Florida in U. S. v. Sibbald, (see 10 Pet. 313–325,) and had remitted to the superior court its mandate to be executed. The lower court refused to execute the mandate, and the party concerned (Sibbald) proceeded by petition (there were two) to procure the enforcement of the mandate of the court. On the hearing of these petitions Mr. Justice BALDWIN delivered the opinion of the court. He said: "Before we proceed to consider the matter presented by these petitions, we think proper to state our settled opinion of the course which is prescribed by the law for this court to take, after its final action upon a case brought within its appellate jurisdiction, as well as that which the court whose final decree or judgment has been thus verified ought to take. Appellate power is exercised over the proceedings of inferior courts, not on those of the appellate court. The supreme court have no power to review their decisions, whether in a case at law or in equity. A final decree in chancery is as conclusive as a judgment at law. Both are conclusive on the rights of the parties thereby adjudicated. No principle is better settled, or of more universal application, than that no court can reverse or annul its own final decrees or judgments, for errors of fact or law, after the term in which they have been rendered, unless for clerical mistakes, or to reinstate a cause dismissed by mistake, from which it follows that no change or modification can be made which may substantially vary or affect it in any material thing. Bills of review in cases in equity, and writs of error, coram vobis, at law, are exceptions which cannot affect the present motion. When the supreme court have executed their power in a cause before them, and their final decree or judgment requires some further act to be done, it cannot issue an execution, but shall send a special mandate to the court below to award it. Whatever was before the court, and is disposed of, is considered as finally settled. The inferior court is bound by the decree as the law of the case, and must carry it into execution according to the mandate. They cannot vary it, or examine it for any other purpose than execution, or give any other or further relief, or review it upon any matter decided on appeal for error apparent, or intermeddle with it, further than to settle so much as has been remanded. After a mandate no rehearing will be granted. It is never done in the house of lords; and on a subsequent appeal nothing is brought up but the proceeding subsequent to the mandate." 12 Pet. 491. The above, it will be observed, is stated as the settled opinion of the supreme court of the United States as to the course they should pursue upon its decree or judgment, after its final action upon a case brought within its appellate jurisdiction. In the case cited the trial court had taken no action upon the mandate sent down to it. The supreme court held it, nevertheless, as binding on itself as though it had. It laid down the general rule that no court can interfere with its own judgments after its jurisdiction over them has ceased, (except in a few cases, neither of which appears here;) that when the cause has gone beyond its jurisdiction it can neither reverse nor annul its decree or judgment for any errors, whether of fact or law; that in such a case the judgment is just as binding on the higher as on the lower court. The ruling in Sibbald's Case was approved in Bridge Co. v. Stewart, 3 How. 426, and is, no doubt, the settled law of the United States supreme court. There are other cases to the same effect in that court, which need not be referred to. They can be readily found in the digests.

We think it settled law in this state, fixed and beyond debate, that the points involved in a cause finally decided by this court are beyond its jurisdiction; that it has no power to reverse or modify its judgment after the case has passed, by the issuance of its remittitur, from its control; that such decision, whether right or wrong, is binding on this court and every other court; that it is a final adjudication, from the consequences of which this court cannot depart, nor the parties relieve themselves. As was said by FIELD, C. J., speaking for the court, in Leese v. Clark, supra: "The court cannot recall the case, and reverse its decision, after the remittitur is issued." 20 Cal. 417. Its jurisdiction over the case is gone. The contention of the defendant limiting the applicability of the rule of the law of the case, finds no countenance in any decision of this court. The remittitur has long since issued on the former appeal, and cannot now be recalled. The power of this court in regard to that appeal has long since ceased. In none of the cases cited by counsel for appellant (Walden v. Murdock, 23 Cal. 540, 549; Fulton v. Hanna, 40 Cal. 278, 281; and McDonald v. McConkey, 57 Cal. 325) is there anything, in my judgment, adverse to what has been said above. They are all in harmony with it. Where a judgment is affirmed a new trial may still be granted after such affirmance on errors of law not considered or passed on in affirming the judgment, but a new trial cannot be granted when the court, in order to grant it, contravenes what has been adjudicated by the previous decision. The numerous cases decided by this court, with regard to the law of the case, may be easily found by reference to the digests; what has been said above is in line with what is decided in them.

We pass to the points made on the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the decision. It is urged that the second finding, that "the marriage contract" was signed by William Sharon, cannot be held by this court to be justified by the evidence. In limine, I will say that in my judgment the opinion of the learned judge in this case, before whom it was tried in the superior court, is not a part of the record on this appeal. That opinion is not in the transcript on this appeal, and this court cannot look into it in another record. The record on the former appeal can be looked into to ascertain what facts were then before the court, so as to see to the correct application of the rule that such decision is the law of the case. McKinlay v. Tuttle, 42 Cal. 576. We can look into the opinion of Judge SULLIVAN in this case, when it relates to any question of law arising in this case, or in any other case, just as we may examine the opinions or judgments of any court to enable the court to determine what the law is applicable to the facts of a case which is before it for determination, but we cannot look into the opinion of Judge SULLIVAN to ascertain in what mode he dealt with the credibility of witnesses, or what weight or value he accorded to the evidence before him in deciding this case. To pass on any point in the case, whether relating to insufficiency of the evidence or any other matter debated, we are confined by the law to that which may be found on the pages of the transcript furnished to us on this appeal. Now, in regard to the evidence as to the signing of the marriage contract by William Sharon, the plaintiff testifies that he signed it in her presence, after it was written. Sharon testified that he never signed it. This presents a substantial conflict. The circumstantial evidence bearing on the issue of the execution of this paper does not remove this conflict. That evidence is also conflicting. Whatever view is taken of the evidence on this issue, a substantial conflict is presented. Hence there can be no reversal of the order on the ground that the evidence is insufficient to justify the second finding. Granted that it does appear, on a comparison of the finding and the evidence, that the court below must have found that the plaintiff testified falsely as to Sharon's introducing her as his wife, still the law does not require the rejection of her testimony on other points. The rule for the guidance of the trial court is thus expressed in the Code: "That a witness false in one part of his testimony is to be distrusted in others." Code Civil Proc. § 2061. I cannot go so far as to say that this distrust was not exercised, and that the credibility of the plaintiff was not weighed by the trial court according to the mandate of this rule. The credit to be given to the witness was for the court below and not for this court. Admitting that this court might go further on an extreme case, I cannot say on this record that this is such a case.

It is also urged that the evidence is insufficient to justify the third finding, which is in these words: "That afterwards, and about the —— day of September, 1880, the plaintiff and defendant commenced living and cohabiting together in the way usual with married people, although their cohabitation was kept secret, and so continued for the space of more than one year, and down to the 25th day of November, 1881, and during all of said time the plaintiff and defendant mutually assumed towards each other marital rights, duties, and obligations." In the sense in which cohabitation is regarded by the counsel for the appellant, the evidence does not show it. There is no evidence of such cohabitation as is defined in Yardley's Estate, 75 Pa. St. 211; or Ohio v. Connoway, Tapp. 90; or in Calef v. Calef, 51 Me. 366; or in Bouv. Law Dict., under the word "Cohabit;" or in any other case or book of authority. The evidence does not show any "living together" by the parties ostensibly as husband and wife. See 1 Bish. Mar. & Div. (6th Ed.) § 777, and note 2. But the evidence does establish what was found by the trial court, and the court on the former appeal held this was, with other matters, found sufficient to constitute marriage.

As appropriate to this question, and to show what was decided on the former appeal in this case, in addition to what has been said previously in this opinion, and the quotations from Justice McKINSTRY's opinion, I will refer to some other portions of the opinion. In it is said: "The word 'consummation,' whenever used as something different from the mere consent or formal solemnization of marriage, had always been held to mean 'simply sexual intercourse, copulation; nothing more nor less.' Section 57 of our Civil Code provides how this consummation may be proved." On page 33 it is said: "'There are two principal ends of marriage,—a lawful indulgence of the passions to prevent licentiousness, and the procreation of children under the shield and sanction of the law.' Stew. Mar. & Div. § 103. The intercourse, which is the means by which these ends are attained, is both a right and duty. Evidence that the man and woman have enjoyed the right and discharged the duty, whether direct or consisting of proof of another fact from which the intercourse may be inferred,—as cohabitation,—is, when preceded by present consent to marry, evidence that the parties to the contract have actually assumed all the duties incident to marriage." Taking the paragraphs quoted together, I think it was intended to decide, and that the court did hold and decide, that secret sexual intercourse, following a present consent to marry, consummates the marriage. Cohabitation is only regarded as a circumstance proving such intercourse, while it is said that this intercourse may be proved by direct evidence. The court intended to decide that the consent and the intercourse above stated consummated the marriage, and was an assumption of marital rights, duties, and obligations. The cohabitation spoken of in the opinion of Justice McKINSTRY means nothing but occupying the same bed. In determining what is decided in a cause we must give to the words used the sense in which they were employed in it; and in my judgment the word "cohabitation" is used in the opinion to denote what is stated above. Cohabitation was only evidence of what was regarded as consummation, viz., the intercourse mentioned above. In my opinion it was decided, and the court intended to decide, that if the parties consented to marry per verba de præsenti, this consent was followed by sexual intercourse, though everything in relation to the marriage was enacted by them under "a cloak of darkness;" that the marriage was perfected, became verum matrimonium. The decision of the court may be expressed by a little change in the maxim, "Consensus non concubitus facit nuptias." Let it be read, "Consensus et concubitus faciunt nuptias," and it will express the conclusion reached. In this view, the kind of cohabitation spoken of by counsel becomes immaterial. The court having decided as is explained above, there was no necessity for the cohabitation contended for, to constitute the marriage. The evidence does establish such cohabitation as was found by the court, and does not establish the cohabitation urged in the argument of apellant's counsel. The court has to apply the law of the case to the facts which are established by the court. This rule must be applied in all the proceedings in the case. The evidence establishes the same facts as the court acted on, and the law of the case must always be applied when the facts are unchanged. To fail to do so would be a mere evasion, and in making such application to the evidence it must be held to prove all the cohabitation required by law. The opinion relative to this question was, in my judgment, erroneous. But the court is controlled by the law of the case, and cannot, in this case, reverse the former decision.

The only question left open, in my judgment, by the former decision was whether the sexual intercourse between the parties in this case was licit or illicit. If it was had in pursuance of the present consent, it was licit; if not, it was illicit. I can find no evidence in the record that this intercourse was disconnected from the contract, and not in pursuance of it. I will add that in considering this point the contract must be regarded as genuine, in obedience to the former decision. It is argued that the decision herein is against law; but the evidence, as we have seen, establishes the facts as they are found, and the court on the former appeal held that the plaintiff was entitled to have judgment entered on them in her favor. It may be said, then, that on the same facts the court has held that the decision is not against law, for it affirmed a judgment entered on them. The opinion on the former appeal compels an adverse ruling on the contention that the decision is against law.

On the question of the illegality of the marriage contract by reason of the clause of secrecy, I cannot perceive that the question is changed on this appeal from what it was on the former appeal. In fact, the same point was made and argued on the former appeal as now, and determined adversely to the contention of appellant. The court there held that the marriage contract was not rendered void by the clause of secrecy, and to that ruling this court must defer.

I concur in the opinion of Justice WORKS as to the decree of the circuit court of the United States in Sharon v. Terry, and in what is said as to the ruling in regard to the admission of the testimony of Martha Wilson, and the exclusion of that of the attorney, Hornblower. As regards the question put to the witness Mrs. Samson, I am inclined to think that the court had a right in its discretion to allow the question to be put; the witness having the privilege of refusing to answer it. In saying this I do not intend to say that People v. Hamblin, 68 Cal. 102, 8 Pac. Rep. 687, is not properly decided. The decision there may be sustained on the principle which ruled People v. Crapo, 76 N. Y. 288. As the order is reversed, and the cause cannot be tried again, it is not necessary that I should express a decided opinion upon the point, (the question put to Mrs. Samson.) I prefer to reserve the question for further examination and consideration when the same or a like question shall come before this court.

I rest my concurrence in the reversal of the order upon the exclusion of the testimony of the witness Hornblower. This testimony was relevant to the main issue in the cause, viz., the genuineness of the marriage contract. The defendant was clearly injured by its exclusion, and therefore I am for reversing the order denying the motion for a new trial.

PATERSON, J., (concurring.) It is manifest that so long as the decree of the United States circuit court (the execution of which is not stayed by appeal or writ of error,—Slaughter House Cases, 10 Wall. 273) remains in force and effect, a prosecution of plaintiff's cause of action in any proceeding in the state courts can result only in great expense and annoyance to all the parties, and a conflict of authority in which the paramount decree of the circuit court is bound to prevail. We know as well now as we shall ever know the scope and effect of the decree referred to, and the construction given to it by the federal judges in their decisions. Sharon v. Hill, 11 Sawy. 290, 26 Fed. Rep. 337; Sharon v. Terry, 36 Fed. Rep. 337, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 705. These decisions are official acts of the judicial department of the United States. The matters therein decided are matters of notoriety. The verity of such matters is not disputed, and we are as much bound to notice them as we are the laws of nature or the acts of the legislature. Section 1875, subd. 3, Code Civil Proc.; Romero v. U. S., 1 Wall. 742; "Matters Requiring Judicial Notice," 28 Amer. Law Reg. (N. S.) 193. It has seemed to me, therefore, that this court ought not to now reverse the order denying a new trial in the court below; but on the ground of public policy, of comity, and to prevent vexation and expense to the parties, and an unseemly conflict between the state courts and a federal court, claiming concurrent jurisdiction and a priority of right to enforce its decree, all proceedings should be stayed until it be finally determined by the supreme court of the United States whether the prohibitory injunction of the circuit court should be made perpetual. But, as a majority of the court are of opinion that this is not the proper time and place to consider the effect of the decree referred to, but that a decision should be rendered on the matters contained in the record herein, without regard to the decisions of the national courts, I feel in duty bound to support my associates in their judgment of reversal by saying that in my opinion no other conclusion could have been reached on the questions presented by the record without a violation of well-established principles of law.

Unless we are prepared to say that in actions tried without a jury the findings of the court ought not to be disturbed on account of errors in the admission and exclusion of testimony, there are two or three errors in this case which would of themselves necessitate a reversal of the order. The main contention in the case was upon the question whether defendant and plaintiff were husband and wife,—whether there had been a consent to marry, followed by a mutual assumption of marital rights, duties, or obligations, as required by the Code to constitute marriage. The testimony of Hornblower, which was excluded, was most material on this issue, and, as shown in the leading opinion, was clearly admissible. If admitted, it would have tended to show, at least, that there never was a mutual assumption of marital rights, duties, or obligations by the parties. If it be true that plaintiff expressed the intention of commencing an action against defendant for breach of promise to marry, that fact would show that plaintiff did not at that time regard herself as his wife, and there is no pretense that a marriage occurred after the time of the conversation with Hornblower. Nothing could have been more pertinent to the question the court had to determine, and, being the declaration of the party against her interest, it is impossible to tell, in view of the state of the evidence, what effect it might have had on the mind of the judge if he had admitted and considered it. The evidence upon the question whether the marriage contract was genuine or not was conflicting. The evidence of Hornblower was material on that issue. The court below found that the parties to the marriage had "lived together in the way usual with married people," and that there had been "a mutual assumption of marital rights, duties, or obligations." This court has found that these findings are not supported by the evidence; that they never lived together as married people usually do; and that there was no mutual assumption of marital rights, duties, or obligations. If it be conceded that there was material evidence tending to support these findings of the court, it must be admitted that the declaration sought to be shown by the witness Hornblower—and we cannot say the court would not have believed him—would have tended strongly to show that she had never in good faith assumed any marital rights, duties, or obligations. I agree that if there be a consent to marry, and any mutual marital duty performed in good faith in pursuance of the contract to marry, the marriage is complete. One act of coition is sufficient evidence of consummation, but it must be an act performed in good faith, and in pursuance of the contract, by the party claiming the existence of the marriage; at least, in order to consummate the marriage. It was not decided in the former decision herein that consent alone would constitute a marriage under the laws of this state, or that copulation was conclusive evidence of consummation. The only question was whether the findings supported the judgment. The contentions were that the secrecy clause invalidated the contract, and that the finding that the defendant had never introduced plaintiff as his wife, and that they had never been reputed to be husband and wife, showed there could not have been a living together in the way usual with married people, or any mutual assumption of marital rights, duties, or obligations. The opinions rendered on the appeal from the judgment must be read in the light of the facts found in the findings of the court. I do not see how there can be any misapprehension as to what was decided on the former hearing. It was held—First, that the contract to marry was valid, notwithstanding the stipulation as to secrecy; and, second, that the finding of a mutual assumption of marital rights, duties, and obligations was not nullified by the finding that the defendant had not introduced plaintiff as his wife, and that they were not reputed to be husband and wife. The court held—and its conclusion has never been effectively assailed, in my opinion, by the arguments made herein, except in so far as they dealt in sentiment, and were clothed in phrases which tickle the ears, and please the hearts of those who do not like the law, and which would be better directed if addressed to the legislature—that under the law of this state, when parties competent to marry enter into a contract to marry, and in pursuance thereof perform any marital right, duty, or obligation, the marriage is consummated; and that it would not lie in the mouth of one of the parties, after he or she had enjoyed the person of the other, who had performed his or her part in good faith in the consummation of the marriage, to say that the marriage was not complete because by mutual agreement it had not yet become known to their friends that they had entered into the contract, and had been enjoying the same bed. As Mr. Justice McKinstry well said: "It is incredible the legislature intended that copulation may take place before the marriage is complete, or to put it in the power of the man, after he has enjoyed the person of the woman, to say: 'I will proceed no further.' Yet it is the duty of the woman, after mutual consent to present marriage, to live with the man, and their cohabitation must from the nature of things create the presumption of copulation, which reduces the statute to an absurdity." The combined wisdom of all who have attacked the reasoning upon which the judgment was affirmed on the findings has been unable, in my judgment, to offer even a plausible explanation of the "logical felo de se," in their construction of the statute thus pointed out by Justice McKinstry. But the questions before us now are whether the contract was made, and whether the evidence shows that there was a consummation of the marriage, a mutual assumption of marital rights, duties, and obligations. On both of these questions the evidence of Hornblower was most material, and it was prejudicial error to exclude it.

The rulings of the court on the cross-examination of certain witnesses are as clearly erroneous. Nothing is better settled in this state than that the character of a witness cannot be impeached by evidence of particular wrongful acts.

DEED—DESCRIPTION—DEDICATION.

1. Grants of two lots from the alcalde of San Francisco described them as 100 varas square, and numbered 15 and 25, as "marked on page 4, District Record B." Such record was referred to as containing a "plan" or "plat," and showed the location of the premises described in the grants. The petitions for the grants contained a description of the land, which was referred to in the grants. Lot 25 was described as "bounded on the west by lot 15 of said plat," and lot 15 as bounded on the north by lot "numbered 1 on page 4 of District Record, on the west by lot number 11 of the same plan, and south and east by land yet unsurveyed; said land lying in the western vicinity of San Francisco, and near the road to the Presidio, and numbered 15 on the plan referred to in the petition." Held, that it could not be said, as matter of law, that the land was not sufficiently identified.

2. In an action to enforce an assessment for grading U. street, done in 1878, it appeared that the grading in question was done on land included in two lots numbered 15 and 25, granted by the alcalde of San Francisco, and which defendant acquired through mesne conveyances. Plaintiff claimed that the land occupied by U. street had been dedicated to the city. One of the mediate grantors of defendant had brought ejectment in 1860 for lot 15, and the property sued for was described in the complaint and notice of lis pendens as "commencing near the north-east corner of U. and P. streets." But the lots were assessed in solido to defendant's grantors from 1862 to 1878, no deed in the chain of title referred to U. street, and it appeared that there were fences around the lots in 1877, and that such fences had existed for more than 20 years at the time of the grading. There was testimony that there was no passage way on the line of U. street until the grading was done. The contractor testified that he obtained permission from defendant's grantor to take down the fence across U. street. Held, that a finding that there had been no dedication as claimed was supported by the evidence.

3. An alcalde grant of a laguna survey lot conveyed the absolute title, and no portion of the land so conveyed can be appropriated for a street without the award of proper compensation.

4. A quitclaim deed conveys the title in fee-simple, if the grantor has such title, and does not imply any precedent interest or easement in the releasee.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; WALTER H. LEVY, Judge.

Wm. H. H. Hart and J. M. Wood, for appellant. Wallace & Hastings, for respondent.

VAN CLIEF, C. This is an action to foreclose a street assessment lien for $707, upon lot No. 17, south-east corner of Union and Polk streets, San Francisco, for grading Union street from Larkin street to the westerly line of Franklin street, by order of the board of supervisors made August 13, 1877. The work of grading was done by J. S. Dyer under contract dated October 4, 1877, and was commenced on or about the 9th day of October following, and completed prior to May 26, 1880, and the assessment therefor was levied on the 27th day of May, 1880. The plaintiff sued as the assignee of J. S. Dyer. The trial court gave judgment for the defendant, and the plaintiff appealed from the judgment, and also from an order denying his motion for a new trial made on his bill of exceptions. Counsel for appellant makes no point on the appeal from the judgment, unless he claims, by implication, that the findings of fact do not support the judgment.

The principal grounds upon which appellant's counsel asked for a reversal and new trial are that the evidence is insufficient to justify the first, third, and fourth findings of fact by the trial court, which are as follows: First. "That at all the times between the 1st day of January, 1850, and the 1st day of January, 1880, none of that portion of what is now Union street, upon which front the premises described in the complaint in this action, was a public street, but such portions of what is now Union street was within the exterior boundaries, and was part and parcel of a valid grant, made to a private person by the alcalde of the town of San Francisco prior to 1850, to which title by grant the defendant in this action has succeeded, and was at all times, between said 1st day of January, 1850, and said 1st day of January, 1880, held in private ownership, and had not been conveyed to the city of San Francisco, or to the city and county of San Francisco, nor dedicated to public use." Third. "That the superintendent of public streets, squares, and highways did not recommend to said board that said work be done, and did not make any recommendation in regard thereto." Fourth. "That the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco never had nor acquired jurisdiction to order the said work of grading mentioned in the complaint in this action."

If the first of these findings is justified by the evidence, the third will not be necessary to the support of the judgment, and the fourth is merely a conclusion of law, and as such is repeated in its appropriate place.

In support of the first finding it appears that defendant put in evidence two grants from Alcalde T. M. Leavenworth, one to Nelson Taylor of 100-vara lot "numbered 25 on page 4, District Records B, and bounded on the west by lot 15 of said plat," dated December 23, 1848; and the other to Stephen A. Harris of 100-vara lot, numbered 15, "lying and being situated outside the limits of the town survey, and in the western vicinity of San Francisco, on or near a road to the Presidio, and numbered (15) fifteen on the plan referred to in the petition aforesaid," and dated September 25, 1848. To these grants are attached the petitions to the alcalde therefor, and each containing a description of the land applied for, which is referred to in the grant, and thereby connected with the description in the grant. No objection was made to the introduction of these alcalde grants or the petitions thereto attached, or to the form thereof, except that it was objected to each "that the lands purported to be granted are not described with sufficient certainty to identify the same, and that the petition is ambiguous, because it does not designate any specific property." We think the court properly overruled this objection. There is no patent ambiguity in the description, and no evidence tending to discover latent ambiguity. The description is of lots 100 varas square, and numbered 15 and 25, as "marked on page 4, District Record B." The grants refer to this "District Record B" as containing a "plan" or "plat;" and it appears that the book "District Record B" was produced by the recorder of the city and county of San Francisco from his office, and was introduced in evidence in connection with each of the alcalde grants, and that "said book showed the location of the premises described in said grants, and a certificate in due form of the issuance of each grant." Besides, lot 25 is described as "bounded on the west by lot 15 of said plat," so that the two lots in question adjoin each other; and then lot 15 is described as bounded "on the north by the southern line of boundary of lot granted by George Hyde, and numbered one (1) on page four (4) of District Record; on the west by lot number eleven (11) of the same plan; and south and east by land yet unsurveyed,—said land lying in the western vicinity of San Francisco, and near the road to the Presidio, and numbered fifteen (15) on the plan referred to in the petition" attached to the grant. Nothing in the evidence tended to show that the things or objects mentioned in these descriptions did not exist, or that they may not be located and identified; or that, by them, and the plan or plat contained in the book "District Records B," in the recorder's office, the two lots in question may not be completely identified. Surely it cannot be said "as matter of law that on the face of the deed [grant] the description was so vague as not sufficiently to identify the land." Thompson v. Thompson, 52 Cal. 157. "It was admitted by the plaintiff that the premises described in this action, and all that portion of what is now Union street, upon which front the premises described in the complaint in this action, are included in and are a part and parcel of the lands described in and granted by the two alcalde grants heretofore [in the record] set out; and that at the dates of the alcalde grants hereinbefore [in the record] set out T. M. Leavenworth was the alcalde of San Francisco, and in the actual and unquestioned exercise of his authority as such alcalde. It was admitted that 100-vara lots Nos. 15 and 25, described in said alcalde grants, lie within the limits of the lands confirmed to the city of San Francisco by the final decree of the circuit court of the United States confirming to said city its pueblo lands." The defendant also proved that on the 23d day of December, 1881, he acquired through mesne conveyances all the title granted to Nelson Taylor and Stephen Harris by Alcalde Leavenworth, as aforesaid, in and to said lot No. 25, and all that portion of lot No. 15 lying east of the center line of Polk street, and further proved that the premises described in the complaint upon which the assessment was levied, and all that portion of Union street upon which it fronts, are included in the land to which the defendant acquired title on the 3d day of December, 1881, as above stated.

There is no evidence or pretense of a grant, or any kind of conveyance by the defendant or his predecessors, to the city or city and county of San Francisco, of any interest or easement in any part of the land occupied by Union street; but it is claimed by counsel for appellant that a dedication was proved, and that that part of the first finding to the contrary is not justified by the evidence. To constitute a dedication there must have been a manifestation of the owner's intention to dedicate to a public use, and also an acceptance and use by the public for the purpose intended and manifested by the owner. Harding v. Jasper, 14 Cal. 647; San Francisco v. Canavan, 42 Cal. 542; Quinn v Anderson, 70 Cal. 454, 11 Pac. Rep. 746; Hope v. Barnett, 20 Pac. Rep. 245; People v. Reed, Id. 708. As to the intention to dedicate there was, at least, a substantial conflict of evidence, if not a preponderance against it; and that there was no user by the public until after the grading, for which the assessment in question was levied, seems to have been proved. The following is the substance of the principal parts, if not of all, of the evidence bearing upon the issue as to dedication:

A judgment roll and notice of lis pendens in case of H. P. Gallagher v. Stivers et al., which was an action of ejectment for the recovery of lot No. 15, commenced in April, 1860, were put in evidence by the plaintiff, (Gallagher having been one of the mediate grantors of defendant,) by which it appeared that the property sued for was described in the complaint and notice of lis pendens as "commencing near the northeast corner of Union and Polk streets, * * * being all of laguna survey, lot No. 15." The complaint was not verified, and the plaintiff recovered judgment for the whole lot 15. This indicated that Gallagher then understood that there was a street called "Union Street," near the commencement point of his description. What was its condition, whether it was used or was passable for travel or not at that time, does not appear from the description nor from the judgment roll. For aught that appears, a portion of what is now used as Union street, but not extending to the grading for which the assessment in question was levied, may have been dedicated to and then used by the public to a point (say Larkin street) which Gallagher considered "near" the starting point of his description, but which starting point cannot be identified by anything in the record; but, however this may be, we think no intent of Gallagher to dedicate his own land to be used as a public street can be properly inferred from this description alone, and there is no other evidence tending to prove it. Michael Reese acquired the title to all the land in question by deed from H. P. Gallagher dated June 1, 1862, and continued to own the same until December 23, 1881, when his executors conveyed the same to the defendant; and continuously from 1862 to 1878 lot 25 and that part of lot 15 lying east of the center line of Polk street were each assessed to him in solido, and the taxes were paid thereon. On the 28th day of May, 1880, said executors—Jacob Rosenberg, Charles Lux, and Joseph Rosenberg—remised, released, and quitclaimed to the city and county of San Francisco "all lands reserved under the Van Ness ordinance." It is claimed by counsel that "a part of the land so reserved was that part of Union street crossing the 100-vara lot involved in part here," but this does not seem to be shown by the record. It will be seen that this quitclaim conveyance was executed after the completion of the work for which the assessment in question was levied. Yet counsel for appellant contends that this form of conveyance implied an admission that the release (the city and county) had a precedent estate in the land, and that such "admission is an estoppel upon, not only the grantors of defendant, but upon the defendant himself, who took with notice of such admission as evidenced by the prior record of the quitclaim deed." In all this we think counsel is mistaken, as it has been often decided by this court that a quitclaim deed conveys the absolute fee-simple title if the party executing it had such title, (Sullivan v. Davis, 4 Cal. 292; Graff v. Middleton, 43 Cal. 344; Rego v. Van Pelt, 65 Cal. 255;) and therefore such deed does not imply any precedent interest or easement in the releasee, or any admission of the releasor to that effect. The defendant proved that on October 17, 1879, the executors of Michael Reese gave to J. S. Dyer, the contractor, written permission to deposit earth upon lot No. 25, then the property of the Reese estate, provided that he should not thereby raise the lot above the official grade of the adjacent streets, and that he should at all times keep the surface level, make no charge for making such deposits of earth, and replace and repair the fences upon said lot. In consideration of this license Dyer then promised in writing to comply with its conditions, and to discontinue making such deposits whenever requested by the executors. C. V. Gillespie, a searcher of records, testified, in substance, that he had examined upon the records the deeds constituting defendant's chain of title, from the alcalde grants until 1884, for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not any of those deeds mentioned or referred to Union street, and found that they did not. J. N. E. Wilson, an attorney of San Francisco, testified, in substance, that he had resided near that part of Union street in question since March, 1858, and knew the condition of Union street west of Larkin up to the time of the grading in 1878, and that there was nothing like a thoroughfare on it; that there was a little pathway on the top of the hill about where Union and Larkin now are, that ran diagonally down Union street from Larkin to the north-east corner of Mr. Burr's lot, but not coincident with Union street. E. W. Burr testified that he had resided in San Francisco since November, 1852, and then resided on lot 12 or 13 of the laguna survey; that the lots 15 and 25 were fenced as early as 1852; that there were no streets out there in 1852; that there was no passage-way or street on the line of what is now Union street until the grading was done; and that the fence around lot 25 had existed more than 20 years when the grading in suit was commenced. It was admitted by plaintiff that Michael Reese had a fence across Union street in 1877. James M. Taylor testified that he was attorney for Michael Reese, (who died in August, 1878,) and had charge of the land in question from June 1, 1876, until June 1, 1877; that from written memoranda, made by himself, he had no doubt that on or about June 29, 1877, he went before the street committee for Mr. Reese to stop grading Union street from Larkin to west side of Franklin. That he knew the premises described in the complaint, and that they were refenced by Mr. Reese in 1876,—the refencing including Union street from Polk to Larkin. The fence that crossed the street had no opening to permit passage through in 1876. Mr. Reese always expressed himself as unwilling to have the street go through there. During the time he had charge of the property he did not permit any act tending to open the street. Mr. Dyer got no permission from him to remove the fence. James S. Dyer testified, among other things, that he was the contractor and did the grading in question. Commenced the work four or five days after signing the contract, and was engaged in the grading about three years. No objections were made to the grading, to his knowledge. When he came to the fence across Union street, he went to see Mr. Reese in the latter part of 1878, but did not meet him. Saw his clerk, who directed him to Mr. Rosenberg. Thinks Mr. Reese was then in Europe, or he might have been dead. Called on Mr. Rosenberg, and told him that the fence was across the street in his way, and he wanted to know what to do with it. Rosenberg referred him to Mr. Taylor. Saw Mr. Taylor, who said he would look into the matter, and see Mr. Rosenberg, and asked him (witness) to call again in a day or two. About two days afterwards saw Mr. Rosenberg again, "and he said they were not going to contest the opening of the street, but if I took down the fence to take care of the lumber, and put it where it would be safe, so that they could use it again in putting the fence upon the line of the street. I had the fence taken down, and piled it up on Mr. Reese's lot. When I began the work of grading this street, I believed that it was an open public street dedicated to public use, and had no reason to doubt that. I knew there were parties claiming it as private property all along, through what was called the 'Laguna Survey' of the 100-vara lots. Parts of Union street were fenced in within the laguna survey. I did not know they were fenced in, as being parts of their lots." Plaintiff then read in evidence sundry deeds made by defendant since 1882, conveying lots to various persons fronting on that part of Union street in question.

From the foregoing we conclude that all parts of the "first" finding are sustained by the evidence, and that this finding and the others not objected to support the judgment without aid from the third finding, as to which we express no opinion. The plaintiff also put in evidence the patent of the United States to the city of San Francisco, dated June 20, 1884, granting the pueblo lands of the city with certain reservations; and thereupon, and upon acts of congress and of the legislature of California, and the decisions of our courts, state and federal, counsel for appellant constructed a lengthy and ingenious argument to show that alcalde grants did not convey the absolute title, and did not deprive the pueblo or its successor, the city of San Francisco, of the right to open streets through the lands granted without compensation. This conclusion seems to be squarely in conflict with the decision of this court in Scott v. Dyer, 54 Cal. 430, in which the effect of an alcalde grant of 100-vara lot No. 11 of the laguna survey, made by Alcalde Leavenworth in September, 1848, and in all respects apparently similar to those in question here, was considered, and in which the former cases bearing upon the effect of such grants were reviewed. The decision of the court was that the alcalde grant conveyed the absolute title in fee, MCKINSTRY, J., saying: "The plaintiff being the absolute owner of the lands described in the complaint, [lot No. 11,] they cannot be entered upon without her consent; nor can any portion of them be appropriated to the use of the public as a street, except upon due compensation paid or secured, in pursuance of proceedings prosecuted for that purpose." We think the judgment and order should be affirmed, and so advise.

We concur: HAYNE, C.; FOOTE, C.

GOLDTREE et al. v. THOMPSON et al. (No. 11,749.)

WILLS—CONSTRUCTION—PERPETUITIES—ACCUMULATIONS.

1. A bequest of property in trust to divide and pay the income to testator's nephews and nieces during their respective lives, and after their deaths in trust for their children who shall attain the age of 21 years or marry, vests the corpus of the fund in the children of the legatees, upon the attainment of their majority or their marriage.

2. Such a bequest is not void under Civil Code Cal. § 716, and other sections, which limit restraint upon alienation to a period not exceeding the continuance of lives in being at the creation of the estate.

3. As no accumulation is provided for by such a bequest until after the death of the parties entitled to the income, which accumulation is for the benefit of their children during their minority, the provision is valid, within section 724, restricting accumulations of income to provisions for the benefit of minors in being at the creation of the fund, and requiring such accumulation to terminate with the minority of the beneficiary.

4. The birth of a child to one of testator's nephews after the death of testator, which child died single and a minor, during its father's life-time, would not affect the validity of the bequest.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Luis Obispo county; D. S. GREGORY, Judge.

Action by Isaac Goldtree and others, trustees under the will of Jonathan Thompson, deceased, against William Thompson and others, legatees in said will, to obtain a construction thereof. Defendants appeal. For former report, see 20 Pac. Rep. 414.

Ernest & William Graves and J. N. Turner, for appellants. J. M. Wilcoxon and W. H. Spencer, for trustees, (plaintiffs.) Wm. Shipsey, for minor defendants, (respondents.)

THORNTON, J. This action was brought by the plaintiffs as trustees appointed by the will of Jonathan Thompson, to obtain for their direction a construction of certain clauses in it. The property had been distributed to the trustees by a decree of the proper court, and they apply to this court for the purpose above stated. The legatees and devisees under the will are made parties to the action, and all desire a construction of the clauses asked for. The clauses of the will referred to relate to the disposition of the residuary estate, which is done by the following words: "The residue of my personal estate (subject to the payment of my just debts, funeral and testamentary expenses) I give to my said trustees, upon trust to invest the same, (after converting such parts thereof into money that require conversion,) and all accumulations thereof, as hereinafter named, and divide and pay the income thereof, as it becomes due and received in manner following, namely, as to one-fourth part thereof, to my niece Jane Allison during her life, and after her death then in trust for her children in equal shares (if more than one) who shall attain twenty-one years of age or marry. As to one other fourth part thereof, to my niece Margaret Chappelhow, during her life, and after her decease then to her husband, John Chappelhow, (if he be living,) during such time as he shall remain a bachelor, and, after that event, then in trust for her child or children in equal shares (if more than one) who shall attain twenty-one years of age or marry. As to one other fourth part thereof, to my nephew James Thompson (now in California) during his life, and after his deceased then to his present wife (if she be then living) during such time as she shall remain his widow, and after that event then in trust for his child or children by her in equal shares (if more than one) who shall attain the age of twenty-one years or marry; and as to the remaining fourth part thereof, to my aforesaid nephew John Thompson during his life, and after his decease then to his present wife (if she be then living) during her widowhood, and after that event, then in trust for his child or children by her in equal shares (if more than one) who shall attain twenty-one years of age or marry." Jane Allison and Margaret Chappelhow, the devisees named in the will, are the nieces of the testator, and the other devisees named, James Thompson and John Thompson, were his nephews. They were all living at the death of the testator, as were the children, except one born subsequently mentioned hereinafter.

There is no doubt that one-fourth of the income derived from the residuary estate is to be paid to Jane Allison during her life, and a like proportion each to Margaret Chappelhow, James Thompson, and John Thompson during their several lives, and after their death to the surviving husbands of Jane Allison and Margaret Chappelhow, and to the surviving widows of James and John Thompson, during the period mentioned in the will. That is to say, it is clear that the income only, in the proportions mentioned, is to be paid to the surviving husbands and widows of the nephews and nieces above named during the periods of their widowerhood or widowhood, and they get no portion of the corpus of the residuary estate.

The question debated and to be decided is whether the children of the parties mentioned above, and referred to in the will, take the corpus of the property left in trust, or the revenue only. We are of opinion that the direction of the testator was that the corpus of the trust property was to pass to the children above named, and to be paid over to them in the proportions above stated, when they attain the age of 21 years or marry. This, in our judgment, is what is declared in the will. It is evident that the testator intended to distribute by will all the residuary estate. The whole residuum is bequeathed to the trustees in trust—First, to pay over the income to the parties mentioned during the periods prescribed, and, whenever such proportions cease, then, second, "in trust [not to pay over] for his or her children;" that is, that the residuum, in the proportions aforesaid, is to be held in trust for the children referred to. The bequests to children are expressed in precise terms, and have the same meaning which is indicated above. We think this clearly appears from the clause in the will in which he empowers the trustees, "during the minority of any legatee, to apply the income of their respective shares towards his or her support or advancement in the world."

The respective shares here must mean shares of the residuary estate itself. If the respective shares only meant their respective shares in the income, then the authority conferred on the trustees would be to apply the revenue derived from their shares of the income towards his or her support and advancement. This would be too small a sum to be of any advantage as an advancement in the world. We cannot think that such could be the meaning or intent of the testator. This authority was intended to empower the trustees, after the death of the nephews and nieces mentioned in the will, and the contingency had occurred when they no longer had to pay over the income, or any portion of it, to a surviving husband or wife of the nephews or nieces, to use the income for the support or advancement of the children named during their minority, or until they had married, having regard in each case to the proportions in which the property was bequeathed,—that is, one-fourth of the residuary estate to the children, respectively, of each of the nephews and nieces deceased. This conclusion is sustained by the fact, patent on the face of the will, that no provision is made for the continuance of the trust, after the children mentioned marry or attain 21 years of age. We think the provision in the will for compensation of 15 pounds per annum to each trustee during the continuance of the trust named in the will clearly shows that the intent of the testator was that the trust should last no longer than the period above indicated by the will, and that its continuance should not be for an undefined period. The trust then coming to an end, the corpus of the residuary estate is to be held for the cestuis que trustent in the proportions above referred to. The above is in accordance with decided cases. See on this subject the following cases cited in brief on behalf of the minor respondents: Earl v. Grim, 1 Johns. Ch. 494; Reed v. Reed, 9 Mass. 372; Paterson v. Ellis, 11 Wend. 259, 298; Fox v. Phelps, 17 Wend. 393, 402; Earp's Appeal, 75 Pa. St. 119; Ogden's Appeal, 70 Pa. St. 501; Anderson v. Greble, 1 Ashm. 136; Andrews v. Boyd, 5 Greenl. 199; 4 Kent, Comm. 563; Parks v. Parks, 9 Paige, 107; Smith v. Post, 2 Edw. Ch. 523; Cooke v. Husbands, 11 Md. 492; Craig v. Craig, 3 Barb. Ch. 76.

A point is made that these trusts as to the children create a perpetuity, and are in violation of the statute, and are void. It is not clearly pointed out by counsel how this result is brought about. "The rule against perpetuities," says Mr. Perry in his work on Trusts, "has been gradually established by judicial decisions, and affords a most notable instance of the nice adoption of the principles of the common law to the decision of a question which requires at once a due regard for the rights of persons and property, and a careful consideration of these larger principles of public policy so essential to the welfare of communities and states. For public policy is opposed to the perpetual settlement of property in families in such manner that it is forever inalienable, or inalienable so long as there may be a person to take answering the designation of some testator who died generations before." The same writer proceeds to point out the various steps or stages of adjudication by which the rule was settled. They are thus stated: "The first stand of the judges was to allow only those limitations which would take effect at the end of one life from the death of the testator. This was afterwards modified to include two or more lives in being, and running at the same time, 'or where the candles are all burning at once;' for it is plain that such a space of time is only one life in being, that of the longest liver. The next step was much debated, but it was finally settled that an executory devise might be made to vest at the end of lives in being and 21 years after, to allow for the infancy of the next taker, who by reason of infancy could not alienate the estate. The statute of 10 & 11 Wm. III. c. 16, having provided that children en ventre sa mere, born after their father's death, should for the purposes of the limitations of estates be deemed to have been born in his life-time, a further extension of nine or ten months was allowed for the period of gestation. The next step was to allow a period of nine months for gestation at the beginning of the term, as the life in being during which the term would run might be that of a child en ventre sa mere. * * * It was finally determined that twenty-one years might be allowed as a term in gross, without reference to the infancy of any person, but that the period of nine months for gestation should be allowed in cases only where the gestation had commenced of some persons who, if born, would take an interest in the estate. By such steps, by imperceptible degrees, and after two centuries of doubt and litigation, and unaided by legislation, the judges framed and completed the great rule against perpetuities. Thus all future legal estates which arise by way of executory devise, conditional limitation, or shifting or springing uses must vest within a life or lives in being at the death of the testator, and twenty-one years; and, in case the person in whom the estate or interest should then vest is en ventre sa mere, nine months more will be allowed; and all estates created as aforesaid, and so limited that they may not vest within that time, are void." 1 Perry, Trusts, §§ 379, 380.

This rule, styled by Mr. Perry "the great rule" against perpetuities, was worked out on the principles of the common law. That system did not permit a grant of property in fee-simple to be made with an entire restraint of alienation. The right of alienation was incident to the estate, and the restriction was void as repugnant to the Code. 1 Washb. Real Prop. 85. But a restriction for a reasonable time was held valid, (Id.,) and the time fixed as a reasonable time was as stated above. The same rule was established by many cases as the common law in regard to estates so settled, the income to be invested whether for adults or infants. One of the most reasonable of these cases was that presented in the will of Peter Thellusson, who died in 1797. This came before the court of chancery in 1798. A brief reference will be made to the case in which the trusts of this will were presented for judicial consideration, (in Thellusson v. Woodford, 4 Ves. 227, and 11 Ves. 112.) In referring to the case (Thellusson v. Woodford) Chancellor Kent thus states it, and what was held in relation to it: "The devise in that case was that all the real and personal estate of the testator should be converted into one common fund, to be vested in trustees in fee for the rents and profits to accumulate during all the lives of all the testator's sons, and of all the testator's grandsons born in his life-time or living at his death, or then in ventre sa mere, and their issue, to receive the profits during all that time in trust, and to invest them from time to time in other real estates, and thus be adding income to principal. After the death of the last survivor of all the enumerated descendants, the estates were to be conveyed to those branches of the respective families of the sons who, at the end of the period, should answer the description of the heirs male of the respective bodies of the sons. The testator's object was to protract the power of alienation, by taking in lives of persons who were mere nominees, without any corresponding interest. The trusts created by the Thellusson will were held valid by the court of chancery, and the decree was affirmed in the house of lords. The property was thus tied up from alienation and from enjoyment for three generations, and when the period of distribution shall arrive the accumulated increase of the estate will be enormous." 4 Kent, Comm. 285. In a note to the text of Kent it is stated: "The testator died in 1797. He left three sons and three daughters, and half a million sterling, on an accumulating fund. If the limitation should extend to upwards of one hundred years, as it may, the property will have amounted to upwards of one hundred millions sterling."

The limitations of this will brought about the enactment of the statute 39 & 40 Geo. III. c. 98, usually known as the "Thellusson Act." On this act the statute of New York (1 Rev. St. 773) is founded, and the statute of California, hereafter to be referred to, followed the New York act. All of those acts allow accumulations of the income of property for the benefit of infants during their minority. See 4 Kent, Comm. 286, 287. The legislature of this state has embodied the rule as stated in the extract above given from Perry on Trusts, as will be seen by an examination of the provisions of the Code in reference to future interests. The absolute power of alienation cannot be suspended by any limitation or condition whatever for a longer period than during the continuance of the lives of persons in being at the creation of the limitation or condition, except in a single case mentioned in section 772, Civil Code, which is not material in this case. Id. § 715. The children here take a future interest, defined to be an interest which entitles the owner to the possession of the property only at a future period. Id. § 690. This interest is created by will, and in such case the death of the testator is to be deemed or taken as the time of the creation of the interest. Id. § 749. As a future interest it is declared by section 716, Id., that it "is void in its creation which by any possibility may suspend the absolute power of alienation for a longer period than is prescribed in this chapter," i. e., for a longer time than during the continuance of the lives of persons in being at the creation of such interest. This power of alienation is suspended when there are no persons in being by whom an absolute interest in possession can be conveyed. Id. § 716.

The subject of the trust herein is the residuum of the personal estate. "The residuum of my personal estate," is given by the will in trust to the trustees. If there is any violation of the statute it must be in regard to the personal estate and the accumulations thereof. The power of alienation is not suspended for a period beyond that allowed by statute. All the persons beneficially interested in the will were living at the death of the testator. No reference is made here to the child of John Thompson, born after the death of the testator, and who died a minor and unmarried. As to such accumulations, the Code, after providing that "dispositions of the income of property to accrue and to be receieved at any time subsequent to the execution of the instrument creating such disposition" are governed by the rules prescribed in title 2, pt. 1, div. 2, Civil Code, § 722, provides that accumulations of the income are lawful and allowed by the Code which are in accordance with section 724 of the Civil Code, which is as follows: "An accumulation of the income of property, for the benefit of one or more persons, may be directed by any will or transfer in writing sufficient to pass the property out of which the fund is to arise, as follows: (1) If such accumulation is directed to commence on the creation of the interest out of which the income is to arise, it must be made for the benefit of one or more minors then in being, and terminate at the expiration of their minority; or, (2) if such accumulation is directed to commence at any time subsequent to the creation of the interest out of which the income is to arise, it must commence within the time in this title permitted for the vesting of future interests, and during the minority of the beneficiaries, and terminate at the expiration of such minority."

The accumulations are only for the benefit of minors who are in being at the death of the testator. One of the children of Margaret Chappelhow and John Chappelhow, viz., Esther Hannah, is an infant. Two of the children of Jane Allison and Giblum Allison are minors. John Thompson's children are minors. James Thompson had no children. The other children have reached their majority. On the death of the mother or father of the children, and the death or marrying of the surviving wife left a widow, or the surviving husband left a widower, each one of the children mentioned, who is married or of age, becomes entitled to his or her share. If there is any income of such share received afterwards, it goes to such married or adult child as accrued income on his share which has already vested in possession. It is clear from the will that all the income is to be paid over and not accumulated at all during the lives of the nephews and nieces, and during the lives of the surviving husbands and wives referred to in the will, as long as they remain unmarried. After the foregoing events have occurred the shares of the corpus of the fund have to be paid over to the married or adult children of the parents mentioned in the will, with the income accruing on their shares as a part of the share; such income, if any, being accrued on the share of such adult or minor child. The only accumulation is, then, for the minors, and such accumulation ends with their minority or marrying. When majority is reached, or marriage occurs before, each share vests, with its accumulation of the income, in such minor child.

It may be remarked that the accumulations of income on an invested fund are not forbidden because they tend to a perpetuity. That such accumulations were for adults did not create or tend to a perpetuity was held in Thellusson v. Woodford, above cited. See remarks of Lord ELDON on page 144, 11 Ves. The prohibition of accumulations longer than the minority of the takers of the interest was made to prevent an unfeeling and selfish testator from so devising his estate as to make persons rich in the distant future, to the detriment of those during the period of limitation who had better claims on his bounty. The latter had to live in poverty, in order that their children or grandchildren might be made rich at a distant future day.

As to the after-born child of John Thompson, she came into existence during her father's life, one of the lives in being at the creation of the interest. She would take an interest under the will, as she was one of the class mentioned in it, to-wit, the children of John Thompson, (Civil Code, § 1337,) vested in right when she was born, and in possession contingent on her attaining the required age or marrying. If this interest could ever vest in possession, it must have vested within 21 years after her father's death. Such an event did not render the interest devised void. No question is made as to the validity of the trust created by the will as a trust. The only objection made to it has been considered above. But clearly such a trust is valid. See sections 2221, 2222, Civil Code. The trust is definite in every respect required by statute, (see sections above cited,) and the trustees here have accepted the trust. The foregoing disposes of all the questions raised in which the judgment of this court is sought. We find no error in the judgment of the court below, and it is affirmed. So ordered.

COVENANTS RUNNING WITH THE LAND—NOTICE.

1. Plaintiff contracted in writing with E., the owner of certain land, to furnish water for a certain period at a certain price, which E. agreed to pay for himself and his successors in interest, annually, at stated times. He also covenanted, inter alia, that the contract and covenants therein contained on his part should "run with and bind the land." Held, that under Civil Code Cal. § 2884, which provides that a lien may be created by contract to take immediate effect, as security for the performance of obligations not then in existence, the contract was a lien upon the land of E., and bound it as against any successor of E. with notice thereof.

2. Where a grantee of the covenantor had notice of the water-right when he purchased the land, but did not know its terms, such knowledge was sufficient to put him upon inquiry, and a failure to do so will not relieve him of the obligation upon the land.

3. Such a contract only required to be acknowledged by the incumbrancer of the land to render it capable of recordation, and the record thereof was sufficient notice to subsequent purchasers of the land.

4. As plaintiff complied with the contract on his part by supplying the water, the fact that defendant did not use it is immaterial, and the land was bound whether the water was used or not.

5. Under Civil Code Cal. §§ 1460-1462, specifying what covenants run with the land, the covenants under the contract in question do not run with the land, not being contained in the grant of the estate, and no personal judgment can be had against defendant; but the lien must be foreclosed against the land, he not being a bona fide purchaser with out notice of the lien.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; J. B. CAMPBELL, Judge.

Action by the Fresno Canal & Irrigation Company against one Rowell, for certain payments due under a contract entered into with it by defendant's grantor, one Easton, for supplying water to be used on the land owned by him. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Civil Code Cal. § 2881, is as follows: "A lien is created (1) by contract of the parties, or (2) by operation of law. Sec. 2882. No lien arises by mere operation of law until the time at which the act to be secured thereby ought to be performed. Sec. 2883. An agreement may be made to create a lien upon property not yet acquired by the party agreeing to give the lien, or not yet in existence. In such case the lien agreed for attaches from the time when the party agreeing to give it acquires an interest in the thing, to the extent of such interest. Sec. 2884. A lien may be created by contract, to take immediate effect, as security for the performance of obligations not then in existence." Civil Code

Cal. § 1460, reads: "Certain covenants contained in grants of estates in real property are appurtenant to such estates, and pass with them, so as to bind the assigns of the covenantor, and to vest in the assigns of the covenantee, in the same manner as if they had personally entered into them. Such covenants are said to run with the land. Sec. 1461. The only covenants which run with the land are those specified in this title, and those which are incidental thereto. Sec. 1462. Every covenant contained in a grant of an estate in real property, which is made for the direct benefit of the property, or some part of it then in existence, runs with the land. Sec. 1463. The last section includes covenants 'of warranty' 'for quiet enjoyment,' or for further assurance on the part of a grantor, and covenants for the payment of rent, or of taxes or assessments upon the land, on the part of a grantee. Sec. 1464. A covenant for the addition of some new thing to real property, or for the direct benefit of some part of the property not then in existence, or annexed thereto, when contained in a grant of an estate in such property, and made by the covenantor expressly for his assigns, or to the assigns of the covenantee, runs with land so far only as the assigns thus mentioned are concerned. Sec. 1465. A covenant running with the land binds those only who acquire the whole estate of the covenantor in some part of the property. Sec. 1466. No one, merely by reason of having acquired an estate subject to a covenant running with the land, is liable for a breach of the covenant before he acquired the estate, or after he has parted with it, or ceased to enjoy its benefits."

George E. Church, for appellant. Wharton & Short, for respondent.

THORNTON, J. The contract binds Easton, but we cannot see it binds defendant personally. Rowell was no party to the contract, nor do we see that he ever agreed to bind himself personally for its performance. Easton owned certain lands, and, while owner, made a contract in writing with plaintiff to furnish water for a certain period for a certain price, which Easton agreed to pay, and that his successors in interest should pay annually, on certain days of the year. He also covenanted that the contract and the covenants therein contained on his part should "run with and bind the land." A lien may be created on property by contract. Civil Code, §§ 2881-2884. We think that there was a lien created by contract on Mr. Easton's land mentioned in the agreement. All the covenants in the agreement were agreed to bind the land. One covenant was to pay money afterwards to become due. The language above quoted shows an intent by Easton, the owner of the lands, to create a lien on them. This makes a contract of lien. This lien bound the land as against any person who succeeded to Easton's estate, with notice of it. It seems to be conceded that defendant is the grantee or successor of Easton as to part of the lands above referred to.

The evidence tends to show that defendant had actual notice of the water-right when he purchased the land. He testified that at that time he knew that there was a water-right of plaintiff's connected with the land, but did not know its terms. It seems to us that such knowledge was sufficient to put him on inquiry as to the water-right; that by pushing the inquiry he might have ascertained its exact condition; and that it was his duty to make the inquiry. Easton, or either of the officers of the plaintiff company, could have informed him of the right and its terms. He cannot, by failure to inquire, relieve himself of the obligation which inquiry would have shown bound the land. He cannot be allowed to shut his eyes, and say he did not see, when by opening them he might have seen. But, waiving the point of actual notice, we are of opinion that the notice by the record of the agreement was sufficient. The written paper was such a paper as could by law be recorded, and impart notice to subsequent purchasers. All that was required was that it should be properly acknowledged by Easton, the creator of the incumbrance on the land. The policy of the recording laws is that the record should impart notice to subsequent purchasers or mortgagees of the grantor. The plaintiff had no interest in the land, and created no incumbrance on it. There could be no subsequent purchasers or mortgagees of the land from it. It was no more necessary that it should be acknowledged by it than that a mortgage should be acknowledged by the mortgagee. The plaintiff accepted the incumbrance created on the land, but did not create it, or charge the land in any way. Spect v. Gregg, 51 Cal. 198, is a direct authority on the point. The execution of the power of attorney by one of the contestants made the appointee his attorney. The instrument, by its terms, read that the appointee should be the joint attorney of the four parties executing it, or severally of each. The acknowledgment by one of the contestants created the appointee his attorney, and his acknowledgment was sufficient to authorize its recordation, and make the record notice as to any subsequent purchaser from him. So here, as to Easton, who in fact was the only creator of the incumbrance, and the only one who charged the land.

The fact that the defendant did not use the water, if the plaintiff complied with the contract,—and this was found to be a fact,—is immaterial. The land was then bound whether the water was used or not.

It may be added that the covenants are not here regarded as covenants running with the land. They could not be such because they are not contained in grants of the estate. Such is the manifest meaning of the statute, and such, we think, was the common law. Civil Code, §§ 1460-1462, and the sections following in the title. There can be no judgment against defendant, personally, for money, but the lien can be enforced by foreclosure against the land, and every grantee who is not a bona fide purchaser without notice. Judgment and order reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

CUCAMONGA FRUIT & LAND CO. v. MOIR. (No. 13,055.)

PUBLIC LANDS.

1. A party seeking to attack a patent must show that he is connected in some way with the original source of title, so as to be able to aver that his rights are injuriously affected by the existence of the patent.

2. Under Pol. Code Cal. § 3500, providing that an application to purchase state lands must state "that there is no valid claim to such land other than that of the applicant; * * * that he has not entered any land in part satisfaction of the unsold portion of the 500,000-acre grant," etc.,—an application stating that there was no valid claim other than the applicant's, but failing to state that he had not "entered any land," etc., creates no such claim as will entitle the applicant to question the validity of a certificate of purchase issued to another.

3. A certificate of purchase from the state is not void though the application and affidavit are defective.

4. Such certificate is sufficient to maintain ejectment.

H. T. Hazard and Chapman & Hendrick, for appellant. Curtis & Otis and J. C. Lynch, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. Ejectment. The complaint is in the ordinary form. The answer specifically denies plaintiff's ownership, and that the defendant wrongfully or unlawfully entered into or withholds possession of the premises. Plaintiff claims title under a patent of the United States and a certificate of purchase from the state of California. Defendant contends that the patent is void because the United States had no title, the land having been listed to the state in 1870, and confirmed by congress; that the certificate of purchase issued to Mullan, defendant's grantor, is void because the state never had any title until the passage of what is known as the "Booth Bill," March 1, 1877, eight years after Mullan's certificate of purchase had been issued, and seven years after the act of March 24, 1870, had been passed. The defendant's answer does not allege, and the evidence does not show, that he occupies such a status as authorizes him to control the legal title, or to question the authority of the officers who issued the patent. A party seeking to attack a patent must show that he is connected in some way with the original source of title, so as to be able to aver that his rights are injuriously affected by the existence of the patent. Fletcher v. Mower, 56 Cal. 424; Dodge v. Perez, 2 Sawy. 653; Davidson v. Land Co., 20 Pac. Rep. 152; Kentfield v. Hayes, 57 Cal. 409.

Defendant's claim to the land in controversy rests upon an application to purchase from the state. Conceding that he might show, without pleading them, the facts upon which he relies, it is sufficient to say that he has failed to aver or to prove the conditions necessary to make his application valid. His application did not allege, nor does the evidence show, that he had not entered any land in part satisfaction of the unsold portion of the 500,000-acre grant, or of the grant in lieu of the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections. At the time his application was filed the statute required the applicant to state, among other things, "that there is no valid claim to such land other than that of the applicant; * * * that he has not entered any land in part satisfaction of the unsold portion of the 500,000-acre grant, or of the grant in lieu of the sixteenth or thirty-sixth sections, which, together with that now sought to be purchased, exceeds 320 acres." Section 3500, Pol. Code. The application of Moir did state that there was no valid claim other than his own, but did not state that he had "not entered any land in part satisfaction," etc. At the time the application was filed the plaintiff and its grantors held a certificate of purchase from the state of California for the land, and it appears from the evidence that defendant and one —— were both living on the land, claiming adversely to each other at the time the application was filed. Having failed to establish a privity with the paramount source of title,—to show that he was duly qualified according to law to purchase the land in controversy, and had fully complied with the laws of the state of California regulating the sales of such lands,—he is not in a position to question the title of the plaintiff. Peabody v. Prince, 21 Pac. Rep. 123; Chapman v. Quinn, 56 Cal. 278; McKenzie v. Brandon, 71 Cal. 209, 12 Pac. Rep. 428; Plummer v. Woodruff, 72 Cal. 29, 11 Pac. Rep. 871, and 13 Pac. Rep. 51; Harbin v. Burghart, 18 Pac. Rep. 127. Mullan's certificate of purchase is not void, even though his application and affidavit were defective, (Rowell v. Perkins, 56 Cal. 220;) and a certificate is sufficient to maintain an action in ejectment, (Young v. Shinn, 48 Cal. 26; Laugenour v. Hennagin, 59 Cal. 625.) Judgment and order affirmed.

McCOMBER v. MILLS. (No. 12,957.)

FORECLOSURE OF MORTGAGE.

Defendant, after giving plaintiff a mortgage to secure three notes on certain lots, agreed with him for the release of any lot on payment of $250 for each lot, provided as many lots were sold from the east side of the block as from the west, and that the release of not less than two lots should be demanded at one time. After the payment of the first note defendant secured the release of eight lots, and failed to pay the other two notes, but demanded the release of ten other lots, and in foreclosure pleaded the failure to release said lots. Held, that it was no defense, as he was not entitled to such release, without paying the price therefor according to the contract, and making demand for specific lots.

In bank. Commissioners' decision. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; E. PARKER, Judge.

Leovy & Humes, for appellant. M. S. Babcock, for respondent.

GIBSON, C. This is an appeal from a judgment foreclosing a mortgage against the defendant and from an order denying him a new trial. The only point urged upon this appeal is that a portion of the eleventh finding of the court below is not supported by the evidence. The defendant by his answer admits the execution and delivery of the notes and mortgage, and the non-payment of the two notes in suit. The only affirmative defense interposed other than one based on the alleged sale of the notes by the plaintiff to another person prior to bringing the suit, and that the third and last note had not matured, was that, pursuant to a contract made with and as a part of the mortgage, providing for the release of lots from the mortgage on payment of $250 for each lot, not less than two to be released at a time, and in equal numbers, on the east and west side of the blocks, he, the defendant, sold eighteen lots, and plaintiff, although requested to release such lots, released but eight, and refused to release the other ten lots. Upon this defense the court found, in the finding assailed by the appellant, that only four "east-side" lots, of the ten lots described in defendant's answer, in addition to those released prior to the commencement of the suit, should be released from the mortgage lien. The court also found that the mortgage was given by the defendant to plaintiff on the 8th day of July, 1887, to secure three promissory notes for the sum of $13,750 in the aggregate, with interest, the said amount being the remainder due on the purchase of a portion of the property covered by the mortgage. And at the time of the execution and delivery of the notes and mortgage, and as part of the same transaction, plaintiff and defendant made and reduced to writing, in a paper separate from the notes and mortgage, an agreement, whereby the plaintiff agreed to release from the lien of said mortgage any lots therein described whenever the defendant might desire to sell any of them, upon the defendant paying to plaintiff the sum of $250 for each lot released: provided as many lots were sold by defendant upon the east side as upon the west side of each block, and not less than the release of two lots demanded at a time; and also found that the first of the three notes was paid, leaving the two others unpaid, and $10,779.82 due thereon, including an attorney's fee, as provided for in said notes; that the plaintiff was the owner of the notes; and that the last note had matured at the commencement of the suit.

The only evidence in the statement on motion for a new trial, aside from that of the contract for the release of lots from the mortgage lien, and the testimony of two witnesses on the question of attorney's fees, is the testimony of the plaintiff and defendant. The defendant, in substance, testified that he executed the notes and mortgage, and in connection therewith, and as part thereof, he and plaintiff entered into the contract for the release of lots from the mortgage; that he sold eighteen of the lots covered by the mortgage, and requested plaintiff to release ten lots in addition to the eight previously released; and that the only money he ever paid plaintiff was the amount of the first note; never paid $250 or any other sum for the release of any particular lot, and did not tell plaintiff what particular lots he wished released under the contract. The plaintiff testified, in substance, that the contract was not entered into at the time of the execution of the notes and mortgage, and was not a part of the same transaction; that the defendant never paid him any money but the amount of the first note, after which he released from the mortgage lien eight lots, at the request of defendant, who did not ask for the release of any other lot or lots until long after the second note matured, and defendant had been asked several times to pay it; that the eight lots were released with the understanding between himself and defendant that the remaining sixty-two lots should remain as security until the full amount secured by the mortgage should be paid. Thus it appears from the defendant's own testimony that the finding assailed by him is not only supported by the evidence, but more favorable to him than he was entitled to. After he paid the amount of the first note, and obtained the release of eight lots, and rested apparently satisfied for some time without making any demand for the release of any other lots, he was not entitled to the release of any additional lots without paying the price therefor required by the contract, and making a demand for specific lots, not less than two in number, and an equal number on the east and west side of the blocks. We therefore advise that the judgment and order appealed from be affirmed.

We concur: Vanclief, C.; Foote, C.

Peterson v. Weissbein et al. (No. 13,051.)

Res Judicata.

Where, in a suit between plaintiff and defendant's grantor, it has been determined that a judgment, under which the latter has purchased the land in question, was valid, the question is res judicata in a suit between plaintiff and defendants.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Nevada county; J. M. Walling, Judge.

For statement of facts and former opinion, see 16 Pac. Rep. 769.

P. F. Simonds and F. Searls, for appellant. A. Burrows, for respondents.

Works, J. On a former appeal this cause was reversed on the ground that the defendants, who relied upon a constable's deed to establish their title, had not made out their case, for the reason that they had failed to introduce in evidence the judgment and execution on which the deed was based. Peterson v. Weissbein, 75 Cal. 174, 16 Pac. Rep. 769. On a second trial this evidence was supplied, and judgment was again rendered for the defendants. The plaintiff objected to the introduction of the judgment and execution in evidence, on the ground that the judgment was invalid. But it was shown by the evidence that in an action between the plaintiff and the defendants' grantor, who was the purchaser at the constable's sale, it was determined by the judgment of the court that the judgment of the justice's court and the sale under it were valid. This adjudication was conclusive as to the validity of the judgment. Peterson v. Weissbein, supra. Therefore the court below did not err in admitting it in evidence. The judgment roll in the case between the plaintiff and the defendants' grantor was objected to, on the ground that the parties in that action were not the same as in this. But, the defendants having purchased from the party in the former action, the judgment inured to their benefit, and was competent evidence. Judgment and order affirmed.

BELLEGARDE v. SAN FRANCISCO BRIDGE CO.

(No. 13,132.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 1, 1889.)

APPEAL.

Where notice of an appeal was given January 7th, and no undertaking filed until January 28th, there is no appeal before the court to be considered or dismissed.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

O'Brien, Morrison & Daingerfield, for appellant. J. D. Sullivan and Henry McCrea, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This cause is before us upon a motion of respondent to dismiss the appeal from the judgment for failure to file the transcript within the time prescribed by rule 2 of this court. But the certificate of the clerk shows that no appeal has ever been taken, the notice of appeal having been given January 7, 1889, and no undertaking on appeal having been filed until January 28, 1889. In such a case the rule heretofore seems to have been to refuse to hear the party who claims to have appealed, and to refuse to "dismiss;" there being really nothing to dismiss. Biagi v. Howes, 63 Cal. 384; Reed v. Kimball, 52 Cal. 325. The motion to dismiss is denied.

KARNS v. OLNEY. (No. 12,864.)

VENDOR AND VENDEE—AGENTS—LACHES.

1. Where a contract for the sale of land was made by one acting as agent, in the immediate presence of the owners, and the sum paid on the purchase price was, by the direction of one of the owners, immediately paid by the agent to the other, and the owners subsequently directed the agent to execute a written contract for the land, the sale was in legal affect made by the owners, and the fact that the agent did not have written authority to make the sale was unimportant.

2. The purchaser having taken possession under his contract, and made valuable improvements on the land with the knowledge of the owners, they were estopped to assert the agent's want of authority.

3. The fact that the owners did not, at the time of the contract, know of the exact location of the land, and were mistaken as to its value, could not be taken advantage of to deny the validity of the sale.

4. Though the written contract was signed in the name of a corporation as principal, yet, it appearing that the owners had used that name in making sales of their land, and had instructed the agent to use it as he did, the contract could not be impeached on that ground.

5. The contract was not void for uncertainty because it was made "subject to the conditions in a formal contract as to clearing streets, improvements," etc., referring to a contract to be executed in the future.

6. Nor was it objectionable because it provided for its surrender "on delivery of formal contract or deed," it appearing that at the date of the contract the vendors had not themselves acquired the legal title.

7. The contract was made September 28, 1882, the last payment (which would entitle the purchaser to a deed) being due two years later. The purchaser was allowed to believe that the title had been transferred to the corporation in whose name the contract was made, which was not true. The owners conveyed the land without consideration, and with intent to keep it out of the purchaser's reach. Plaintiff, the assignee of the purchaser, did not discover the fact that the contract had been made in the presence of the owners, and the payment thereon received by them, until a short time before bringing this action for specific performance, which was bought December 10, 1886. Held, that there was no laches.

8. As affecting the question of laches, the fact that the corporation notified plaintiff that it repudiated the contract was immaterial, as it never had any title to the property.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; A. W. HUTTON, Judge.

C. E. Sumner and Chapman & Hendrick, for appellant. Olney, Chickering & Thomas, for respondent.

WORKS, J. This is an action by the appellant for the specific performance of a contract to convey real estate. The findings of the court were in substance that one Mills and one Wicks, being in possession of the lot in controversy, and a large number of other lots in Pomona, in this state, under a contract of purchase, began the sale thereof, and, for the purpose of making such sales, appointed one F. H. Hall to be the manager and agent at Pomona, aforesaid; that Hall had not full authority to act for said Mills and Wicks in the sale of the lots and lands, but that the court was unable from the evidence to define with exactness the extent of his general authority; that the said Hall, under and in pursuance of his appointment and authority, acted as such manager and agent for the sale of said lots and lands, and was, by reason thereof, known and recognized as such manager and agent by the general public, and by the said Mills and Wicks, and by the purchasers mentioned; that on the 28th day of September, 1882, the said Mills and Wicks did, by their said agent, Hall, make and enter into a verbal agreement with one William Bayles, agreeing to sell, and he agreeing to purchase, the lot of land in controversy for the sum of $200; that when said agreement was made said Mills and Wicks were both personally present, and the agreement for them by Hall was made then and there, but not under the personal direction of Mills and Wicks; that Bayles then and there, in pursuance of said agreement, paid Hall the sum of $50 on the purchase price, and Hall, being such agent, paid said sum, as and being such part payment of said purchase price, over into the hands of said Wicks upon the request and direction of said Mills, and wrote and delivered to said Bayles the receipt therefor, in the words and figures following: "$50. Pomona, September 30, 1882. Recd. of W. M. Bayles fifty dollars on account for lot 6, block 32, for which a contract will be given on payment of balance of one-third of contract price of two hundred dollars. F. H. HALL, Agt. for Pomona Co." That within a few days thereafter, on the 30th day of October, 1882, in pursuance of their plan for the sale of said lots and lands, said Mills and Wicks formed with others a corporation by the name of the Pomona Land & Water Company, with its capital stock divided into 5,000 shares; that Mills and Wicks owned 4,180 of said shares, and the other three shareholders necessary to form a corporation represented 820 of said shares, and for the purpose of carrying out said enterprise for the sale of said lots and land they transferred the same to said corporation, excepting from the operation of said assignment all lots and land already conveyed to them by Louis Phillips, and that Hall continued to act as agent for the sale of said lots in the same manner as before said transfer; that said Hall made 39 sales of said lots and lands, including the sale of the lot in question to Bayles, as such manager and agent for Mills and Wicks; that before they assigned the same to said company, and afterwards, the said Mills and Wicks supplied said agent, Hall, with printed blanks, containing the name of the said Pomona Land & Water Company, printed thereon as vendor, and instructed the said agent, Hall, to use the same in making contracts for sales thereof to be made, and expressly directed and instructed said agent to fill out said blanks with the terms of sale, and deliver them to all purchasers, including said Bayles, to whom sales of lots had already been made by them in their individual capacity; and that Hall carried out said instructions, whereby Bayles was induced to believe that said agreement was adopted by said company; that on the 21st day of September, 1882, Bayles, under and in pursuance of his said agreement, paid to Hall, then acting as the manager and agent for the sale of said lots and lands, the further sum of $16, and that Hall, pursuant to said instructions given as aforesaid, filled out and delivered to Bayles one of the said printed blanks, supplied by Mills and Wicks for the purpose, in the words and figures following:

"POMONA LAND AND WATER COMPANY.

"Pomona, Los Angeles, September 28, 1882. Received of William Bayles, fifty dollars, deposit on contract for purchase of lot six, (6,) in block thirty-two, (32,) according to the map of Pomona. Contract duly recorded in book 3, pp. 90 and 91, of miscellaneous records of Los Angeles county, subject to the conditions in a formal contract as to cleaning streets, improvements, etc., said price being $200, and terms of payment, $16 to make the one-third on demand, $67 payable September 28, 1883, $67 payable September 28, 1884. Deferred payments to bear 8 per cent. interest, payable annually. And the said William Bayles, in consideration of the premises, hereby agrees to purchase said property for the same price and on the terms above set out; this to be surrendered on delivery of formal contract or deed. F. H. HALL, Manager of Pomona Land & Water Company." [Seal.]

—That on the 24th day of January, 1883, the said Bayles, for a good and valuable consideration, assigned and transferred to the plaintiff all his interest in said lot and said agreement, and the plaintiff thereupon entered into possession of said lot, with the knowledge and consent of Hall, agent as aforesaid, plowed the whole of said lot, and put substantial improvements thereon; that said Bayles and the plaintiff kept and performed all the conditions of said agreement to be kept by them, paid the sum of $66, the first payment of said purchase price, and tendered to the Pomona Land & Water Company the sum of $67, and interest thereon to date, according to the terms of said agreement; that on the 28th day of September, 1883, and on the 29th day of September, 1884, plaintiff tendered the said company the sum of $134, and interest thereon to date, being the whole balance of said purchase money, according to the terms of said agreement, and demanded the execution of a deed of conveyance; and the company refused to accept said payments and execute the deed, but made no objections to the terms thereof, or to said tenders; that on the 27th day of November, 1886, he tendered to the defendant the sum of $176.90, being the full amount of the purchase money remaining unpaid, and tendered a deed of bargain and sale for execution, and the defendant specified no objections to said tender, nor to the terms of said conveyance, but declined to receive said purchase money, and refused to execute said conveyance; that by a deed dated December 4, 1882, Louis Phillips conveyed said lot to said Mills and Wicks, and by a deed dated February 23, 1883, said Wicks conveyed his interest therein to said Mills, and by a deed dated September 21, 1883, while plaintiff was in possession of said lot under said agreement, Mills, knowing that plaintiff was so in possession, conveyed said lot to one Charles French, who had full knowledge of plaintiff's possession under said agreement, and the other facts herein set forth, and that French was in the employ of said Pomona Land & Water Company under said Mills and Wicks, and paid no consideration for said conveyance; that Mills died on the 20th day of April, 1884, and his wife was appointed his administratrix, and included this lot in the inventory of the property of said estate; that in May, 1883, the plaintiff had notice that the Pomona Land & Water Company repudiated the alleged agreement; that said French, from the time of his deed from Mills, asserted to plaintiff his ownership of the lot, and disputed the possession thereof; that French, some time in 1884, removed plaintiff's improvements, but plaintiff replaced them within two or three months, and for a short period of that year leased the premises; and that the house and fence erected by him remained on the property until removed by the defendant in October, 1886; and that French, for a short time just previous to his deed to defendant, leased the property; and that the defendant entered on the lot October 20, 1886, but did not oust plaintiff; that in February, 1883, said Wicks, as attorney for the Pomona Land & Water Company, wrote the plaintiff a letter, notifying him that Hall had acted without authority in making the contract, and that the same was repudiated, and offered him $100 if he would return the receipt for cancellation, but that Wicks had not been authorized by the company to write such a letter; that neither Wicks nor Mills knowingly or intentionally ratified or confirmed the contract, or voluntarily accepted any benefits or obligations thereof; that the said Mills and Wicks, by their acts and conversation aforesaid, induced the said Bayles to purchase said lot from them by their said agent, Hall; that said printed blank was used, and the agreement in the name of the Pomona Land & Water Company delivered as aforesaid by Hall, agent as aforesaid, and accepted by Bayles because Mills and Wicks instructed Hall to use the same for that purpose, and not by reason of any fault or neglect of said Bayles or the plaintiff, and the use thereof caused Bayles to believe that said agreement was adopted by said company, promoted by said Mills and Wicks as aforesaid; that the use of said printed blanks caused the plaintiff to believe that said sale was in fact originally made by said company, as therein specified; that Mills and Wicks never demanded payment of the balance of the purchase money of said lot, nor communicated to plaintiff the fact that said sale was made by them in their individual capacity, but, on the contrary, further gave the plaintiff cause to believe that said sale was made by said company, and denied that plaintiff had any interest in said lot, and attempted to disaffirm said sale, alleging as a ground that said Pomona Land & Water Company never acquired title to said lot, and that, therefore, said Hall never had authority to sell the same; that all the deeds of conveyance referred to above were recorded immediately after their respective dates, and the plaintiff had constructive notice thereof; and that about the time the defendant ousted plaintiff, as aforesaid, plaintiff first learned that said sale was made in the actual presence of said Mills and Wicks, under their direction, for them, in their individual capacity, by said agent, Hall, and that said Mills and Wicks had taken a conveyance of said lot from said Louis Phillips to themselves, and recorded the same on the day preceding said transfer of their said contract with Louis Phillips to said company, and thereby prevented said company from acquiring title to said lot; that the plaintiff's supposed cause of action is not barred by the statute of limitations. This suit was commenced December 10, 1886. On these findings the court concluded in favor of the defendant, and the plaintiff appeals.

It is contended by the plaintiff that he was entitled to judgment on these findings, and that the cause should be reversed on that ground. In this contention the appellant is clearly right. We do not know upon what ground the court below concluded that the plaintiff's case was not made out, but counsel for respondent attempt to justify the decision on four grounds: (1) That the original receipt given by Hall did not constitute a sufficient contract of sale. (2) That Hall had no authority to make the sale, not having been authorized in writing. (3) That the original receipt, and the contract subsequently given by Hall, were not executed by the then owners, Wicks and Mills, but by the Pomona Land & Water Company, in its name, and were otherwise indefinite and insufficient. (4) That the action was commenced too late. In discussing these questions counsel for respondent have not confined themselves to the findings, but have very ingeniously used the findings where they support their case, and where they are against them the findings are ignored, and the evidence in respondent's favor, and against said findings, is used instead. By thus combining the two, and holding fast only to that which seems to them to be good, they have convinced themselves that "the case is too plain for argument." This we cannot do, and perhaps for that reason we are unable to agree with counsel. Taking the facts as we have them in the findings we consider the points relied upon by the respondent:

1. As to the point that the original receipt given at the time the first payment of $50 was made was not sufficient, we agree with counsel; but this was not intended to constitute the contract, but simply as a memorandum showing the payment of the money, and it was stated therein that a contract would be given upon the payment of the balance of the one-third payment; and such a contract was afterwards executed. For this reason we regard this receipt as of no great importance.

We regard the question of Hall's authority to make the sale as of no greater consequence, in view of the other facts found. It may be conceded that an appointment in writing was necessary to authorize him to make a binding sale, (Civil Code, § 1624,) and that no subsequent parol ratification or acknowledgment by the principal is sufficient. Videau v. Griffin, 21 Cal. 390; Blum v. Robertson, 24 Cal. 142. But here the sale was in legal effect made by the principals. Videau v. Griffin, 21 Cal. 391, 392. It was made in their actual presence, and, at the request of one of them, the money paid was handed to the other immediately. It is true the court finds that the sale was not made under the personal direction of the owners, and that they did not knowingly or intentionally ratify or confirm the said contract of sale, nor voluntarily accept any of the obligations or benefits thereof, but these conclusions are clearly disputed by the facts found. They did voluntarily receive the cash payments at the time it was made, and the court finds that they afterwards instructed Hall to make a contract for the property. The facts show that the only reason for the finding that they did not knowingly or intentionally ratify or affirm the contract of sale was that they did not know the location of the lot, or, in other words, the lot was a better one than they supposed when they sold it and accepted the purchase money, and therefore they wanted to escape from the contract.

The findings further show that the purchaser took possession under his contract, and made valuable improvements on the property with the knowledge of these parties. Besides, the court finds, throughout these findings in various places, that Hall was the agent of these parties, and that they did the acts relied upon by the plaintiff through him. The court finds in one place that Hall did not have "full" authority; but what is meant by the word full in this connection is left to conjecture. The finding on the point is: "All allegations of the several paragraphs of the complaint, which are respectively numbered and marked 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6, are true, except that F. H. Hall did not, as alleged in paragraph 2, have full authority to act for the said Mills and Wicks in the sale of the lots and lands referred to therein; but, if it be essential, I am unable, from the evidence, to define with exactness the extent of his general authority." This finding as to authority relates, not to this sale particularly, but to an allegation in the complaint that Hall was appointed to be manager at Pomona, "with full authority to act for them" in the sale of all of the lands then held for sale by them at that place, and the following specific allegation of the complaint, relating to this particular sale, is found to be true: "That on the 28th day of September, 1882, the said Mills and Wicks were in possession of the said lot of land hereinabove particularly described, under said agreement for the purchase thereof from Louis Phillips, and did then at Pomona aforesaid, by their said agent, F. H. Hall, make and enter into a verbal agreement with one William Bayles, whereby the said Mills and Wicks agreed to sell, and the said William Bayles agreed to purchase, the said lot of land described as lot 6, as aforesaid, for the sum of $200, on the terms set out in the seventh paragraph of this complaint." And the court further finds in express terms that the allegation of the complaint is true that they instructed their said agent to make out this and the other contracts, where sales had been made, and how to make and execute them, and that in pursuance of these instructions he did execute the contract, and that the plaintiff, as the assignee of said contract, entered into possession and made improvements. This, it seems to us, was a sufficient finding of the agency; but, if not, the conduct of the vendors of the property was such as to estop them from denying it, or asserting any claim to the property on the ground of his want of authority. To permit the vendors of land to repudiate the acts of their supposed agent, under such circumstances, would be to sanction a clear and palpable fraud, and this cannot be done, even under the guise of the statute of frauds. Sedg. & W. Tr. Title Land, §§ 844–847; Fry, Spec. Perf. 259, 260; Bigelow, Estop. (3d Ed.) 470, 513. It is a well-settled rule of estoppel that one who with knowledge accepts the proceeds of an unauthorized sale of his property is estopped to dispute the validity of the sale. Goodman v. Winter, 64 Ala. 410, 433; France v. Haynes, 67 Iowa, 139, 25 N. W. Rep. 98; Schenck v. Sautter, 73 Mo. 46; Moore v. Hill, 85 N. C. 218; Field v. Doyon, 64 Wis. 560, 25 N. W. Rep. 653; Booth v. Wiley, 102 Ill. 84, 107. See, also, as bearing on this point, Escolle v. Franks, 67 Cal. 137, 7 Pac. Rep. 425. In this case the vendors stood by and saw the sale made, and accepted the purchase money, in the presence of the vendee, and the court finds that they, "by their acts and conversation aforesaid, induced the said Bayles to purchase said lot from them by their said agent, Hall," which, it seems to us, presents the strongest possible case against them. If they did not know the location of the lot that was being sold, as claimed, their want of knowledge must be attributed to their own want of care. They cannot, in view of these facts, be heard to deny such knowledge. It is contended that this was not the contract of Mills and Wicks, but of the Pomona Land & Water Company. It is true, the contract is signed by Hall as the manager of the company, but the findings show clearly that the contract was that of Mills and Wicks, and that they had, before the organization of the corporation, adopted and used the name afterwards given to the corporation, and that they instructed their agent, Hall, to prepare and sign the contract in that form. They had the right to adopt and contract in a name not their own, and, having contracted in that name and received the benefits thereof, they cannot be allowed to impeach it on that ground.

Again, it is urged that the contract was too uncertain and indefinite to authorize the relief sought. We do not think so. The land is accurately described; and the amount, and time of making the payments, are clearly stated. There are but two elements of uncertainty in the contract. It is made "subject to the conditions in a formal contract as to clearing streets, improvements," etc. This evidently refers to a "formal" contract that was expected to be made in the future, and, if it was too uncertain to uphold this clause or to bind the vendee to the condition attempted to be imposed, it can furnish no ground upon which the vendors could repudiate the contract. It is nowhere shown that the refusal to consummate the agreement was ever placed on any such ground, or that any question was ever made as to the conditions intended to be imposed by this clause in the contract. If such a "formal" contract existed, and the parties contracted with reference to it, the question might have been raised in respect to the form of the deed, when demanded, and, if a deed with the conditions relied upon had been refused, the vendors might have been justified in refusing to execute one without such conditions. But we do not regard this as such an element of uncertainty as will vitiate the whole contract. The court finds that no objection was made to the form of the deed tendered for execution when the purchase money was tendered. The further objection made to the contract is that it provides that it shall be surrendered "on delivery of formal contract or deed." The apparent reason for having drawn the contract in such form as to call for either a contract or a deed is that at the time the contract was executed the vendors had no deed, but were holding under a contract. It was the evident intention that if they procured a deed before the final payment of the purchase money a deed was to be executed; if not, a contract for a deed. But, whether this be so or not, it clearly appears from the contract itself that the vendee was to have their title to the property upon payment of the purchase money, and the time was definitely fixed by the time of the final payment of the purchase money, and surrender of the contract. We think the contract was sufficient to authorize the relief prayed for.

Lastly, it is claimed that the action was brought too late. Cases are cited by counsel in which shorter delays were held to be fatal, but each case must depend upon its own circumstances. There is no absolute bar short of the time fixed by the statute of limitations. There is nothing of unfairness or injustice in allowing the appellant his remedy in this case after the delay complained of. It is perfectly apparent from the findings and the evidence that there was a systematic and persistent effort all along on the part of Mills and Wicks to mislead the plaintiff and prevent his getting title to the property. It was not transferred to the corporation, but he was allowed to believe it was, if not led to that belief by these parties. Wicks conveyed to Mills, and Mills conveyed to one French, an employé, without consideration for the conveyance, and French, acting undoubtedly for Mills, endeavored to get possession of the property, and claimed that he was the owner, and tore down the appellant's improvements. That French held the title for Mills, and with the sole purpose of attempting to deprive the appellant of the property, is apparent from the fact that upon the death of Mills, although French held Mills' deed for the property, it was inventoried by the widow as a part of the estate. French conveyed the same to the respondent, who admits in his brief in this court that he holds it as a trustee for the widow. In other words, so far as it affects this question of delay in bringing the action, this property must be regarded as having been the property of the original vendors all along, and that they have been attempting to keep it out of the appellant's reach. Besides, one of the very material facts in the case, and one without which probably he could not have recovered, was that this contract was made in the actual presence of the owners, and the money paid to and received by them, and this was not discovered by the appellant until a very short time before bringing this suit. Without a knowledge of this fact, if there were no others tending to excuse his delay, he might well have hesitated about bringing the suit; and, taking this circumstance together with the conduct of the vendors, we are not inclined, on the mere ground of delay in bringing the action, to deny the appellant his rights. The court finds that the deeds bringing the title down to the respondent were recorded immediately after their execution, and were constructive notice to the appellant. Conceding this, it makes the effort to mislead the appellant only the more apparent; but the doctrine of constructive notice has application only to a subsequent purchaser or incumbrancer, and can have no bearing on the question presented here. The finding that the Pomona Land & Water Company notified the appellant that it repudiated the contract was immaterial, for the reason that that company never had any title to the property, and was not a party to the contract, or interested in it in any way. Judgment and order reversed, with instructions to the court below to conform its conclusions of law to this opinion, and render judgment on the findings in favor of the plaintiff.

WORKS, J. Action to quiet title. Judgment for defendants. Motion for new trial overruled. Plaintiff appeals.

The controverted question in the court below was as to the genuineness of a deed from one Michael White and wife to Henry Hancock, under which the defendants claimed to be the owners of one-half of the real estate in controversy. The deed appeared upon its face to have been regularly executed and acknowledged. The plaintiffs claimed it to be a forgery, and that Michael White was out of the state at the time it purported to have been signed and acknowledged. The court below, after hearing testimony as to the execution of the deed, held the same to have been executed, and admitted it in evidence. The appellants assign several errors upon rulings made during the hearing, and claim that the decision of the court that the deed was genuine was not sustained by the evidence. A witness called by the plaintiff testified that he knew White; that he was at White's house, on the ranch, cultivated his land, and had a conversation with him. He was then asked what the conversation was. To this question the defendants objected, and the objection was sustained. This is assigned as error. We do not know from the record before us whether the court erred in this ruling or not. Where the question itself does not indicate whether the answer to it will be material evidence or not, the party seeking to introduce the evidence must, in order to present the question to this court, make an offer of what he proposes to prove, so that the court below and this court can determine whether the proposed proof is material or not. There is nothing in the record to show what the proposed testimony was. The question indicated nothing of the kind. The witness is asked for a conversation between White and himself. The conversation, if there was one, may have been about a matter entirely aside from the matter under investigation. Therefore the record fails to show any error in this ruling. In order to show the absence of White at the time the deed purported to have been executed, the plaintiffs proved by his wife that he left home, and that she accompanied him part of the way. She was then asked if, when she bid him good-bye, he told her where he was going. This was objected to, and the objection sustained. This question is like the one above referred to. There was no offer to prove any statement that would have tended to corroborate the testimony of other witnesses that he went to Lower California, nor did the question indicate that such would be her answer. We cannot assume error in order to reverse the case, nor can we, for the purpose of sustaining the appellants' position, presume what he fails to show, viz., that the answer of the witness would have been material if it had been allowed. The defendants, in order to prove that the name of White to the deed was in his handwriting, proved that White had, prior to that time, been a justice of the peace. A record from the clerk's office, shown to have been his docket, kept by him as such justice, was offered in evidence, and certain signatures of White appearing therein were shown by a witness to have been in White's handwriting. This was followed by expert evidence to the effect that the signatures in the record and the one to the deed were in the same handwriting. The appellants contend that the record admitted in evidence was not sufficiently authenticated or proved to be a public record kept by White. But this was entirely unnecessary. The evidence was not offered to prove the contents of the record, or to establish any fact. The name appearing therein was the only material thing. It could make no difference whether the name offered appeared in a public record, a private writing, or on a blank piece of paper. If admitted, or proved to the satisfaction of the judge, to be genuine, it could properly be compared with the handwriting in controversy, for the purpose of showing that the latter was genuine. Code Civil Proc. §§ 1943, 1944. Of course, the record introduced did not prove that the name of White, appearing therein, was his genuine signature; but there was positive evidence to that effect, which we must presume was proof to the satisfaction of the judge that it was genuine. The defendants were permitted to introduce in evidence the testimony of White, given in an action not shown to have been between the parties to this action, or to have involved the matter in controversy here. The object was to show declarations of White, who was deceased, tending to show that he executed the deed in controversy. The admission of this testimany was erroneous. 1 Greenl. Ev. §§ 125, 163; Code Civil Proc. § 1870. But we have examined the evidence carefully, and find nothing in it to prejudice the appellants. Therefore, the ruling of the court, although erroneous, was harmless, and we cannot reverse the case on that ground. Certain other items of evidence are objected to, on the ground of immateriality. The court seems to have given rather too wide a range to the evidence on the question as to the genuineness of this deed, but, upon a careful examination of the evidence, it does not appear to us that there was anything in the rulings or in the evidence admitted that could have worked the appellants any injury. The point is made that the decision of the court on this question was not sustained by the evidence, but we think otherwise. Judgment and order affirmed.

HEILBRON et al. v. 76 LAND & WATER Co.

(No. 12,684.)

RIPARIAN RIGHTS—INJUNCTION.

While an upper riparian owner cannot divert water for sale or use on non-riparian lands, or unreasonably use or divert the water to the injury of owners further down the stream, it is error, upon enjoining him from such unauthorized diversion, to require him to permit no water to flow into a canal constructed by him for the purpose of irrigating non-riparian land, but which, though not so intended, can be used to irrigate his riparian land, and compel him to close up his canal, as he may hereafter desire to use it legitimately, either to water riparian land, or to carry off surplus water in time of flood, when no one below him would be injured thereby.

In bank. Commissioners' decision. Appeal from superior court, Tulare county; William W. Cross, Judge.

August Heilbron and three co-tenants of land lying on Kings river brought this action against the 76 Land & Water Company, a corporation, to enjoin it from an illegal diversion of the water of said stream. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals.

Wigginton & Hawes, for appellant. D. S. Terry and Brown & Daggett, for respondents.

Belcher, C. C. Action to enjoin the diversion of water. The complaint was filed November 18, 1884, and the facts alleged therein are, in substance, as follows: The plaintiffs are, and for more than two years have been, seised and possessed as tenants in common of a tract of land situate in the counties of Fresno and Tulare, known as the "Kings River Ranch," and containing about 54,000 acres. A natural water-course known as "Kings River," flows for a distance of over 30 miles along and forms one of the boundaries of the ranch. A branch of the river, called "Cole Slough," flows through the ranch for a distance of about 10 miles, and at ordinary stages carries the greater portion of the water of the river. In its course through and along the boundary of the land the water of the river moistens the soil, and causes the production and growth of valuable crops of grasses. Plaintiffs, in order to increase the fertility of their lands, and to afford an abundance of grass and water for their stock on the ranch, have constructed and maintained a dam on Cole slough, and have constructed canals and ditches, by means of which they have for more than two years conducted the waters of the river over and upon their lands, and have thereby irrigated a large portion thereof, causing the same to produce more abundant crops, and furnishing water for their live-stock on the land. For more than two years plaintiffs have had more than 13,000 head of live-stock grazing on their land, and the water of the river is necessary for the subsistence of such stock, and is the only water to which the stock on the ranch can have access. Plaintiffs are also cultivators, and have growing on the ranch about 3,000 acres of alfalfa, and the waters of the river are necessary for the growth of that crop. The defendant is a corporation organized for the purpose of diverting the waters of Kings river to be used in irrigating lands at a distance from the river. It has constructed a canal about 100 feet wide and 4 feet deep, with a grade of 18 inches to the mile, and since about the 1st of November, 1883, without the consent and against the will of plaintiffs, has thereby diverted from the river, at a point above plaintiffs' land, about 1,000 cubic feet of water per second. The water so diverted flows away from the river and plaintiffs' land, and no portion of it is or can be returned to the river, but the whole thereof is lost or dissipated by absorption and evaporation. By reason of this diversion the quantity of water flowing past and through plaintiffs' lands has been greatly diminished, and rendered insufficient for the purposes of the ranch. Defendant threatens to, and, unless restrained, will, continue the diversion. Its canal has sufficient capacity to divert all the water flowing in the river at low stages, and such continued diversion will cause to the plaintiffs irreparable damage, will greatly impair the value of their lands, and will destroy the crops of alfalfa growing thereon.

The answer denies, among other things, that defendant was or is organized as a corporation for the purpose of diverting the water of Kings river to be used in irrigating lands at a distance from the river, and alleges that it was organized for the purpose of diverting "the waters, or a portion of the waters, of said river to be used in irrigating lands near to and on the banks of said river, as well as at a distance therefrom." The answer further denies that defendant's canal has capacity to divert more than 750 feet of water; and it alleges that at the time of the commencement of this suit, and for more than three years prior thereto, defendant was and now is seised and possessed of certain lands situate in the counties of Fresno and Tulare, known as the "76 Lands," and containing about 30,000 acres; that Kings river flows for a distance of about nine miles along and forms one of the boundaries of said tract of land; that defendant constructed its canal for the purpose, among others, of irrigating said tract of land, and that such irrigation is feasible and necessary to make the lands produce crops of grain, hay, vegetables, and fruits, and will thereby greatly add to the value thereof; that it ever has been and now is the purpose and intention of defendant to make only a reasonable use of the waters of the river for irrigating its lands, and that it is not now, and never has been, the purpose or intention of defendant to make any use of the waters of the river to the injury of plaintiffs in any manner whatever.

The court found all the facts as to the plaintiffs' ranch; its possession, size, location along Kings river; use for the pasturage of stock and raising alfalfa; necessity for water to irrigate it, and supply the stock grazing thereon,—to be as alleged in the complaint. It further found that defendant was a corporation, and that in 1883 it constructed a large canal leading out of the channel of Kings river at a point on the south side thereof, about 25 miles above the place where Cole slough connects with and receives its water from the river; that in the month of January, 1884, defendant, without the consent of plaintiffs, commenced to divert, and has ever since continued to divert, from the channel of the river, by means of its canal, 750 cubic feet of water per second; that the water so diverted has been carried to lands located at a distance from the river, and used to irrigate lands which do not border on the channel of the river or touch the banks thereof, and that the canal is so constructed that the water diverted by it does not and cannot flow back into the river; that by reason of the said acts of defendant the quantity of water flowing to and through plaintiffs' lands has been materially diminished, so that their cattle have not had a sufficient quantity to drink, and they have not had sufficient to irrigate their alfalfa fields. The court also found that defendant is the owner of the lands mentioned in its answer, and that portions of these lands border on the south bank of Kings river, below where its canal is taken out; "that the irrigation of the larger portion of defendant's lands from its said canal is feasible, and irrigation is necessary to make said lands produce crops of grain, hay, vegetables, and fruits, which will thereby add greatly to the value of said lands;" "that one of the purposes for which the defendant constructed said canal was to irrigate said lands; * * * that said defendant has not at any time irrigated any of its said lands from or by means of said canal; * * * and said defendant does not intend to irrigate any of said lands by means of said canal." Judgment was entered that defendant, its officers, agents, etc., be forever enjoined and restrained from diverting any of the waters of Kings river into or through its canal, or from causing, or in any manner permitting, any portion of the waters of the river to flow into or down its canal; and the judgment further ordered and decreed that defendant forthwith fill up the head of its canal and close the same, so that no water can or will flow from the river into it. The appeal is from the judgment and an order denying a new trial

We have stated the case very fully, because, in our opinion, the judgment is not warranted by the findings, and must therefore be reversed. It clearly appears that defendant is a riparian proprietor above the plaintiffs. Its lands can be irrigated with water carried through its canal, and irrigation is necessary to make them productive. Being an upper riparian owner, defendant is entitled, as against the plaintiffs, to make a reasonable use of the water of the stream for the purpose of irrigating its riparian lands, and it is only for an unreasonable and unauthorized use that an action will lie. What is a reasonable use is a question of fact and depends upon the circumstances appearing in each particular case. Lux v. Haggin, 69 Cal. 394–409, 10 Pac. Rep. 674; Swift v. Goodrich, 70 Cal. 103, 11 Pac. Rep. 561; Stanford v. Felt, 71 Cal. 249, 16 Pac. Rep. 900. One of the purposes for which the defendant constructed its canal was to irrigate its lands; and the fact that it has not yet used the water upon its own lands cannot destroy or impair its right. Lux v. Haggin, 69 Cal. 390, 10 Pac. Rep. 753. So the fact, if it be a fact, that defendant does not intend to irrigate any of its lands by means of the canal does not affect its right. It may, at any time change its intentions in this respect. This being so, we are unable to see how the court could properly grant a perpetual injunction restraining the defendant from ever, at any time or for any purpose, causing or permitting any water from the river to flow into or down its canal. Besides, there may be times of flood or high water when no one below would be injured if defendant's canal should carry away from the river surplus water to its full capacity. Why should defendant be required to fill up the head of its canal so that no water at such times can flow into it? See Edgar v. Stevenson, 70 Cal. 286, 11 Pac. Rep. 704. From what has been said it is not to be understood that defendant has a right, as against riparian owners further down the stream, to divert water from the river for the purposes of sale, or for use on lands which are not riparian. We advise that the judgment and order be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the court below to enter a decree in conformity with the views expressed in the foregoing opinion.

We concur: HAYNE, C.; GIBSON, C.

DUNN v. MACKEY. (No. 12,915.)

ATTACHMENT—WHEN LIES.

1. Defendant, by agreement in writing, bound himself absolutely to sell certain land belonging to plaintiff within a specified time, and to realize therefrom the sum of $12,500. He failed to sell, and plaintiff sued for $3,500 damages, alleging that the highest market value of the land between the date of the agreement and the commencement of the action was $9,000. To authorize attachment in an action for breach of contract, the statute (Code Civil Proc. Cal. §§ 537, 538) does not require that the amount due on the contract shall appear from the contract itself, but that the amount of the indebtedness shall be shown by affidavit. Held a proper case for attachment.

2. Defendant, after agreeing to sell for $12,000 within one year, agreed to account "for the proceeds of sale of said premises whenever, prior to the expiration of said twelve months, he may effect a sale of said premises." Held, that this was not an agreement to pay only on condition that a sale was made, but was an absolute promise to pay within the year, and to pay before the end of the year, if a sale should be sooner effected.

MCFARLAND, J., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; H. K. S. O'MELVENY, Judge.

Wicks & Ward, for appellant. Barclay, Wilson & Carpenter, for respondent.

WORKS, J. This is an appeal from an order dissolving an attachment. The complaint is founded on the following agreement: "This agreement, made and entered into on the 28th day of July, 1887, by and between C. E. Mackey, of the city and county of Los Angeles and state of California, who will be hereinafter referred to as the party of the first part, and Poindexter Dunn, of the county of St. Francis, and state of Arkansas, who will be hereinafter mentioned as the party of the second part, witnesseth, that the said second party, having this day purchased from said party of the first part, as agent for George D. Rowan, the following described lots of land situated in the city and county of Los Angeles and state of California, to-wit, lots numbered nineteen (19) and twenty (20) of the Dana tract, as per map recorded in Book 5, at page 324, of Miscellaneous Records of Los Angeles County, for the sum and price of ten thousand dollars, (10,000,) the said first party, for and in consideration of the sum of $1 cash in hand to him paid by the said second party, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, and of the covenants and agreements hereinafter mentioned and set forth, hereby agrees to take charge of and sell said lots of land for said second party as follows, to-wit: The said first party agrees and binds himself to sell said lots for said second party within twelve months from the date hereof, and to guaranty, account for, and pay over to said second party at least $12,500 net therefor, except interest paid by said second party on the deferred payment for said lots. Said second party agrees that said first party may retain and have, and said first party agrees to accept, all excess over said $12,500 which he may receive for said lots for his compensation for his services as agent herein. Said first party agrees to account to said second party, or his authorized agent, for the proceeds of sale of said premises as above stated, whenever, prior to the expiration of said twelve months, he may effect a sale of said premises. It is agreed that said first party may sell said lots for not less than one-half cash and the balance within twelve months from date of sale, with interest at 10 per cent. per annum. In witness whereof said first and second parties have hereunto set their hands and seals." The complaint alleges that the defendant failed and refused to sell the property as agreed upon, or at all; that the plaintiff was induced to buy the same by the promise of the defendant to resell the property as agreed in the contract; that he tendered a deed to the defendant and demanded that he pay him the sum agreed to be paid, and execute his note for the deferred payments as mentioned in the contract, and to account for and pay the money provided for in said contract. It is further averred "that the highest market value of said property described in the foregoing agreement was, upon the 28th day of July, 1888, and has been ever since, and still is, the sum of $9,000, and no more; that by virtue of of defendant's failure to keep and perform the terms and conditions of said contract, and by virtue of his breach thereof, as hereinabove set forth, this plaintiff has suffered damage in the sum of $3,500." The prayer of the complaint is for judgment for "$3,500, and for costs of suit, and for such other and further relief as to this honorable court may seem meet and proper.". The attachment was founded on this complaint. The respondent defends the action of the court below in dissolving the attachment on two grounds: First, that the complaint did not state a cause of action; second, that the suit was to recover unliquidated damages, and for that reason no attachment could properly issue. The objection to the complaint is that "there is no sufficient allegation of a breach of contract; that the contract was to sell as the agent of the plaintiff, and pay over the proceeds of the sale; not to pay $3,500 damages, or any sum, in case of failure to sell," and that "plaintiff attempts to treat defendant as a purchaser, tenders a deed and demands $12,500, and alleges damages upon that theory." We give these objections in the language of counsel for the reason that we do not understand what is meant sufficiently to attempt to state their point. The complaint is one for damages for the breach of a contract, and is sufficient. The contract sued on was not one of agency for the sale of real estate simply. The defendant positively bound himself to realize to the plaintiff, out of the property, within one year, the sum of $12,500. We see no reason why he should not be held liable in damages for a breach of such a contract, as well as any other. Janin v. Browne, 59 Cal. 37, 44. As to the other point, the proper measure of damages is the difference between the actual value of the land at the end of the year and the amount the defendant bound himself to realize from it to the plaintiff. Therefore, the simple question is whether an attachment properly issued upon a complaint which upon its face showed precisely what the damages were; the affidavit in attachment showing that the defendant was indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of $3,500, upon an express contract for the direct payment of the money. There is no uncertainty appearing on the face of the proceedings as to the amount actually due. At the trial the only thing necessary to fix and determine the amount is to prove the value of the land. The amount agreed to be realized and paid over to the plaintiff is fixed by the contract. Our Code does not require that the amount due on the contract shall appear from the contract itself, (Code Civil Proc. § 537,) but that the amount of the indebtedness shall be shown by affidavit, (Id. § 538.)

Attachment may issue in an action for damages for the breach of a contract. Donnelly v. Strueven, 63 Cal. 182. And this where proof is necessary at the trial to show the amount of damages. Drake, Attachm. §§ 13-23. But there must exist a basis upon which the damages can be determined by proof. Thus it is said, "where the contract sued upon furnished a standard by which the amount due could be so clearly ascertained as to enable the plaintiff to aver it in his affidavit, or the jury by their verdict to find it, an attachment might issue." Id. § 15; Wilson v. Wilson, 8 Gill, 192. To the same effect see Wade, Attachm. § 11 et seq.; Saw-Mill Co. v. Fowler, 28 Conn. 103; Lawton v. Reil, 51 Barb. 30; Lawton v. Reil, 34 How. Pr. 465; Ferner v. Collins, 1 Mart. (N. S.) 369; Cross v. Richardson, 7 Mart. (La.) 166. The case of Donnelly v. Strueven, supra, is in point. The action was to recover damages for the breach of a contract to buy and pay for certain personal property, and this court held that it appeared from the complaint, as well as from the affidavit, that the plaintiff's action was founded in contract, and not in tort, and therefore defendant's ground of motion was not well taken. It is true that the question of uncertainty as to the amount of the debt was not directly determined, but it existed there as clearly as in the case before us, and it was held that the attachment was properly issued. Counsel for respondent rely upon Hathaway v. Davis, 33 Cal. 165, as supporting their position, but it is directly against them. It was held that an appeal-bond was a contract for the direct payment of money, although the amount to be paid was not fixed by the instrument itself, and that attachment would lie. The court recognized the well-established rule that it is only necessary that the contract be such as to furnish information from which the amount can be ascertained, and said: "We think a clew is afforded in the next section, (121,) where the plaintiff is required to make a certain affidavit in order to procure an attachment. He must be able to swear, among other things, that the defendant is indebted in a certain sum, specifying the amount. This language excludes all causes of action for unliquidated sums of money, for, until they have been liquidated by the verdict of a jury, it is impossible for the plaintiff to swear to the amount, and confines the right of the plaintiff to an attachment to cases of contract, where the liability of the defendant can be ascertained with certainty, and is not in doubt until after a trial, or, in other words, where the amount to be paid is fixed by the terms of the contract, or can be readily ascertained from the information which it affords. Every such case is clearly within the policy of the attachment law, which is designed for the benefit of acknowledged creditors, and not those who may or may not turn out to be such, according to the finding of a jury. In such cases, the payment which has been promised, in a certain sense, may be said to be direct. While this view is not very satisfactory, it is more so than any other which finds color in the ambiguous words of the statute. There is, certainly, no reason why an attachment should be allowed in an action upon a promissory note which is not equally persuasive in the present case. The plaintiff can swear to the amount due with equal accuracy, and his right to recover is as clear, and his claim upon the law for the advantages of this remedy no less reasonable and just. True, the contract does not specify the precise amount to be paid, but it points directly to the instrument or record which does, which is all that is required. To read 'direct' as the opposite to 'collateral' would be to create a distinction of very doubtful foundation, and certainly opposed to the general policy of the act. To so read it would be to exempt all collateral contracts from the operation of the act. Indorsers, guarantors, sureties, and all others who undertake to pay or become responsible for the debts of another, could not be reached by attachment; and yet, there can be no good reason why they should be excepted. We are of the opinion that the legislature intended no such distinction." There can be no doubt that the defendant bound himself to realize and pay to the plaintiff, within one year, a certain and fixed sum of money. The fact that he was, if possible, to realize the money by a sale of property to some one else does not affect the question, as he bound himself unqualifiedly to account for and pay over that sum of money at the end of the year, or before, if he made a sale of the property. The plaintiff might, perhaps, have treated this as a binding contract to pay the money, and upon tendering him the deed have demanded payment from him according to its terms, and upon failure to have maintained an action for the whole sum. But he was not bound to do so. Having brought his suit for damages, the only evidence necessary to fix the amount due him is as to the value of the land. This is as easily done as it would be to prove what the services were worth, in an action on an implied contract for work done or upon an express contract to pay what the services were reasonably worth; and, certainly, such contracts would uphold an attachment. Counsel contend that the defendant bound himself to pay only on condition that he made a sale of the property; but we do not so construe the contract. He bound himself absolutely to sell and pay over the money within a year, and to pay before the end of the year, if he made sale of the property. Order reversed.

PEOPLE v. GOODHUE et al. (No 13,039.)

VACATING JUDGMENT.

A judgment rendered in 1865 cannot be vacated by motion in 1888, on the grounds of want of jurisdiction and payment of claim before suit, though Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 473, provides for such proceedings for certain causes within a limited time.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Tulare county; WILLIAM W. CROSS, Judge.

Davis & Allen, for appellant. W. R. Jacobs, (Lamberson & Taylor, of counsel,) for respondent.

WORKS, J. This is an appeal from an order denying a motion to vacate a judgment. The judgment was rendered October 30, 1865, and this motion was made December 31, 1888. We know of no provision of law which can be held to authorize the vacation of a judgment on a mere motion after so long a time. We have a provision authorizing such a proceeding within a limited time on certain grounds enumerated. Code Civil Proc. § 473; People v. Mullan, 65 Cal. 396, 4 Pac. Rep. 348. The motion here is made by the grantee of the judgment defendant, and is based on two grounds, viz., that the court rendering the judgment had not jurisdiction of the person of the defendant, and that he had, before the suit was brought, fully paid the sum of money which was the basis of the action. A judgment cannot be attacked in this informal way years after its rendition. Order affirmed.

We concur: SHARPSTEIN, J.; MCFARLAND, J.; THORNTON, J.

PATERSON, J. I concur in the judgment. If the judgment were void on its face, and the moving party had succeeded to the rights of the defendant, his motion would not be defeated by mere delay, however great, in seeking to have the judgment set aside, (People v. Mullan, 65 Cal. 396, 4 Pac. Rep. 348;) but neither of these things appears in this record. Goodhue, the moving party's grantor, was personally served with summons (including a copy of the complaint) five months prior to the entry of the judgment, and the evidence of assignment to appellant is incompetent and conflicting.

ONTARIO STATE BANK v. TIBBITS et al. (No. 13,007.)

CORPORATIONS—FORECLOSURE OF MORTGAGE.

1. Where a complaint by a corporation in foreclosure states a complete cause of action, but does not show that it filed its articles of incorporation in the county where the property to be foreclosed was situated, before suit, as provided by Civil Code Cal. § 299, its failure so to do is a matter of abatement to be specially pleaded, otherwise it is waived.

2. The allegations in the answer, that "plaintiff never was a corporation duly or otherwise organized under the laws of this state, nor a copartnership, nor an individual," do not raise that issue.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county; B. T. WILLIAMS, Judge.

H. C. Rolfe, for appellant. Rowell & Rowell, for respondents.

VANCLIEF, C. This action was to foreclose a mortgage executed by the defendant Amelia Tibbits to secure her promissory note to the plaintiff, a corporation organized under the laws of this state. The court below found that the note and mortgage were made and executed as alleged in the complaint, and that no part of the debt had been paid; but dismissed the action solely upon the ground that the plaintiff had never filed in the office of the county clerk of San Bernardino, in which the mortgaged property was situated, a copy of the copy of its articles of incorporation, as required by section 299 of the Civil Code, which section, in effect, provides that no corporation organized under the laws of this state shall maintain or defend any action in relation to property, or its rents, issues, and profits, until it shall have filed in the office of the county clerk "of the county in which such property is situated," such copy of the copy of its articles of incorporation filed in the office of the secretary of state. Although the complaint did not show that plaintiff had complied with this law, it nevertheless stated a complete cause of action. Phillips v. Goldtree, 74 Cal. 151, 13 Pac. Rep. 313.

The failure of the plaintiff to file a copy of its articles of incorporation in the office of the county clerk, being mere matter of abatement, should have been specially pleaded by the defendants, otherwise it was waived; yet the answer tendered no such issues, (Sweeney v. Stanford, 67 Cal. 635, 8 Pac. Rep. 444; Phillips v. Goldtree, 74 Cal. 151, 13 Pac. Rep. 313; Railroad Co. v. Pursell, 18 Pac. Rep. 887;) and the pleading thereof should be strictly construed, (Tooms v. Randall, 3 Cal. 440; Thompson v. Lyon, 14 Cal. 42; Larco v. Clements, 36 Cal. 132.) The only affirmative matter contained in the answer is the following: "For a separate answer and defense this defendant avers that plaintiff has not, and at the commencement of this action had not, legal capacity to sue; that plaintiff never was a corporation duly or otherwise organized under the laws of this state, nor a copartnership, nor an individual." That the plaintiff had not legal capacity to sue is purely and only a conclusion of law, and of itself tendered no issue of fact. The only issues of fact tendered by this plea related to the nature of the plaintiff, viz., was the plaintiff a corporation, or a copartnership, or an individual person? Upon these issues the court found for the plaintiff, to the effect that the plaintiff, at all the times mentioned in the complaint, was, and still is, a corporation. We are of opinion that the judgment should be reversed, and that the court below should be directed to give judgment for plaintiff upon the findings of fact and the facts admitted by the pleadings.

We concur: FOOTE, C.; HAYNE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is reversed and cause remanded, with instruction to the court below to render judgment for the plaintiff on the findings.

WORKS, J. I concur in the judgment on the ground that the Code does not require the filing of a copy of the copy of the articles of incorporation in the county where the original is on file.

THORNTON, J. I concur in the judgment on the ground that, conceding that the note and mortgage involved in the cause to be such property as is referred to in section 299 of the Civil Code, the plaintiff has complied with the requirements of the section by filing with the county clerk of San Bernardino county, where the mortgaged property is situate, and where the plaintiff bank was doing business when the note and mortgage were executed, its original articles of incorporation.

PEOPLE v. SWALM. (No. 20,497.)

COMMUNITY PROPERTY—LARCENY.

1. Personal ornaments purchased by a wife on her husband's credit, but without his authority, for which he afterwards pays, and which he never gave to her as her own, though she took and retained possession of them, are community property, and her possession being that of her husband, her consent to the taking thereof by one knowing the facts would not prevent such taking from being larceny.

2. Defendant having taken the property with the consent of the wife, with whom he was on terms of criminal intimacy, and attempted, under an assumed name, to convey it out of the state, and having, when arrested, falsely stated the property to be that of another person, and attempted to escape by the bribery of an officer, the evidence sufficiently shows his felonious intent to warrant his conviction of larceny.

3. The fact of defendant's adultery with the wife is relevant to show that he knew the taking to be without the husband's consent, and that he intended to deprive the husband of the property.

4. The court having informed the jury in the general charge that the law presumes ornaments in a wife's possession to be her separate property until the contrary is shown, it is not error to refuse an instruction reiterating that principle.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; D. J. MURPHY, Judge.

Seneca J. Swalm was indicted and convicted of the larceny of jewels alleged to be the property of Richard H. McDonald, Jr., and appeals.

Chas. B. Darwin, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Geo. A. Johnson, Flournoy & Mhoon, and Sawyer & Burnett, for the People.

FOOTE, C. The defendant was convicted of the crime of grand larceny, and from the judgment rendered upon the verdict of the jury and an order denying him a new trial he appeals. His first claim for the reversal of the judgment and order is that the property, consisting of certain valuable articles of jewelry, which he is alleged to have stolen, was not the property of the person alleged to be the owner thereof as charged, but was the separate property of his wife. There is evidence in the record which the jury evidently believed, and which it was their right so to do, which showed that the property in question was bought upon the credit of the husband, and was paid for by him; that the purchase of it by the wife was not authorized by him, but that he finally paid for it,—there being no evidence that either spouse purchased it with separate money. It also appears that the husband never gave the wife the property as her own, but made an effort to have it returned to the seller, but it was never returned, and it was afterwards given into the hands of the defendant by the wife, to be taken out of this state, after she had become connected with him. Swalm was arrested while endeavoring clandestinely, under an assumed name, to leave this state, and the property found in his possession. He endeavored to bribe the officer arresting him to allow him to proceed on his journey, without avail. His main defense is that the wife intrusted him with, or what at least he believed to be such, her separate property, to deposit for her in New York, and that he had no intent to steal any property from her husband. The property, as has been stated, when it came to the hands of the wife, was that which had been bought upon the husband's credit, billed to and paid for by him, costing several thousand dollars; it not appearing that the separate money of either spouse was used to pay for it. Being acquired after marriage, in this way, by either or both husband and wife, it became community property. Section 164, Civil Code. Thus acquired, it came to the possession of the wife from her husband, he having never given it to her as separate property. It remained common property when she handed it over to Swalm. The possession of the wife is that of the husband as to community property. Schuler v. Society, 64 Cal. 400, 1 Pac. Rep. 479. He had the title to it, and right of control over it. The wife's interest was a mere expectancy. Greiner v. Greiner, 58 Cal. 119.

The property being that of the husband, and in his possession, the sole question left for determination was, what was the intent of the defendant in taking and carrying it away? The evidence tended to show that he had seduced the wife, and had been handed the property by her to take away from the state; that he afterwards falsely declared it not to be her property, but that of a third party; that he was going away under an assumed name; that he tried to bribe the officer arresting him; and the other facts and circumstances in the case were, as we think, sufficient to warrant a belief in the minds of the jury either that the property was purchased by the wife, upon the husband's credit, at the instigation of the defendant, then having the intention, if he could, to steal it from both parties, and that the theft was afterwards consummated, or that he received the property from the wife, knowing it to be the husband's, and taken against his will, with a view to steal it. In either point of view, the larceny was complete; for it was the taking and carrying away with felonious intent the personal property of another.

The question of intent was a matter solely for the jury, and they have found against the defendant upon conflicting testimony, and, as we think, properly. Suppose the wife did consent to the taking away of the property of her husband, if the defendant took it with the felonious intent of depriving the husband of it, her consent when she had repudiated her relation of wife would not help him. 2 Bish. Crim. Law, §§ 873, 874, and cases cited. And the evidence tending to show adulterous intercourse between the defendant and the wife of the owner of the property was admissible and proper, as going to show that the defendant knew that the taking was against the will of the husband, and tending to show that the defendant took the same with intent to deprive the husband of it. The improper intercourse did not make the offense larceny, but it threw a clear light upon the intent of the taking, as showing that the wife's consent was without her husband's knowledge, against his will, and that the defendant knew the facts, and that his intention in taking it was to steal it from the husband. People v. Cole, 43 N. Y. 508.

There was no necessity, as the appellant contends, that the husband after the purchase should have reduced the property in dispute to manual possession; for, when acquired as it was, it became common property, and the wife's possession was the husband's.

The court instructed the jury that the exclusive possession of the wife of the property, being personal ornaments, would warrant the presumption that they were her separate property, and also that this presumption was liable to be rebutted. There was no evidence, as has been observed, that the jewelry had been purchased with the separate property of either spouse. There was the positive evidence of the husband that it had been acquired during the marriage; that he had never made a gift of it to her; and that it was not hers exclusively. This the jury believed, and that is sufficient.

The question as to the belief of the defendant when he took the jewels, as to the person to whom the property belonged, was for the jury. They found, as we think, properly, that he knew the property was that of the husband. There is nothing in the point that larceny in this state is different from what it is at the common law. Pol. Code, § 4468. The defendant was found guilty, not of "adulterous larceny," as he claims, of which crime there is no mention in our Penal Code, but of grand larceny, which is "the felonious stealing, taking, carrying, leading, or driving away the personal property of another," exceeding the value of $50. Pen. Code, §§ 484, 487.

It is contended by the appellant that it was error for the trial court to refuse an instruction that the possession of personal property by a wife creates a legal presumption that it belongs to her, which must be overcome by a party who would establish the contrary. The case was apparently tried in the court below, upon both sides, upon the theory claimed by the defendant here, that the possession of the wife of personal ornaments suitable to her condition, during the continuance of the community, creates a presumption of ownership in her, which is disputable. Conceding, without deciding, and for the purposes of this case only, notwithstanding what has been said by the appellate court in Meyer v. Kinzer, 12 Cal. 253, 254, that the appellant's view of the law as asked for in the refused instruction is correct, yet the court below in its charge to the jury had already said: "There are several presumptions of law which the Code says are disputable; that is to say, they may be controverted by other evidence, and which should control jurors in their action. And among these is that things which a person possesses are owned by him or her. And I charge you that the exclusive possession by a woman of personal ornaments, such as necklace, bracelets, and such articles as are usually worn by a woman in her condition of life, creates a legal presumption that they are hers, and the presumption increases in strength with the length of time that such possession continues." This was a full statement of the general principle involved in the instruction, and besides it was made applicable to the facts in evidence. A repetition of the general proposition of law, as claimed and asked for, was entirely unnecessary. Upon the whole record we perceive no prejudicial error, and advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

VERDICT.

Where answers to special interrogatories are not signed by the jury as a whole, nor by their foreman, as provided by Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 618, they are not effective for any purpose.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Luis Obispo county; D. S. GREGORY, Judge.

J. M. Wilcoxon, for appellant. Graves, Turner & Graves, for respondent.

WORKS, J. Action for money due on an account. Answer that the debt sued for was for money loaned by the plaintiff to the defendant for the purpose of engaging in the business of gaming and conducting the game of faro, the plaintiff to share in the profits to be realized from the game, and that the defendant had been discharged in insolvency. There was a general verdict for the plaintiff, and judgment was rendered accordingly. The appeal is from the judgment. A bill of exceptions shows that certain special interrogatories were submitted to the jury, and returned with the general verdict, with an answer to each appended thereto, but not signed by the jury or their foreman, and that the jury were polled, and answered that the verdict and these special answers were theirs. The only point made in the case is that the answers to these special interrogatories sustained the special defenses set up by the defendant, and entitled him to judgment, and that they should control the general verdict. But the answers to these special interrogatories must have been signed either by the jury as a whole, or by their foreman, to make them effective for any purpose. Code Civil Proc. § 618. There is no other way in which a general verdict or special findings can be authenticated. Counsel say that the failure to sign was a mere oversight, and the plaintiff made no objection to the answers being received without signing. If the jury had failed, by a mere oversight, to return any verdict at all, the oversight could not supply the omission. No more could it when the verdict was not signed. The fact that the plaintiff did not object cannot help the matter. It was the duty of the defendant, if he expected to rely upon the findings, to see that they were in proper form. Not having done so, he has no reason to complain. Judgment affirmed.

DANGLARDE v. ELIAS et al. (No. 12,945.)

WIFE'S DEED—SEPARATE ACKNOWLEDGMENT.

Civil Code Cal. §§ 1093, 1186, 1191, making a certificate of a married woman's separate examination and acknowledgment of a deed, and of the fact that it was explained to her, essential to its validity, does not except married women living separate from their husbands, and a conveyance by such a woman of land constituting her separate estate without such certificate is void, and this result is not affected by section 162, providing that a wife may convey her separate property without her husband's consent.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; H. K. S. O'MELVENY, Judge.

W. T. Williams, for appellants. H. H. Appel, C. C. Stephens, and G. Gordon Adam, for respondent.

WORKS, J. This action is brought by the respondent against the appellants to set aside a deed from the appellant Jesus G. Elias to his co-defendant, who is his mother, on the ground that the deed was made without consideration and for the purpose of defrauding his creditors, including the respondent. Several grounds for reversal are urged by the appellants, but we need only notice one, as it is decisive of the case.

It appears from the evidence that the apparent title of the appellant Elias to the property he is charged with having fraudulently conveyed away was derived through a deed from his mother to him; that his mother was at the time of the conveyance a married woman; that her husband had abandoned her; that they had been living separate and apart for 40 years; that she had for many years assumed and been known by her maiden name; that the property was paid for by her own earnings; that her husband was still living; that she and her son continued to occupy the land together since the making of said deed; that the certificate of acknowledgment to the deed was not in the form required in the case of a conveyance by a married woman, but in the form of an ordinary certificate of acknowledgment by a feme sole; that she was in fact examined separate and apart from her husband, and the contents of the instrument made known to her; that the deed charged in this case to have been fraudulent was a reconveyance of the property to her by her son, and that both deeds were without consideration. It is insisted by the appellants that under this state of facts the appellant Elias was never the owner of the property in controversy, and for that reason the respondent had no cause of action. This depends entirely upon the question whether an acknowledgment in the form required by the statute, in case of a conveyance by a married woman, proved by the certificate of the officer in proper form, was necessary.

The respondent contends that as the appellant who made the conveyance was separated from her husband for a number of years and abandoned by him, had assumed her maiden name, and had paid for the property out of her earnings, the reason of the law had ceased to exist, and therefore the statute was not applicable. The statute applies to all married women without exception, whether living with or apart from their husbands, and to all property, whether it is owned by her as her separate property or otherwise. Civil Code, §§ 1186, 1191. And in the case of a married woman the acknowledgment in the manner required by the Code is a part of the deed itself, necessary and essential to its validity. Id. §§ 1093, 1186, 1191; Wedel v. Herman, 59 Cal. 507; Leonis v. Lazzarovich, 55 Cal. 55; 1 Amer. & Eng. Cyclop. Law, 164, and cases cited. If the acknowledgment is in due form, the certificate of the officer is not necessary to the validity of the deed, (Wedel v. Herman, supra,) but may be supplied at a later day; but where a certificate is attached it is prima facie evidence of the fact that the deed was acknowledged, as therein indicated, and if it fails to show the examination and acknowledgment separate and apart from the husband, or any other essential to a due and sufficient acknowledgment, it will be presumed that such necessary acts were not done. The certificate may, in an action brought for that purpose, be corrected to conform to the facts where no new rights have intervened. Wedel v. Herman, supra.

There has been no proceeding to correct the certificate in this case, if it be true that the acknowledgment was in the manner required by law. We must presume, therefore, that the acknowledgment was in the ordinary form, and not as required in the case of a conveyance by a married woman, and so presuming, the deed to the debtor in this case was void and vested no title in him. The respondent relies upon section 162 of the Civil Code, which provides: "The wife may, without the consent of her husband, convey her separate property." Conceding that this was the separate property of the appellant, the section cited has no bearing upon the question we are considering. That section provides that she may convey without the consent of her husband, but the question here is, how may she convey? and that is expressly answered by the other sections above cited. As the appellant Elias had no title to the property in controversy at the time he made the conveyance alleged to have been fraudulent, such conveyance did not injure the respondent, or give her any cause of action. Judgment and order reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

YERIAN v. LINKLETTER. (No. 12,934.)

PUNITIVE DAMAGES—GROSS CARELESSNESS.

Under Civil Code Cal. § 3294, authorizing the recovery of punitive damages "in any action for the breach of an obligation not arising from contract, where the defendant has been guilty of oppression, fraud, or malice, actual or presumed," it is error to charge that if the plaintiff was injured by defendant's act, and "in doing such act defendant was grossly careless," punitive damages might be awarded, as it cannot be said that an act of gross carelessness is always an act done through "oppression, fraud, or malice, actual or presumed." THORNTON and WORKS, JJ., dissenting.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; H. K. S. O'MELVENY, Judge.

Action by John I. Yerian against John H. Linkletter for damages for personal injuries. Verdict and judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

M. J. Waldheimer and Shaw & Damron, for appellant. B. M. Marble and J. G. McCallum, for respondent.

FOOTE, C. Action for damages alleged to have been caused by the defendant driving his horse and vehicle on a street of the city of Los Angeles in such a negligent, careless, fast, and altogether reckless manner, and without ordinary care and caution, as to run over, knock down, and injure the plaintiff, etc. Judgment was given against the defendant, upon the verdict of a jury, in the sum of $800. From that and an order refusing a new trial the defendant appeals. The court instructed the jury in writing: "If the jury find from the testimony that the plaintiff was injured by the act of the defendant, as alleged in the complaint, and that in doing such an act the defendant was grossly careless, then the jury may give what is termed 'punitive,' 'vindictive,' or 'exemplary' damages; in other words, blend together the interests of society, and of the aggrieved individual, and give damages not only to recompense the sufferer, but to punish the offender, and not exceeding the amount claimed in the complaint."

From a bill of exceptions it appears that another instruction was embodied in the statement on motion for a new trial as originally prepared, as being erroneous, but the plaintiff moved as an amendment to the statement that it be struck out. The court granted the amendment, and the instruction was struck out. The defendant claims that the order striking it out is appealable, and may be reviewed in this proceeding. The statutory remedy for proving an exception, claimed to have been refused to be allowed by the judge, in accordance with the facts, has not been pursued, and the defendant's contention on the point is without force.

It is further claimed by him that the trial court erred in granting the instruction, supra. It may be said that there might be acts committed by an individual, resulting in the injury of another, of such altogether careless a character as to warrant the inference by a jury, from all the facts and circumstances surrounding the transaction, that the defendant, in an action where he was sued for damages for the injury inflicted, was guilty of "oppression, fraud, or malice, actual or presumed." But, while this is so, it does not follow that an instruction to the jury is proper under section 3294 of the Civil Code, which declares that "gross carelessness" of itself will warrant a verdict in vindictive or punitive damages. The language of that section is that such damages may be given "in any action for the breach of an obligation not arising from contract, where the defendant has been guilty of oppression, fraud, or malice, actual or presumed." It cannot be said that an act of gross carelessness is always an act done through fraud, oppression, or malice, actual or presumed. The evidence showing the grossly careless act may reveal malice, actual or presumptive, oppression, or fraud, but it is not to be said that such malice or oppression or fraud necessarily exists where "gross carelessness" is shown. The instruction under consideration gave the jury to understand that, upon gross carelessness being shown to have resulted in the plaintiff's injury, exemplary damages could be given, but did not state, further, that the ingredient of oppression or fraud or malice, "actual or presumed," must be shown in evidence to have existed on the part of the defendant in the doing of the grossly careless act. The instruction was not, therefore, in accordance with the statute, supra. We advise that the judgment and order be reversed.

I concur: HAYNE, C.

PATERSON, J., (concurring.) I do not think it can be said, as a matter of law, that vindictive or exemplary damages may be given in every case where there has been gross carelessness. It is only where the act was the result of willful misconduct—that reckless indifference of the rights of others which is tantamount to an intentional violation of them—that exemplary damages can be recovered, under section 3294, Civil Code. Where the misconduct shows such an entire want of care as would justify the jury in believing the party charged with negligence has been guilty of a conscious indifference to consequences, it may be said that "the defendant has been guilty of oppression, fraud, or malice, actual or presumed," within the meaning of those words as used in section 3294, supra. Sedgw. Dam. (6th Ed.) 570.

THORNTON, J. I dissent. I think the instruction referred to in the opinion is correct. The reckless driving proves oppression. If the defendant desired an explanatory instruction, he should have asked it. There was no error in the instruction as given.

DISCREPANCY IN BOUNDARIES.

Where the descriptions in a deed refer to a survey and a map based thereon, making both a part of the deed, and there is a discrepancy between the map and the survey, the latter will prevail.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; A. W. HUTTON, Judge.

Williams & McKinley and W. T. Williams, for appellant. Victor Montgomery and H. M. Smith, for respondents.

WORKS, J. This is an action of ejectment, and involves the question as to the location of the dividing line between the adjoining lands of the plaintiff and defendants. Each of the parties derived title from the same source, and their lands are described by reference to certain numbered lots on a designated map of a larger tract containing the lands claimed by both parties. This issue of fact was found in favor of the defendants, and judgment was rendered accordingly. The sole point urged here is that the findings are not sustained by the evidence. It is somewhat difficult to understand the evidence, and arrive accurately at the facts, by an examination of the record; but it seems that, taking the map referred to in the respective deeds of the parties alone, the dividing line is located as claimed by the plaintiff, but the field-notes of the survey, upon which the map is based, and the evidence of surveyors with reference to them, show, or at least tend to show, a mistake in the map, and that the survey locates the line as contended for by the defendants. The contention of the appellant is that the map referred to, and thereby made part of the deeds, is conclusive as to the location of the line, even as against the field-notes of the survey upon which it is founded. The case of Chapman v. Polack, 70 Cal. 487, 11 Pac. Rep. 764, is relied upon, but it does not support the appellant's position. There the government survey, and the map founded upon it, agreed, and it was attempted to show by a private survey that both were wrong. It was very properly held that this could not be done, and that the map was conclusive. The proof here was not offered to show by subsequent surveys that the line was improperly located by the survey and map, but that the field-notes of the survey showed it at one place and the map at another. Therefore the question here is whether the field-notes of a survey upon which a map is founded can be used, as evidence to show that the map is incorrect. The descriptions in the deeds refer, not only to the map, but to the survey, which make both parts of the deeds. In the absence of evidence to the contrary, it will be presumed that the map correctly represents the survey, and the latter need not be looked to; but, if it be shown that a discrepancy exists between the map and the survey upon which it is based, the latter must prevail. O'Farrel v. Harney, 51 Cal. 125; Penry v. Richards, 52 Cal. 496; Jackson v. Cole, 16 Johns. 256; Jackson v. Freer, 17 Johns. 31. This being the case, there was at least a substantial conflict in the evidence, and the judgment of the court below cannot be disturbed. Judgment and order affirmed.

DISTRIBUTION OF ESTATES—WRIT OF REVIEW.

1. The superior court in California may, within six months after the entry of a decree of distribution of an estate, set it aside on proper showing.

2. Where the notice of the motion to set the decree aside is defective, the order is not void on that account.

3. On an application for a writ of review of such order, the recitals in the order of the facts essential to jurisdiction are conclusive.

In bank. Application for writ of review to superior court, San Diego county; J. R. AITKEN, Judge.

J. E. Deakin, for petitioner. Hunsaker, Britt & Lamme, Smith, Howard & Smith, and Trippet & Neale, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. On the 23d day of June, 1888, after due proceedings had, a decree of distribution was made and entered in the superior court of San Diego county in the matter of the estate of Maria A. E. de Pedrorena, deceased. Within six months thereafter, to-wit, on December 20, 1888, the court, on motion of certain interested parties, vacated and set aside said decree of distribution. The petitioner herein now asks for a writ of review, claiming that the court exceeded its jurisdiction in making the order vacating the decree of distribution.

We think that the court had the power at any time within six months after the entry of the decree to set it aside on a proper showing. Estate of Hudson, 63 Cal. 454; Code Civil Proc. § 473. The applications were based on the grounds of mistake, inadvertence, and surprise, and fraud on the part of this petitioner. The order of the court is made a part of the petition herein, and it shows that affidavits of merit were presented to the court, and that all parties interested "were duly served with due notice of said motion," and that no one appearing to contest said motions, or either of them, the court proceeded to hear the same, and the respective petitions and affidavits in support thereof, and after due consideration, the court being convinced that justice required that said motions should be granted, the decree was set aside. Petitioner herein attempts to show that the notice was insufficient, but the most that can be said against its sufficiency is that it was defective merely, and the order is not void on that account. The recitals in the order of facts essential to jurisdiction are conclusive in this proceeding. The record cannot be amended or attacked, but must be taken as we find it, at least as to all matters of fact adjudicated therein. It is not a proper function of the writ of review to add to or modify the record with respect to jurisdictional facts determined therein, but to test the question of jurisdiction on the facts appearing on the face thereof. Freem. Judgm. §§ 126, 619; In re Grove St., 61 Cal. 453; Ex parte Sternes, 19 Pac. Rep. 275.

Other points are made against the validity of the order, but, conceding the facts alleged to be true, the remedy of petitioner, if any there be, is by motion in the court below to set aside the order. Application denied.

CONSIDERATION OF PROMISSORY NOTE.

Where defendant signed a note some months after its date and delivery by the original maker, and there was no extension of payment, nor promise of forbearance, she was not bound thereby.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; J. B. CAMPBELL, Judge.

Craig & Meredith, for appellant. Tupper & Tupper, for respondent.

BEATTY, C. J. Suit on promissory note. Defense, want of consideration. Judgment for plaintiff. Appeal by defendant from judgment and order denying a new trial. Appellant, in support of his appeal from the order, contends that the finding of the superior court of a sufficient consideration for the note is wholly unsupported by the evidence. The facts are that in 1883 Thomas Hildreth, the father of appellant, executed and delivered to the respondent his promissory note for $2,023. Subsequently, on August 1, 1885, having made a payment of $1,000 on account of this note, he executed and delivered the note in suit for the balance remaining unpaid, and the old note was thereupon surrendered. The new note was made payable one day after date; and some sixty days after its date and delivery, according to the admission of the respondent, or five months, as claimed by appellant, the appellant signed it. There is no material conflict of testimony as to the circumstances under which he added his signature to the note. Respondent was pressing his father for payment, and at the father's request the son signed. There was no extension of credit, no promise of forbearance, written or oral. Some attempt was made to show that the appellant had some advantage or share in the money loaned or advanced by the respondent at the date of the first note, but it amounted only to this: that the money was used in the business of a firm of which appellant and his father were members; but the evidence to this effect was hearsay and incompetent, and admitted over appellant's objection. Even if it had been proved by competent testimony that the money advanced at the date of the original note went into the firm, or was used in the business of a partnership of which appellant and his father were members, it would not follow that appellant was under any obligation to repay it or any part of it. It was loaned to his father upon his note, and, if he used it in the firm business, the presumption is he got credit for it in the partnership accounts. The authorities cited and relied upon by respondent are not in point. They are to the effect that, if the payee parts with his money on the faith of a promise by the borrower that he will procure the signature of a surety to his note, the surety is bound if he sign the note after the money is advanced; but such is not the case here. We think the findings of the superior court in the particulars indicated are against all the evidence, and the order denying a new trial is therefore reversed, and the cause remanded.

ALIMONY PENDENTE LITE.

Civil Code Cal. § 137, empowering the court, in its discretion, to require the payment of alimony by a husband to a wife, pending an action for a divorce, when necessary to the support of herself or children, or the prosecution or defense of the action, invests the court with nothing but a legal discretion, reviewable on appeal, and an order granting such alimony will be reversed when it appears that the wife occupies the homestead, which yields a good income; that she is in no immediate need of money; that the property enjoyed by her is more valuable and productive than that held by the husband; and that he is maintaining the greater number of their children.

In bank. Appeals from superior court, Inyo county; JOHN A. HANNAH, Judge.

P. W. Forbes, Geo. M. Gill, and A. C. Ellish, for appellant. John W. P. Laird and A. R. Conklin, for respondent.

BEATTY, C. J. These are appeals from orders granting the plaintiff alimony and counsel fees, pending a suit for divorce. Her action is upon the ground of cruelty, and there is a cross-action by the defendant upon grounds of cruelty and desertion. The motion for alimony was based upon the pleadings, and upon an affidavit of the plaintiff in which she alleges, in the most general terms, that she is in bad health, unable to labor and earn a living, in indigent circumstances, and without money or other means to support herself and carry on her suit. On information and belief she charges that the defendant is possessed of large means. All her allegations are so vague and general as to render it very doubtful if perjury could be assigned upon any one of them, however false they may be. In opposition to her motion the defendant filed his own affidavit, supported by those of seven witnesses,—apparently disinterested and well informed as to the matters in dispute,—from which and from the pleadings it is made to appear that the plaintiff is in good health; that there are six children of the marriage, the eldest being thirteen and the youngest three years of age; that before commencing her action for divorce she induced the defendant to convey to her the quarter section of land upon which they had their family residence; that she thereupon turned the defendant and four of the children out of doors, allowing only two of the younger ones to remain with her; that she has since been in receipt of an income of from $800 to $1,000 per annum rents of said quarter section, exclusive of the dwelling-house, which she retains for her own use. One of the affiants swears that he has recently purchased from plaintiff hay to the value of $324, of which sum $174 remain due, which he has been and is willing to pay, but the plaintiff has frequently told him she does not need it. The defendant sets out a list of all his personal property, consisting of stock of the value of $700, and farming implements of the value of $500, and $50 in money, all absolutely necessary to enable him to carry on his farm and support himself and the four children under his care. The affidavits of the other witnesses show that the land owned by defendant, and in his possession, is much less valuable and productive than the homestead quarter section which is in the possession of and claimed by the plaintiff. These affidavits filed by and on behalf of the defendant, including his cross-complaint, may be altogether false, but they contain many specific statements of fact which, if false, would sustain charges of perjury, and which, in the absence of any denial or rebutting evidence, must be accepted as true. So regarded they show that the defendant's burdens and necessities are greater, and his means and ability to sustain them less, than are the plaintiff's. The court, however, without any findings of fact, ordered the defendant to pay to the plaintiff $50 a month for her support pending the action, and made a further order that he pay to her attorneys $500 counsel fees within 10 days from the date thereof, and rendered judgment therefor. From this order the defendant appealed. Two days after service of his notice of appeal the court amended or modified the order so appealed from by directing payment of the $500 to the plaintiff, to enable her to prosecute the action. This amendment seems to have been made to meet the objection to a similar order in the case of Sharon v. Sharon, 75 Cal. 1, 16 Pac. Rep. 345. From the order so amended the defendant again appealed, and these are the two appeals which we are considering together.

A number of points are made and fully argued by appellant in support of his appeals. The respondent has offered no argument in reply. Under the circumstances we feel indisposed to discuss or to decide any point a decision of which is unnecessary, and, as the whole matter may be disposed of upon the ground that the showing on the part of the plaintiff was insufficient to justify the original order, we shall rest our decision upon that ground alone. It is provided by section 137 of the Civil Code that "when an action for divorce is pending the court may, in its discretion, require the husband to pay as alimony any money necessary to enable the wife to support herself or her children, or to prosecute or defend the action." There is nothing new in this provision of the Code, and the discretion with which it invests the court is not an arbitrary power, but is the same legal discretion exercised by courts having jurisdiction of the action of divorce antecedent to, and independent of, express statutory authority. It is a discretion to be exercised in view of the circumstances of the parties, their several necessities, and the pecuniary ability of the husband. A sum absolutely small may be relatively excessive, and where, as in this case, the wife is plaintiff, where she has possession of the homestead, where she has burdened herself with but two out of six young children, where her property, or that which she enjoys the use of, is more valuable and productive than the husband's, and where, as above stated, it appears that his burdens and necessities are greater, and his means less, than hers, it is an excess of any discretionary power of the court to award temporary alimony. The orders appealed from are reversed.

RODRIGUEZ DE CAZARA v. ORENA. (No. 12,933.)

QUIETING TITLE.

1. Where land is conveyed by a deed absolute in form, to secure an indebtedness, the owner of the equitable title cannot have the same quieted without a payment of the debt, though it be barred by the statute of limitations.

2. In such case defendant, who had been in possession of the land or in receipt of the rents and profits, must account for the same, to be credited on the original debt.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Santa Barbara county; R. M. DILLARD, Judge.

R. B. Canfield, for appellant. W. C. Stratton, for respondent.

BEATTY, C. J. This is a suit to quiet title. The complaint is in the usual form, unverified. The answer is a general denial of all the allegations of the complaint, except that defendant claims an interest in the property adverse to the plaintiff, followed by a plea of the statute of limitations. The finding of the superior court was against the defendant as to his claim under the statute, but the court found as follows concerning the title: On January 16, 1877, the lot in controversy was the property of Bernarda Rodriguez, who on that day mortgaged it to the defendant, Orena, to secure the payment of her promissory note of even date, payable in one year. On August 17, 1878, her note being unpaid, Bernarda Rodriguez executed, acknowledged, and delivered to Orena a deed in the form of an absolute conveyance of said lot, but this was only intended as security, it being orally agreed at the time that Orena might sell the lot, pay himself out of the proceeds, and that any balance over should be paid to the plaintiff in this action. Orena has never sold the lot, and no part of the note has been paid. He has no title to the lot except such as he may have acquired by said deed of Bernarda Rodriguez, and the plaintiff has succeeded to all the title remaining in Bernarda after her deed to Orena. Upon these findings the superior court decreed a reconveyance of the lot upon payment by plaintiff to defendant of the amount due him on account of said note of Bernarda Rodriguez. The plaintiff appeals from the judgment, contending that she is entitled to a reconveyance, and to have her title quieted without payment. She asks us to direct a modification of the decree in accordance with this contention. We do not think this case can be distinguished, on the facts found, from that of Booth v. Hoskins, 75 Cal. 271, 17 Pac. Rep. 225, where it was held that the plaintiff could not have his title quieted except upon condition of payment of the debt to secure which he had mortgaged the land, notwithstanding the debt was barred by the statute of limitations. The decree here follows that decision, the correctness of which we see no reason to question, but the facts found, and upon which this decree rests, are outside the issues made by the pleadings, and wholly unsupported by them. For this reason alone, and because the defendant, if he had been in possession of the lot or in reception of the rents and profits, is bound to account for them, or the value of the use and occupation, to be credited upon the amount of his note, the judgment must be reversed. It is therefore ordered that the judgment be reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings, with leave to the defendant to amend his answer or to file a cross-complaint, and with leave to plaintiff also to amend if she be so advised.

CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO v. ITSELL et al. (No. 12,952.)

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—DEEDS.

1. The city of San Francisco, to settle private land claims by ordinance passed in 1855, authorized the mayor to enter the land at the land-office, and to hold it in trust for those in actual possession. It was also provided that part of the land should be laid out as public squares, and this was done, one of the squares being called "Hamilton Square." Act Cal. March 11, 1858, ratified this ordinance, but no entry was ever made. Act Cong. July 1, 1864, relinquished to the city the land within its limits for the uses specified in the ordinance mentioned. T. had a claim to the land included in Hamilton square, and compromised with the city by conveying part of the land to it, and receiving in return a conveyance for another part thereof. These deeds were made in pursuance of an ordinance, and were ratified by an act of the legislature. Held, that the conveyance by the city was void, as it held the land in trust for the public.

2. A judgment in an action by T.'s grantee against the city, quieting plaintiff's title to the land in controversy, bars a recovery of the land in ejectment by the city against the grantees of said plaintiff; the city having no other title than that held by it before the judgment. Following San Francisco v. Holladay, 17 Pac. Rep. 942.

3. When a complaint by a city is unverified, the answer need not be verified, under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 446, providing that an answer shall be sworn to when the complaint is verified, or the plaintiff is the state or any state officer suing officially.

4. Want of verification of an answer is waived by going to trial without objection.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; F. W. LAWLER, Judge.

Ejectment by the city and county of San Francisco against Andrew J. Itsell and others. In 1855 the city of San Francisco passed an ordinance intended to assist in the settlement of private land claims within its municipal limits. By it the mayor was directed to enter all the land in the city at the land-office, and the grant, when obtained, was to inure to the benefit of those in actual possession of the land. Certain public squares were to be laid out in the land so granted. No entry was made, but the council passed another ordinance, under which it proceeded to lay out squares, among which was Hamilton square, the land in controversy. March 11, 1858, the legislature ratified these two ordinances, reciting them literally. Act Cong. July 1, 1864, relinquished to the city all the land within its corporate limits, for the uses and purposes specified in the ordinance of 1855.

It was contended that more land was taken for Hamilton square than was authorized by the ordinance. One Edward Tompkins claimed land including that now in controversy, and he compromised with the city by conveying to it certain parts of the land, and receiving a conveyance of other parts; these conveyances being pursuant to an ordinance of the city. This ordinance, as stated in the opinion, was afterwards ratified by the legislature. Defendants claimed under Tompkins, and Tompkins under the deed from the city. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals.

Flournoy & Mhoon, and Geo. Flournoy, Jr., for appellant. Wm. & Geo. Leviston, Thos. D. Riordan, Geo. A. Knight, Jarboe, Harrison & Goodfellow, P. F. Dunne, A. H. Loughborough, H. A. Powell, Tobin & Tobin, Stanley, Stoney & Hayes, H. C. Campbell and Thos. F. Barry, for respondents.

HAYNE, C. This was an action of ejectment brought by the city against numerous defendants for a tract of land known as "Hamilton Square." As to a number of the defendants, it was found that they "are not and were not, at the commencement of this action, in the occupation or possession of the premises described in the complaint, or any part thereof." No question is made as to the correctness of the judgment in favor of these defendants. Judgment passed in favor of the other defendants upon two grounds, which are set forth in the findings. The plaintiff does not bring up any of the evidence, but contends that the judgment should be reversed upon the findings.

1. In July, 1869, a compromise was agreed upon between the city and one Edward Tompkins, who claimed a tract including the premises in controversy. By this compromise the officers of the city, under an ordinance of the board of supervisors, executed to Tompkins a conveyance of the premises in controversy, and in consideration thereof Tompkins conveyed to the city the other portion of the tract claimed by him. The ordinance and deeds were subsequently ratified by act of the legislature. The defendants claim through Tompkins. We think that this defense cannot be sustained. The city held the square in trust for the public, and had no power to dispose of it by way of compromise or in any other manner; nor could the legislature ratify such a disposition of the trust property. In Hoadley v. San Francisco, 50 Cal. 275, the court said, with reference to this same square: "The title was granted to the city in trust for public use, and the city had no authority by virtue either of the statute of March 11, 1858, or of the act of congress of July 1, 1864, to alienate or in any manner dispose of it, but only to hold it for the purposes expressed in the statute. It was granted to the city for public use, and is held for that purpose only. It cannot be conveyed to private persons, and is effectually withdrawn from commerce; and, the city having no authority to convey the title, private persons are virtually precluded from acquiring it." This case was approved and followed in Sawyer v. San Francisco, Id. 375, and in Hoadley v. San Francisco, 70 Cal. 324, 12 Pac. Rep. 125, which was affirmed by the supreme court of the United States upon writ of error. 124 U. S. 646, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 659. The rule, therefore, that the city holds property like this in trust, and cannot convey it, must be considered as settled.

2. The defendants, however, pleaded and proved a judgment brought by their predecessor in interest against the city, and rely upon such judgment as a bar to the action. And this position must be sustained. It appears that Tompkins conveyed to one Edward F. Palmer, and it is found that on September 11, 1869, Palmer commenced an action against the city in the late Fifteenth district court to quiet his title; that the city appeared and contested said action, and that the issue was whether Palmer or the city had the title; that this issue was determined in favor of Palmer; and that judgment was thereupon entered, by which it was "ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the plaintiff, Edward F. Palmer, was at the commencement of said action, and still was, the lawful owner, in fee-simple absolute, of the premises described in the complaint therein, and that the said defendant, the city and county of San Francisco, had not any estate, right, title, or interest therein; and that said defendant, the city and county of San Francisco, be, and by said judgment was, forever thereafter enjoined, restrained, and debarred from asserting or claiming any estate, right, title, or interest in said premises, or any part thereof." It does not appear whether any appeal was taken from this judgment, but it is found that it "still remains in full force and effect, not reversed or otherwise vacated," and that the city "has no other or different title or claim of title to the premises in controversy than it had at the time of the commencement of said action of Edward F. Palmer." The defendants are successors in interest of Palmer. Upon these findings we think it clear that the Palmer judgment is a bar to the action. This precise question was decided in San Francisco v. Holladay, 76 Cal. 18, 17 Pac. Rep. 942, and that decision is conclusive of this branch of the case.

3. It is argued for the appellant, however, that the answers of the defendants herein were required to be verified, and, not having been so, should be disregarded. But, in the first place, the answers were not required to be verified. The only statute to which counsel for the city refer in support of their position is section 446 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides, among other things, that the answer must be verified "when the complaint is verified, or when the state, or any officer of the state, in his official capacity, is plaintiff." The complaint was not verified, and the city is not the state, or an officer thereof. The case of Stockton v. Dahl, 66 Cal. 378, 5 Pac. Rep. 682, is not in point. In that case there was a statute which expressly required the answer to be verified. In the second place, it appears from the findings that the case "was tried upon the issues raised by the complaint and the answers of the defendants," (specifying them;) and the plaintiff cannot go to trial without objection for the want of a verification, and raise the point for the first time after the decision has gone against him, (see Arrington v. Tupper, 10 Cal. 465; McCullough v. Clark, 41 Cal. 302.) We therefore advise that the judgment be affirmed.

We concur: Foote, C.; Gibson, C.

Per Curiam. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is affirmed.

Thornton, J., took no part in the decision of the above cause.

Dear v. Varnum. (No. 12,845.)

Recovery of Taxes Paid.

1. A complaint in an action to recover taxes paid under protest, which alleges that the assessment did not show "the number, kind, amount, and quality" of the personal property assessed, is demurrable; it being sufficient if the assessment shows generally the character of the property, under Pol. Code Cal. § 3650, providing that a failure to enumerate personal property in detail shall not invalidate the assessment.

2. Such complaint does not show payment of the tax under duress or coercion, where there is an allegation that the delinquent list had been published, but none that there was seizure or threat of seizure of plaintiff's property, or that he had any real estate on which the judgment would be a lien; and a protest at the time of payment does not divest it of its voluntary character.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; J. R. Aitkin, Judge.

J. E. Deakin, for appellant. J. L. Copeland, for respondent.

Vanclief, C. This is an action to recover back certain taxes upon personal property paid by the plaintiff to the defendant as tax collector of San Diego county, under protest. The complaint alleges, in substance, that the assessment of plaintiff's personal property for taxes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, was illegal and void, for the reason that it did not show the "number, kind, amount, and quality" of the personal property attempted to be assessed; that on or about the 16th day of February, 1888, the delinquent tax-list for the preceding fiscal year had come into the hands of the defendant as tax collector, and the publication thereof had been commenced; and that on said day plaintiff paid to the defendant the amount of personal taxes demanded of him, to-wit, the sum of $238.15, and 5 per cent. penalty and costs, and at the same time protested against the payment thereof, upon the ground that the assessment thereof was illegal and void for the reason above stated. An amendment to the original complaint averred, in substance, that prior to the assessment plaintiff furnished to the assessor, in conformity to section 3629 of the Political Code, a written statement under oath, setting forth specifically all the real and personal property owned by plaintiff, or in his possession, or under his control, at 12 o'clock M. on the first Monday in March, 1887, and that the assessment was made in an assessment book prepared by the assessor, with appropriate headings, alphabetically arranged. To the amended complaint the defendant interposed a general demurrer, which was sustained, and upon failure of plaintiff to further amend his complaint judgment was rendered for the defendant, from which the plaintiff brings this appeal. The complaint does not set forth a copy of the assessment, nor does it disclose the contents of the written statement furnished by plaintiff to the assessor, nor allege that the assessment did not conform, in its description of property, to the description contained in the statement furnished by plaintiff, nor show wherein it differed therefrom. Assuming the statement furnished to have been such as the law required, it must be presumed, in support of the assessment, unless the contrary is alleged, that the description in the assessment was identical with that contained in the statement. But whether the statement was correct or not, if the assessor adopted the description furnished by the plaintiff, the latter will not be heard to complain of its indefiniteness. San Francisco v. Flood, 64 Cal. 504, 2 Pac. Rep. 264; Cadwalader v. Nash, 73 Cal. 43, 14 Pac. Rep. 385.

The Political Code (section 3650) expressly provides that a failure to enumerate personal property in detail does not invalidate the assessment thereof. The complaint, without describing the assessment, merely alleges conjunctively that the assessment did not show "the number, kind, amount, and quality" of the personal property. This negative allegation is pregnant with the affirmative admission that the assessment did show at least three of these requisites, and is not a positive allegation that the assessment failed to show any particular one of the four; yet, under the provisions of the Code, the assessment is sufficient if it shows generally the kind or quality of personal property, so that the taxpayer may know for what property he is taxed. San Francisco v. Flood, supra.

The complaint is further insufficient, in that it fails to show that the payment of the personal taxes was made under duress or coercion. The complaint merely alleges that the delinquent list was being published, but does not allege that any real property was assessed to or owned by the plaintiff upon which the assessment of personal property became a lien. Therefore the allegation as to the publication of the delinquent list has no relevancy to the question of coercion. There is no allegation of any seizure of, or of any threat or attempt to seize, plaintiff's property. In the absence of acts amounting to duress or coercion, the payment of the tax was voluntary; and the mere protest made at the time of payment does not divest it of its voluntary character. Where there is no legal compulsion, the legal effect of the payment is not impaired by a protest. McMillan v. Richards, 9 Cal. 417; Bucknall v. Story, 46 Cal. 597; Bank v. Webber, 52 Cal. 73; Wills v. Austin, 53 Cal. 152; Brumagim v. Tillinghast, 18 Cal. 266. We think the judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: Foote, C.; Hayne, C.

Per Curiam. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is affirmed.

Lakeside Ditch Co. v. Crane et al. (No. 12,296.)

Water-Courses—Diversion—Corporations.

1. In an action by a lower against upper appropriators to determine who has the superior right to divert the water of the stream, a finding that plaintiff has adversely appropriated the waters of the stream, "the waters so diverted and used being sufficient to fill its ditch, whenever there was water in the stream to fill it, and when there was not sufficient water to fill the plaintiff's said ditch it took what water came down the creek in its natural flow," is indefinite and uncertain. If plaintiff diverted only the water that defendants allowed to pass plaintiff acquired no right as against defendants to a supply of water sufficient to fill its ditch.

2. As the defendants had no interest by virtue of prior appropriation, it was immaterial that plainiff had not obtained permission to construct its ditch from the water commissioners, in compliance with St. Cal. 18 8, p. 112, which provides that "no ditch shall hereafter be taken out of any stream in the waters of which different persons have an interest by virtue of prior appropriation, without leave of said commissioners." Nor does the fact that defendants had obtained the consent of the commissioners give them any right against plaintiff, the prior appropriator.

3. The defendants not having denied that they diverted the water, evidence of diversion by other ditches above defendant's, which other ditches were later in time of diversion than both plaintiff's and defendants', was properly excluded.

4. The findings should state the quantity of water the plaintiff is entitled to have flow past the defendant's ditch in inches or gallons, and not merely by fixing the width, depth, and grade of the ditch.

5. Where it appears that plaintiff was recognized in the community as a corporation, and its records show that it was acting as a corporation, and in all its dealings was styled as a corporation, and that it had held corporate meetings, and pursued corporate forms of action, sufficient is shown to bring it within the provisions of Civil Code Cal. § 358, which declares that "the due incorporation of any company claiming in good faith to be a corporation, and doing business as such, shall not be inquired into collaterally in any private suit to which such de facto corporation may be a party."

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Tulare county; WILLIAM W. CROSS, Judge. Brown & Daggett and Mich. Mullany, for appellants. Atwell & Bradley, M. S. Babcock, and Jarboe, Harrison & Goodfellow, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. This is an action between rival appropriators to determine who has the superior right to divert water from Cross creek, a natural water-course flowing through Tulare county. Plaintiff claims that the defendants have no right to any water until its ditch has been first supplied to its full capacity, and the court so decided. The findings of the court are in several respects quite uncertain. It is found that on the 1st day of May, 1874, plaintiff took out and diverted through its ditch, under a claim of right, openly and adversely to the whole world, water "sufficient to fill its ditch, which was and is thirty feet wide on the bottom, and forty-six feet wide on top, and four feet deep, with a fall of one foot to the mile. And from the 1st day of May, 1874, so openly, peaceably, notoriously, and adversely continued to appropriate and use the waters of said stream, the waters so diverted and used being sufficient to fill its ditch whenever there was water in the stream [Cross creek] to fill it, and when there was not sufficient water to fill the plaintiff's said ditch it took what water came down the creek in its natural flow." In view of the fect that the defendants' ditches divert water at points higher on the stream than the plaintiff's, it may be true, as stated by the court, that the plaintiff has continuously, since 1874, diverted water sufficient to fill its ditch whenever there was water in the stream to fill it, and, when there was not sufficient water to fill it, that it took what water came down the creek in its natural flow, and yet plaintiff might not have acquired any right, as against defendants, to a supply of water sufficient to fill its ditch. If the plaintiff's ditch was simply diverting water which the defendants allowed to pass down the stream while the head-gate of their ditch was closed, the act of the plaintiff in diverting the water thus permitted to pass down the stream could not, in the nature of things, be adverse to the right of the defendants. The latter could not complain, and title by prescription cannot be acquired, unless the acts constituting the adverse use are of such a nature as to give a cause of action in favor of the person against whom those acts are performed. Title by prescription is created in such cases only where the conduct of the party who submits to the use by another cannot be accounted for on any other hypothesis than that which raises the presumption of the grant of an easement. The conduct of the party claiming the benefit of the presumption must in all cases have been such in itself as to give the other party the right to complain. The defendants having no right to complain in the first instance, "we are not driven to the presumption of the grant of an easement to account for why they did not complain." Hanson v. McCue, 42 Cal. 310. If this finding is material, therefore,—and perhaps it is not, because plaintiff's right seems to be based upon prior appropriation,—it should be made more definite.

The court found that "neither the defendants nor their ancestors or grantors have at any time prior to the construction of the ditch complained of, to-wit, the month of May, 1884, claimed or asserted any right to the waters of Cross creek adversely to the plaintiff," and that the defendants' ditch from the time of its construction in 1876 until May, 1884, "carried away no appreciable quantity of water," but these findings are not supported by the evidence. The evidence shows without substantial conflict that the Hyde ditch, owned by defendants, was finished and commenced to divert water in the spring of 1876, and that those who have owned and controlled it have ever since continuously, uninterruptedly, and under a claim of right, adverse to all the world, during the irrigating season of each year, diverted water through the same from Cross creek for the purposes of irrigation. There is evidence tending to show an interference with the Hyde ditch, but it is so slight that those who performed the acts of interruption may be regarded simply as trespassers, and the intrusions not long enough to raise a presumption that those in possession of the ditch knew of the trespass, or sufficient to show a break in the continuity of the adverse use. As between the parties hereto there is no question of riparian rights, and, in view of the evidence as to the uninterrupted use by defendants of their ditch, it is immaterial, so far as the quantity of water diverted by the Hyde ditch is concerned, that the plaintiff's original appropriation of the water was prior to that of the defendants. There is some evidence tending to show that the Hyde ditch was enlarged about the year 1882, and its carrying capacity greatly increased; but the defendants are entitled to a finding as to the quantity of water carried by their ditch during its uninterrupted use by them prior to 1882. It is clear that the ditch carried away an appreciable quantity of water. How much—what quantity—we do not pretend to say. It is for the trial court to determine that matter.

Appellants claim that the plaintiff shows no right whatever to divert water because it never obtained permission of the water commissioners of Tulare county to construct a ditch, or divert water. This contention is based upon section 3 of a statute appointing water commissioners for Tulare county. The section provides: "No ditch shall hereafter be taken out of any stream in the waters of which different persons have an interest, by virtue of prior appropriation, without leave of said commissioners." St. 1868, p. 112. The defendants have no interest in the waters of the stream "by virtue of prior appropriation." No prior appropriators are complaining of any act of the plaintiff. It is not claimed that there has been any appropriation of any of the waters of Cross creek below the ditch of plaintiff, and in the absence of such appropriation no one can be injured by the act of plaintiff. The fact that defendants obtained the permission of the water commissioners to build their ditch and divert water does not give them any right as against the plaintiff herein, who was a prior appropriator. The statute does not confer upon the board of water commissioners the right to take away the interest which a prior appropriator has in the waters of a stream.

We think that the evidence in support of the finding that the plaintiff was a corporation, acting in good faith as such, is sufficient. It was recognized in the community as a corporation, the record of its proceedings show that it was so acting, and in all its dealings it was styled as a corporation; it has pursued corporate forms of action, held corporate meetings, and, we think, comes within the provisions of section 358 of the Civil Code, which provides that "the due incorporation of any company claiming in good faith to be a corporation, and doing business as such, shall not be inquired into collaterally in any private suit to which such de facto corporation may be a party." Railroad Co. v. Plumas Co., 37 Cal. 361.

The defendants offered to prove that there were other ditches diverting water from the creek above defendants ditches, which other ditches were later in time of diversion than either plaintiff's or defendants' ditches. The court did not err in refusing to admit this proof. The defendants did not deny that they diverted the water. There was, therefore, no doubt as to who did divert the water. The fact that other persons may have invaded the plaintiff's right was immaterial.

The ruling of the court in admitting evidence as to who had the control and management of the Lakeside ditch is inconsistent with its ruling upon the same subject when evidence was offered in behalf of the defendants. We think the court erred in excluding the latter.

We have considered other assignments of error made by appellant, but see nothing prejudicial in any of them. As the case must go back for a new trial, it is proper to suggest that the findings of the court upon the question, what quantity of water the plaintiff was entitled to have flow past defendants' ditches, should, if possible, be made definite by naming the number of inches or gallons, instead of by fixing the width, depth, and grade of the ditch. A finding that plaintiff is entitled to have its ditch supplied to its full capacity may lead to future disputes and litigation. In view of the character of the soil the capacity of the ditch is likely to change rapidly.

Appellant complains that under the decision of the court as it stands "plaintiff would be relieved from all diligence and exertion in maintaining a dam, or securing the waters of the creek from running idly and wastefully past the head of the Lakeside ditch, and the defendants would be wantonly deprived of the water for their ditches, while all other ditches heading upon this creek might be amply supplied with water, and while abundance of water would be running waste." Of course, if the plaintiff does not use proper care to preserve the water which passes the head of the defendants' ditch to it, the plaintiff cannot complain that its ditch is not supplied with water. Judgment and order reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: McFARLAND, J.; SHARPSTEIN, J.

BEATTY, C. J., (concurring.) As I construe the findings of the superior court they show with sufficient clearness that, from the completion of plaintiff's ditch in 1874 down to the year 1884, it has continuously diverted water sufficient to fill said ditch, excepting only when the natural flow of the stream (Cross creek) was insufficient to fill it, and that at such times it diverted all of such natural flow; that the Hyde ditch of defendants, as originally constructed in 1876, diverted no appreciable quantity of water, but that after, and only after, the enlargement of the Hyde ditch in 1882, and the subsequent construction of the Manning ditch, the defendants have been diverting water included in plaintiff's appropriation. I should not therefore regard the findings as insufficient in this respect, even if the plaintiff's right was founded exclusively upon prescription. But the truth is plaintiff's right rests upon a prior appropriation, and does not need to be supported by proof of uninterrupted user, and if the findings require the construction placed upon them in the opinion of the court, the fault seems to me to be immaterial. The defendants, on the other hand, must rely upon prescription to justify a diversion of any water previously appropriated by the plaintiff, and upon that point I do not consider that the finding of the superior court against defendants' claim is so clearly unsupported by the evidence as to justify us in reversing it. The testimony seems to be entirely consistent with the view that from 1876 to 1884 the original, unenlarged Hyde ditch diverted no appreciable quantity of water, except when the stream was high and water abundant. As to the offer of the defendants to show that other persons, not parties to the action, had taken out water higher up the stream by means of ditches constructed later than any diversion by plaintiff or themselves, and that such more recent diversions of water were the real cause of the injury to plaintiff, I think the ruling of the court excluding the testimony was correct in the present state of the pleadings. To make such testimony material, defendants should set up in their answer the facts showing the necessity of making such third persons parties to the action in order to a complete determination of the rights of all in the waters of the stream. Upon a proper showing of the facts—which I think should be allowed by amendment, if requested—the court might direct other subsequent appropriators to be brought in. Differing in these particulars from the views expressed in the opinion of the court, I nevertheless concur in the judgment upon the ground that there should have been a more specific finding of the exact quantity of water, measured by some definite standard, (miner's inch, for example,) appropriated by plaintiff, and that the decree should have been equally specific in its injunction.

I concur: THORNTON, J.

WORKS, J. I concur in the judgment and in the views expressed by Chief Justice BEATTY.

HOMESTEADS.

1. Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1465, authorizing a court to set apart for the benefit of the surviving wife or husband the homestead already selected, if any, or, if none, to designate a homestead for the use of the "surviving husband or wife and the minor children," when construed with section 1468, which provides that a homestead set apart shall be the property of the surviving wife or husband where there is no minor child, entitles a widow to such homestead, though her husband died childless.

2. Only such land as could have been selected during the marriage will be assigned by the court, and therefore the widow is not entitled to a tract 50 miles distant from that on which she and her husband resided, though the united value of the tracts is less than $5,000.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Tulare county; WILLIAM W. CROSS, Judge.

Justin Jacobs and J. A. Burns, for widow. Lambertson & Taylor, for heirs.

BELCHER, C. C. The deceased left surviving him a widow, Armilda Armstrong, but no children. His estate was all community property, and consisted of certain personal property and two tracts of land, one containing 80 and the other 160 acres. These tracts were situated about 50 miles apart, and the value of both of them was less than $5,000. Prior to his death the deceased resided with his wife on the 80-acre tract, and afterwards the widow continued to reside thereon. No homestead was ever selected by either husband or wife during the life-time of deceased. In due time the widow presented to the court having jurisdiction of the estate a petition asking to have both tracts set apart to her as a homestead, under the provisions of section 1465 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The application was opposed by nine relatives and heirs at law of deceased, on the grounds —First, that the petition did not show that any homestead was ever selected, designated or recorded during the life-time of deceased; and, second, that the petition did not show that there were any minor children of the petitioner or of the deceased. The court made an order setting apart as a homestead to the petitioner the 80-acre tract on which she resided, and refused to set apart to her the other tract. Both parties have appealed from the order.

It is urged on behalf of the opposing heirs that, since the amendment of section 1465 in 1880, the court has had no power, where no homestead was selected during the life-time of the decedent, to set apart a homestead to a surviving husband or wife, unless there were minor children. The section as amended reads as follows: "Upon the return of the inventory * * * the court may, on its own motion, or on petition therefor, set apart for the use of the surviving husband or wife * * * the homestead selected, designated, and recorded. * * * If none has been selected, * * * the court must select, designate and set apart, and cause to be recorded, a homestead for the use of the surviving husband or wife and the minor children," etc. It is claimed that the words "and the minor children" limit the power of the court so that it can make no order unless there are such children. But we think it clear that the words have no such meaning or effect. The sentence means only that a homestead is to be set apart for the use of the surviving husband or wife and the minor children when there are minor children, and is not to be construed as limiting the power of the court to set apart a homestead for the use of the surviving husband or wife, when there are no such children. That this is so is made evident by section 1468 of the same Code, which provides that "when property is set apart for the use of the family, in accordance with the provisions of this chapter, if the decedent left a widow or surviving husband, and no minor child, such property is the property of the widow or surviving husband." There was no error, therefore, in the ruling complained of by the heirs.

As to the ruling complained of by the widow. A homestead consists of a dwelling-house in which the claimant resides, and the land on which the same is situated. Civil Code, § 1237. In Re Noah, 73 Cal. 592, 15 Pac. Rep. 290, it is said: "It may be conceded that the real property set apart as a homestead to the surviving husband or wife, by order of the court, need not be actually occupied at the time when the order is made. But it would seem that it must be property which could have been selected as a homestead during the continuance of the marriage." Now, as the two tracts of land which the widow asked to have set apart to her were separated one from the other by a distance of some 50 miles, it is evident that they could not both have been selected as a homestead prior to the death of the decedent. If separate parcels of land are selected as a homestead,—and such a selection may perhaps be made,—they must at least be so near together that they can be occupied and used for the purposes of the homestead; and in this respect there is no difference between a homestead set apart by the court and one selected under the homestead law. We conclude, therefore, that the rulings of the court were proper, and that the order appealed from should be affirmed, but without costs to either side.

We concur: Foote, C.; Hayne, C.

Per Curiam. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the order appealed from is affirmed, without costs to either side.

Justices of the Peace—Jurisdiction.

A penalty imposed by statute for transacting an insurance business without obtaining a certificate of authority to do so from the insurance commissioner is recoverable before a justice, under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 112, giving justices jurisdiction of actions for penalties less than $300, given by statute or by municipal ordinance, where no issue is made as to the legality of a "municipal fine," tax, assessment, or toll, as such a penalty does not come within the exception mentioned; and the jurisdiction thus given is authorized by Const. art. 6, § 11, limiting powers of justices to cases not within the jurisdiction of courts of record.

Commissioners' decision. In bank.

Application to prohibit J. D. Page, a justice of San Francisco, from entertaining an action by the commissioner of insurance against a relief association, to recover a penalty for unlawfully transacting business.

C. E. K. Royce, for petitioners. Atty. Gen. Geo. A. Johnson and T. C. Coogan, for respondent.

Hayne, C. This is an application for a writ of prohibition to the justice's court of San Francisco, to prohibit it from proceeding with the trial of an action now pending before it. The action was brought to recover the sum of $200 for a forfeiture alleged to have accrued by reason of the issuance of a certificate of relief without having obtained a certificate of authority from the insurance commissioner of the state, as prescribed by section 596 of the Political Code. The question which counsel have argued is whether such certificate of authority is required from an organization like the one here. But we think it clear that the justice's court has jurisdiction of the action. The constitution provides that the legislature shall "fix by law the powers, duties, and responsibilities of justices of the peace: provided such powers shall not in any case trench upon the jurisdiction of the several courts of record," etc. Article 6, § 11, Code Civil Proc., provides that justices' courts shall have jurisdiction "in actions for a fine, penalty, or forfeiture not amounting to $300, given by statute, or the ordinance of an incorporated city and county, city or town, where no issue is raised by the answer involving the legality of any tax, impost, assessment, toll, or municipal fine." Code Civil Proc. § 112, subd. 4. From this it will be perceived that the justices' courts have jurisdiction of all penalties "given by statute" which are under $300, whether the legality of the penalty is involved or not; but that, in case of "municipal fines," they have no jurisdiction if the legality is denied by the answer. This is a case of a penalty or forfeiture "given by statute," and is not a "municipal fine," or a tax, impost, toll, or assessment, within the meaning of section 5 of article 6 of the constitution. Consequently the jurisdiction does not trench upon that of the superior courts. The question, therefore, which the counsel present, is one which may be determined by the justice's court, and prohibition cannot issue. We therefore advise that the proceedings be dismissed.

We concur: Belcher, C. C.; Gibson, C.

Per Curiam. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the writ is denied and the proceedings dismissed.

PEOPLE v. MIZE et al. (No. 20,521.)

Assault with Intent to Kill.

1. Pen. Code Cal. § 217, provides that "every person who assaults another with intent to commit murder is punishable by imprisonment in the state-prison not less than one nor more than fourteen years." Defendants were tried for assault with intent to murder, and the court instructed the jury that, "if the testimony showed that, had the prosecuting witness been killed, one of the defendants would have been guilty of murder, then that one should be convicted." Held, that this was error, as in the crime of attempt to murder the intent is an essential ingredient, and must be proved.

2. In such case the question of intent is one of fact, and a charge which, in effect, withdraws that question from the consideration of the jury, is error.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Sonoma county; John G. Pressley, Judge.

The defendants, Fred Mize and John Mize, were tried on an information charging them with an assault with intent to murder one Henry Coffey. The court charged the jury that if the testimony showed that the crime would have been murder, in case of the death of Coffey from the assault, then they must find a verdict of guilty. A verdict of guilty was found, and defendants appeal.

R. W. Swain and John A. Barnham, for appellants. Geo. A. Johnson, Atty. Gen., for the People.

Paterson, J. The court instructed the jury, among other things, as follows. "Gentlemen of the jury, these defendants are charged before you by this information with making an assault upon Henry Coffey, with intent to murder the said Coffey. They cannot be convicted of an assault to commit murder unless the evidence shows beyond a reasonable doubt that, had the prosecuting witness, Henry Coffey, been killed, defendants would have been guilty of murder. If the testimony shows that, had Henry Coffey been killed, one of the defendants would have been guilty of murder, then that one should be convicted. If there was an unlawful assault on Henry Coffey, and no intention to commit murder, the defendant making such assault may be convicted of a simple assault." We think that this instruction was erroneous. "To constitute murder the guilty person need not intend to take life, but to constitute an attempt to murder he must so intend." 1 Bish. Crim. Law, § 730. "The wrong-doer must specifically contemplate taking life; and though his act is such as, were it successful, would be murder, if in truth he does not mean to kill, he does not become guilty of attempt to commit murder." 2 Bish. Crim. Law, § 741.

It is claimed by the attorney general that inasmuch as the court in subsequent instructions carefully instructed the jury that to constitute the offense charged in the information it was necessary to prove the intent to kill beyond a reasonable doubt, and that it was incumbent upon the prosecution to prove such intent, the jury could not have been misled by the instruction which we have quoted above. In State v. Evans, 39 La. Ann. 912, 3 South. Rep. 63, which was a case of assault with intent to murder, the court charged the jury as follows: "Where the evidence shows that it would have been murder if death had ensued, that in itself will be sufficient ground for the jury to infer the existence of the intention to murder." In another part of its charge the court, at the request of the defendant, instructed the jury that "the jury must be satisfied that the prisoner had a positive intention to commit murder." It was claimed on appeal that the subsequent charge cured the vice of the first charge quoted, but the court well said: "The addition of these words to the original charge given did not, as contended, cure the defect or vice therein. Its force was left untouched. Its meaning was unchanged and unimpaired. Together they would in effect amount to this: 'The jury must be satisfied that the prisoner had a positive intention to commit murder; but, if the evidence shows that it would have been murder if death had ensued, that in itself will be sufficient ground for the jury to infer the existence of the intention to murder.'"

The following instruction, we think, also, was erroneous: "If the jury believe from the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, that both or either of the defendants unlawfully pointed a loaded pistol at said Henry Coffey, and discharged the same, either with deliberation and premeditation, or with a reckless disregard of human life, and that the use of said weapon, as used by the defendant or defendants, if so used, was likely to kill the said Henry Coffey, then the said defendant, so using said pistol, is guilty of an assault with intent to commit murder." Here, again, the element of a specific intent to kill is ignored. In a prosecution under section 217 of the Penal Code for an assault with an intent to commit murder, a positive intent to murder must be proved by the prosecution. It is a statutory offense, and the intent is the essential ingredient. It differs in this respect from the statutory offense of an assault upon the person of another with a deadly weapon, or other means likely to produce great bodily injury, in which no intent is necessary to be proved. People v. Keefer, 18 Cal. 636; People v. Turner, 65 Cal. 540, 4 Pac. Rep. 553. The court gave the following instruction: "The jury are instructed that the natural and probable consequences of every act deliberately done by a person of sound mind are presumed to have been intended by the author of said act. And if the jury believe from the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the defendants, or either of them, did shoot at said Henry Coffey, as charged in the information, and that the natural and ordinary consequences of such shooting would be the death of said Henry Coffey, then the presumption of law is that the defendant so shooting did shoot at said Henry Coffey with intent to kill him." It is doubtless true that, as a general rule, a man is presumed to have intended that which he has done, or that which is the immediate and natural consequence of his act; but, where an act becomes criminal only when it has been performed with a particular intent, that intent must be alleged and proved. It is for the jury, under all the circumstances of the case, to say whether the intent required by the statute to constitute the offense existed in the mind of the defendant. This charge withdrew from the jury the consideration of the question whether the defendants intended to kill Coffey. The defendants claimed that they were acting in self-defense, and upon real or apparent danger. One of the defendants was at his own home, and there was evidence tending to show that a few days before the shooting the prosecuting witness, Henry Coffey, had threatened to take his life, and on the night preceding the affray had assaulted and beaten said defendant at his own home. To tell the jury, therefore, that if they believed the defendants had shot at Coffey, and that the natural and ordinary consequences of the shooting would be the death of Coffey, the law would presume them guilty of an intent to kill him, was erroneous, because it entirely disregards the question whether the defendants acted in good faith, and to defend themselves against real or apparent danger. In homicide cases, where the killing is proved, it rests on the defendant to show justification, excuse, or circumstances of mitigation, subject to the qualification that the benefit of the doubt is to be given to the prisoner; but this is because the statute expressly shifts the burden of proving circumstances of mitigation upon the defendant in homicide cases. The rule is confined to murder trials. Section 1105, Pen. Code; People v. Cheong Foon Ark, 61 Cal. 527. Judgment and order reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: Sharpstein, J.; Works, J.; McFarland, J.

Thornton, J., (concurring.) I concur in the judgment on the ground of error in the two instructions last mentioned in the foregoing opinion. By those instructions the court invaded the province of the jury as to the weight and effect of evidence. I perceive no error in the first instruction, as I understand the instruction, which must be taken as an entirety, and its several clauses harmonized, as can be done without straining the meaning of the words used. It is a direction to the jury that they cannot convict either defendant unless Henry Coffey had been killed under such circumstances that his killing would have been murder, but, if there was no intent when the assault was made to commit murder, then the defendants could only have been convicted of a simple assault; or, in other words, if the assault had been made without intent to commit murder, that, even though a killing had resulted, the defendants could only have been convicted of simple assault. The reasoning of the foregoing opinion is in accordance with these propositions. The case cited in the foregoing opinion from Louisiana should not, I think, meet the approbation of this court as long as the rule laid down in People v. Doyell, 48 Cal. 85, and the cases which follow it, regarding the construction of directions, remain as the rule of this forum.

GOLDMAN et al. v. BASHORE. (No. 12,988.)

EVIDENCE—DOCUMENTARY.

1. Defendant agreed to sell certain wood to plaintiffs, to be delivered at a place mentioned within a specified time, payment to be made according to certain stipulations. Defendant sent an order to plaintiffs to receive a quantity of wood from one S. on her contract. Plaintiffs accepted the order, subject to certain reservations, but after S. had placed the wood at the agreed point, plaintiffs received an unsigned letter directing them not to take the wood. Believing that it came from S., plaintiffs did not take the wood. There was evidence tending to prove that the letter was written on behalf of S., and intended to have the effect that it had. Held, in an action in which damages for refusal to accept the wood were claimed by defendant, that the letter was admissible for plaintiffs as tending to excuse their refusal. Fox and THORNTON, JJ., dissenting.

2. It is harmless error in such case, if error at all, to refuse to allow defendant to testify as to the price for which she sold the wood, when she has already stated the amount of her loss, and that the sum was the difference between the contract price and the sum for which she was obliged to sell the wood.

3. A recital of an instruction alleged to have been given, in the specification of errors, is not sufficient to make the instruction part of the record, which should be done by bill of exceptions.

4. A pleading introducing matter of defense with the language: "And for a further and separate answer the defendant files her cross-complaint, and alleges", is not a cross-complaint, and need not be answered by plaintiff. Following Shain v. Belvin, 21 Pac. Rep. 747.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Tulare county; WILLIAM W. CROSS, Judge.

Action by Goldman & Co. against Rachel D. Bashore, to recover for goods sold and money due plaintiffs. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals.

Casper & Boller, for appellant. Lamberson & Taylor, for respondents.

FOOTE, C. The plaintiffs brought this action to recover from the defendant $1,639.07, due upon an account for goods, wares, and merchandise, sold by them to the defendant, and for money paid, laid out, and expended to her use, and for money advanced to her. She answered, alleging by way of defense that she had made a contract with the plaintiffs, by which they agreed to purchase from her, at a certain price per cord, not less than 2,000 nor more than 2,500 cords of wood, to be delivered at a certain place, within a certain time; that she agreed to receive as part pay for the same merchandise at the rate of $35 upon the $100 worth of wood delivered, and that she did receive such goods, wares, and merchandise in part pay for wood which she delivered, and not otherwise; and that, although she complied with her contract, and delivered 2,000 cords of wood subject to the plaintiffs' order, at the time and place agreed upon, that they refused to take the wood, or pay for it, or comply with the contract. She further claims that by reason of their failure to comply with the contract she has been damaged in the sum of $3,000, for which, and costs, she asks judgment against them. The plaintiffs had judgment for only a part of their claim, from which, and an order refusing a new trial, the defendant appeals.

Defendant claims, among other things, that the court erred in refusing to grant her motion for judgment on the pleadings on what she denominated a cross-complaint, which the plaintiffs did not answer. But the alleged cause of cross-complaint was not pleaded as such. It is couched in this language: "And for a further and separate answer the defendant files her cross-complaint, and alleges." A similar pleading was treated as an answer in Shain v. Belvin, 21 Pac. Rep. 747, (No. 9,995, decided May 25, 1889.) No error was therefore committed in denying the motion.

It is further urged that an instruction given by the court was erroneous. There is no bill of exceptions here to make it evident that any such instruction was ever given, nor does the statement show it. The fact that the specification of "errors of law" at the end of the body of the statement recites that "the court erred in instructing the jury as follows," setting out the language of the alleged instruction, is not sufficient. It cannot be considered as evidence that the court granted any such instruction.

An unsigned letter was allowed to go to the jury on the part of the plaintiffs, which is claimed to have been improperly admitted in evidence, because it had no signature, and did not indicate either the place or the person from whom it emanated. The proof was that the defendant had agreed by a written contract to deliver to the plaintiffs the amount of wood, and at the price and place, as set out in her answer, which the plaintiffs were to receive under certain conditions; she was to receive $35 of the price of each 100 cords of wood in merchandise as part payment therefor; and that the debt for which she was sued, was contracted by her under that contract; that she sent an order to plaintiffs to receive from another party, one Stokes, for her, by virtue and in fulfillment of her contract, 1,500 cords of wood; that the plaintiffs accepted the order, with the reservation that $800 cash, which had been already advanced by them to the defendant, should be deducted from the price of the wood first received on the order, and applied to her account. Afterwards this written letter, forbidding them to take any of that wood, was received by them, and, supposing it to be from Stokes, the owner of the 1,500 cords of wood, they did not take it. There was evidence which went to show that their view of the matter was correct, and that the letter was written by an attorney at law for Stokes, and was intended to have the effect it did. It is plain that this letter was, therefore, admissible as tending to show that the plaintiffs were not to blame for not taking the 1,500 cords of wood of Stokes as part of the defendant's delivery of wood under her contract, and that she could not claim any damage from their failure to receive such wood.

It is also urged as error that the defendant, when a witness, was not allowed to answer the question, "What were you obliged to take for the wood?" the object being to show that she had lost the difference between the agreed price of the wood and the amount she was compelled afterwards to sell it for, by reason of the plaintiffs' refusal to take it. But, even if this was erroneous, it was harmless, because she had already stated, without objection, that her loss was about $3,750, and that it was the difference between what she was to get for the wood from the plaintiffs and what she was at last obliged to take for it. And the offer made after that on her part again to prove by herself that as to which she had just testified, as above stated, was properly refused by the court, for the reason above stated. Perceiving no prejudicial error, we advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNE, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

FOX, J., (dissenting.) There was no error in denying defendant's motion for judgment on the pleadings, for the reasons stated in the commissioner's opinion. There was no cross-complaint, within the meaning of the statute, requiring an answer thereto. But defendant had pleaded by way of new matter, constituting a defense to plaintiffs' claim, the same matter that was attempted to be set up in that portion of the answer which defendant denominates a cross-complaint, and, as so pleaded, she had a right to prove it. If sustained by proof, it constituted a perfect defense against plaintiffs' cause of action. Upon the trial it was proved by both plaintiffs and defendant that they had entered into such a contract as was set up in the answer, to-wit, a contract whereby the defendant agreed to sell and deliver to the plaintiffs at Tagus Switch a quantity of wood, not less than 2,000 cords, and not more than 2,500 cords, within 12 months from the date of said agreement, to-wit, February 21, 1885; and plaintiffs agreed to purchase the same of her, and to pay therefor at the rate of $4.30 a cord for each and every cord delivered. Thirty-five dollars on account of each 100 cords of wood she was to take in merchandise at the store of plaintiffs, and the balance was to be paid her in cash, one-half payable one day after the wood should have been received by the Southern Pacific Railroad Company from the plaintiffs, and the other half within thirty days thereafter. It is also proved by the testimony of both parties, and entirely uncontradicted, that the defendant did deliver this wood, to the extent of 2,500 cords, at Tagus Switch, within the time prescribed in the contract, and that the same was unobjectionable as to quality. She had, therefore, complied with the terms of the contract on her part, and it became the duty of the plaintiffs to receive said wood as so delivered. Their acceptance and receipt of the wood as delivered by her did not require them to pay for the same at the time of such acceptance, except as to the $35 per 100 cords which was to be paid in merchandise. By the terms of the agreement she could not demand of them anything on account of the cash payment until such time as, and so fast as, the said wood was received by the railroad company from the plaintiffs. The excuse made by plaintiffs for not receiving it was that the railroad company was only willing to accept it from them, and pay therefor, in lots of from 150 to 200 cords each, as they required it. This was not a valid excuse for their refusal to accept from defendant under the contract, but it was a sufficient excuse for the postponement of the making of cash payments for the same until accepted by the railroad company. Until such latter acceptance they were not bound to make any payment to the defendant, except to the extent of $35 on each 100 cords, payable in merchandise. If, however, she desired, and was permitted by them, to draw to a greater extent than this in merchandise from the store, it was manifestly to their advantage that she should do it, as they must be presumed to have been making their regular profit on the sale of their goods, and to the extent of such excess it reduced the balance which they would ultimately be called upon to pay plaintiffs in money. There is no conflict in the testimony to the effect that whatever she did get at that store was purchased by her on account of said contract. If they had paid her in merchandise faster than they were required to do I cannot see how that fact entitled them to judgment against her for or on account of such merchandise, so long as the balance of account under said contract remained, as it did, largely in her favor.

The court also erred in admitting in evidence the unsigned letter referred to in the opinion of the commissioners, and found in the record marked "Plaintiffs' Exhibit No. 4." There is no evidence in the record which does more than tend in some slight degree to show that Stokes at one time contemplated the propriety of sending such a letter, and that it was prepared pending consideration of that question. It was unsigned by any one. There is no evidence even tending to show that Stokes ever finally concluded to send it, or did send it, or authorized any person to do so. It was incompetent as evidence for any purpose in the cause, and its admission was prejudicial error affecting the rights of the defendant. In my opinion, the judgment and order appealed from should be reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings, with leave to defendant to file a proper cross-complaint if she shall be so advised.

Bogart v. Crosby et al. (No. 12,889.)

Real-Estate Agents—Estoppel.

1. Plaintiff agreed to purchase of defendants, real-estate agents, certain land, which they informed him they were selling for the owners. He paid defendants $300 of the purchase price, and they remitted the same to the owners. Subsequently plaintiff notified one of the owners that he would not complete the purchase because of delay in executing the deed. The owner said he did not care whether the sale was made or not, and thereupon paid the $300 back to defendants, telling plaintiff to settle with them. Defendants refused to return the money to plaintiff, claiming that he had forfeited it. In an action to recover it, held, that if any one was liable to plaintiff it was the owners, and not defendants.

2. Plaintiff can take nothing by the fact that defendants' appointment as agents to sell the land was verbal. The receipt of the $300 by the owners would estop them to deny the agency.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; E. Parker, Judge.

Harry L. Titus, for appellants. J. E. Deakin, for respondent.

Works, J. This action was brought by the respondent against the appellants, charging them with having received from the plaintiff, "as the agent of said plaintiff, the sum of $300 to the use of the said plaintiff." The court below did not find on the question of agency, but did find that the defendants "received the money to the use of said plaintiff," and rendered judgment for the amount and interest. The appellants contend that the findings that the defendants received the money for plaintiff's use, and that they thereby became indebted to him, are not sustained by the evidence. This point is supported by the record before us. There is an entire want of any evidence to support either the findings or the allegations of the complaint. The facts testified to by the respondent himself do not show that these parties were his agents, or that they received any money from him as such. His own testimony is, in substance, that the defendants were real-estate agents; that he agreed to purchase from them a certain piece of property for $6,000, and paid them $300 in cash, deed to be executed and balance of purchase money to be secured and paid thereafter; that he learned that these parties were not the owners of the land, by a statement from one of them that one of the owners was in the east, and would be gone for a week or 10 days. This was after he had paid them the $300 and made the contract, he says, but whether it was before or after is immaterial. The contract, which was in the nature of a receipt, was as follows: "San Diego, Cal., Sept. 23, 1887. Received this day of F. C. Bogart $300, as deposit on lot A, block 128, Horton's addition, together with two frame houses on said lot. Purchase price, $6,000; terms, $3,500 on delivery of deed, $2,500 in six months from date of deed; the deferred payment to bear 10 per cent. interest. We guaranty good title or no sale. Crosby & Van Haren." The absent owner did not return for a month, or near that time, and the plaintiff, in about three weeks, came to the conclusion that he would not take the property, and notified one of the owners (there being three of them) that he had bought other property "because of the long delay," and that he wanted his money back. In the mean time the money paid by him had been paid over by the defendants to their principals, the owners of the land. The owner referred to, when notified by plaintiff that he would not take the property, said he did not care whether he took it or not, but refused to pay him back his money, and told him that he would return it to the agents, and he could settle the matter with them. He did pay over to the defendants the said sum of $300. The plaintiff demanded the amount from the defendants, who refused to pay it, and tendered a performance of the contract by making the deed, the absent owner having returned. The plaintiff refusing to carry out his contract, they claimed that he had forfeited his deposit, and that they were entitled to retain the money for their commissions agreed to be paid by the owners.

It is quite clear that this shows no cause of action against the appellants. They were not the agents of the respondent, but of the owners of the property. They had paid the money over to their principals, who had received and accepted it. They had disclosed to the plaintiff that they were agents and who were their principals. If there was any liability to him, it was on the part of the principals, and not the agents. An agent may be held personally liable when he fails to make known his principal, or contracts in his own name, or where he exceeds his authority as such agent; otherwise it is the contract of his principal, upon which he cannot be held liable. Story, Ag. §§ 261, 263, 264, 267. Neither of the contingencies named, upon which the liability of an agent can rest, appear in this case. The fact that the principals returned the money to the agents, did not relieve them from liability, (Thomas v. Moody, 57 Cal. 215,) nor could it shift such liability to the appellants, nor could the fact that the appellants had, after the money came back into their hands, claimed the same to have been forfeited, have any such effect. Their claim that they were entitled to commissions was a question between them and their principals, and was one with which the respondent had no concern. Their claim that he had forfeited the money by a failure to complete the contract was a question between the respondent and the owners of the property, and one in which the appellants, as agents, were not concerned. The forfeiture would have been to the vendors, and not to their agents. The respondent was bound to look to the owners of the property for his money, and the appellants were bound to look to the same source for their commissions. As between the parties to this suit there was no liability either way.

It is contended by the respondent that as it appears from the evidence that the appellants were only authorized, verbally, to sell, they were not the agents of the owners of the property, and therefore he was bound to look to them individually. But the evidence of the owners themselves shows that they verbally authorized the appellants to sell the property; that they ratified their acts by accepting the cash payment, and were willing to carry out their part of the contract. This being the case, they would be estopped to deny the agency, as against the respondent's claim for the return of the money paid by him, and actually received by them, if he was entitled to recover the same. Whether the respondent forfeited the amount paid by him, by reason of his failure to accept and pay for the land, is, as we have said, a question between him and the owners of the land, and need not be determined in this action. Judgment and order appealed from reversed, and cause remanded.

Appeal-Bonds.

1. On appeal from an order of distribution to a legatee, an executor of a deceased heir of the estate cannot claim the benefits of Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 965, relating to appeals by an executor from orders made in proceedings upon the estate "of which he is executor," etc.

2. Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 946, provides that the trial court may, in its discretion, dispense with or limit the security on appeal, when the appellant is an executor, administrator, trustee, or other person acting in another's right. Held that, in order to save the appeal in such cases, the order dispensing with the security must be made within the time allowed for filing the bond; and an order subsequently made, with a direction that it be entered nunc pro tunc as of an earlier date, is unavailing.

3. If the order was actually made on the earlier date, the order directing it to be entered of record as of that date must recite the fact that it was so made. The question cannot be tried on affidavits in the supreme court.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. V. Coffey, Judge.

On motion to dismiss appeal.

John F. Burris, for appellants. A. H. Loughborough, for respondents.

Beatty, C. J. In this case several persons, claiming to be heirs of the decedent, have joined in appealing from an order distributing a portion of the estate to a legatee. He now moves to dismiss the appeal upon the ground, among others, that no undertaking was filed in time to render the appeal effectual. The notice of appeal was served January 30, 1889, and filed January 31, 1889. The undertaking was not filed until February 5th, which was one day too late to save the appeal. Code Civil Proc. § 940; Boyd v. Burrel, 60 Cal. 280. But one of the appellants is the executor of a deceased heir, and appeals in that character. He claims that his appeal is saved by operation of sections 946 and 965 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Section 965 cannot help him, because this is not an appeal from an order made in the proceeding for the settlement of the estate of which he is the executor. Conceding—without deciding—that section 946 applies to the $300 bond, (Mr. Hayne thinks it does not,—2 New Trials & App. § 220,) it is necessary to make that section available that there should have been an order of the superior court dispensing with the undertaking. We are furnished with a copy of such an order, dated and filed June, 1889, four months after the bond should have been filed, and two days after service of notice of this motion. At the end of this order there is a direction that it be entered nunc pro tunc as of date February 1, 1889, but it contains no recital that such an order was actually made at that date, or at any date previous to June 4, 1889. We think it clear that, in order to save the appeal in cases covered by section 946, the order dispensing with security must be made within the time allowed for filing the bond. After the appeal has lapsed, it cannot be restored by an order subsequently made; and a direction that such order be entered nunc pro tunc as of an earlier date is unavailing. Where all the conditions upon which the entry of a judgment or order depends exist, and the making or entry of the order is a mere ministerial duty or matter of course, and the performance of the duty is neglected or delayed, or where an order has actually been made and its entry omitted, we suppose it may be subsequently entered, and, if justice requires, may be made to take effect nunc pro tunc, as of the date when it was actually made, or at any time when existing conditions imposed upon the court or its officer the duty of entering it. But here the making of the order in question rested entirely in the discretion of the superior judge, and was never a matter of course. Therefore it could never have an existence until his discretion was exercised. And if it was actually made prior to February 5th, and its entry omitted, the fact that it was so made at the proper time should be shown by the record of the superior court. We cannot try the question on affidavits filed here. Moreover, the affidavits filed by appellant do not satisfactorily prove this essential fact, even if they could be considered. They do not show that the superior judge signed an order out of court, or directed the entry of an order in court. The affidavit of appellant's counsel shows that he discussed with the judge of the superior court the question of dispensing with the bond, and that he approved it, and that his clerk obtained a further order from said judge dispensing with the filing of said bond. We infer from this that appellant regards the verbal approval by the judge of a suggestion made in the course of a conversation out of court as an order, and that the "further order" obtained by the clerk was like its antecedent. We think the motion to dismiss must be granted, and is so ordered.

In re ROSE'S ESTATE. (No. 12,409.)

ADMINISTRATORS—ACCOUNTING—APPEAL—RES ADJUDICATA.

1. Though an administrator is not authorized to carry on his intestate's business, and should not blend the expenses and disbursements connected therewith with the legitimate items of his accounts, where he charges himself with the gross profits of the business, and the court debits him with the amount thereof, he should be allowed money paid out in the course of the business.
2. Items of administration expenses less than $20 in amount, paid by the administrator, according to his uncontradicted testimony, should be allowed.
3. An administrator is entitled to his expenses incurred while traveling on business of the estate.
4. He should also be allowed counsel fees and expenses incurred in good faith and under the advice of counsel in resisting appeals by distributees from orders auditing his accounts.
5. Neither expenses incurred by the administrator in procuring the removal of the guardian of a minor heir, nor money advanced for the heir's benefit, are proper charges in the settlement of the administration account, though they may be allowed as credits upon the distributive share of the heir when a settlement with him is made.
6. Commissions should not be allowed the administrator until the final settlement of his accounts.
7. The dismissal of an appeal on the ground that no judgment had been entered on the findings complained of is no bar to an appeal when the record is properly made up.
8. An order allowing some and rejecting other items of an administrator's account, and reserving others for further consideration, is not a judgment which, under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 577, is the final determination of the rights of the parties; and hence section 939, providing that an exception, on the ground that a decision is not supported by the evidence, will not be reviewed on appeal from a final judgment unless the appeal is taken from the rendition of the judgment, does not apply. Reversing 20 Pac. Rep. 712.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Tulare county; WILLIAM W. CROSS, Judge.

Wal. J. Tuska and W. W. Foote, for appellant. Stetson & Houghton and R. E. Houghton, for respondent.

FOX, J. This is an appeal by the administrator from an order settling his account. The account was filed October 19, 1885. To this the guardian of minor heirs filed certain exceptions and objections, and on the 24th and 25th of November, 1885, a hearing was had. The bill of exceptions, bringing up the evidence and proceedings had on that hearing, covers 1146 folios of the original transcript, and additional exhibits therein referred to about 180 folios, found in a supplemental transcript. On the 12th of July, 1886, the judge signed and filed a written opinion announcing his conclusions therein, directing that the account be settled in accordance therewith, "and, if counsel on either side deem further papers necessary, let the papers be drafted settling the account as above indicated." Counsel for one or both the parties (manifestly for the contestants) evidently did deem further papers necessary, for on the 12th of March, 1887, a paper relating to such settlement, indorsed "Findings and Decree," was signed by the judge and filed, and on the 10th of June, 1887, the same was "recorded in Book 2, Probate Decrees, on page 1 et seq." From this "order and decree" the administrator appealed June 29, 1887. The proposed bill of exceptions was prepared and served on the 13th day of May, 1887, and is certified by the judge to have been "within the time allowed by law and the order of court and the stipulation of counsel." On the 18th of June, 1887, contestants' proposed amendments to said bill of exceptions were prepared and served, also certified by the judge to have been "within the time allowed by law and the order of court and the stipulation of counsel." Bill of exceptions finally settled and certified September 3, 1887.

The respondent contends that the question of the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the findings cannot be considered on this appeal. This contention is based upon the provision of subdivision 1, § 939, Code Civil Proc., relating to appeals in general, where it is provided: "An appeal may be taken—First. From a final judgment in an action or special proceeding commenced in the court in which the same is rendered within one year after the entry of judgment. But an exception to the decision or verdict on the ground that it is not supported by the evidence cannot be reviewed on an appeal from the judgment, unless the appeal is taken within sixty days after the rendition of the judgment." This appeal was taken within 60 days after the recording of the so-called "findings and decree" in the "Book of Probate Decrees," which must be taken as the date of the "entry of the judgment," if it be a judgment within the meaning of the section quoted. McLaughlin v. Doherty, 54 Cal. 519; Thomas v. Anderson, 55 Cal. 43; Lorenz v. Jacobs, 53 Cal. 24; Miller v. Sharpe, 54 Cal. 590; Estate of Rose, 72 Cal. 578, 14 Pac. Rep. 369. But it was not taken within 60 days after the signing and filing of said "findings and decree," which must be taken as the date of the "rendition of the judgment," if judgment it be. Gray v. Palmer, 28 Cal. 416; Peck v. Courtis, 31 Cal. 207; Genella v. Relyea, 32 Cal. 159; Wetherbee v. Dunn, 36 Cal. 252; McCourtney v. Fortune, 42 Cal. 389; McLaughlin v. Doherty, 54 Cal. 519.

Upon the first submission of this appeal the court was inclined to the opinion as contended for by respondent, but upon rehearing, and further consideration of the question, the majority of the court have reached the conclusion that the so-called "findings and decree," constituting the decision from which this appeal is taken, do not constitute a judgment or a "final judgment," within the meaning of the provisions of section 939, Code Civil Proc. If it is not a "final judgment" then it is (something less) a mere order. The learned counsel for respondent evidently did not think that an order settling the account of an administrator was a "judgment" within the meaning of section 939, until this appeal was taken; for the very account for the settlement of which this order was made was one rendered and filed upon an order of the court dated September 8, 1885, made upon his own motion, requiring the administrator to restate in detail his entire account from the commencement of his administration to date, notwithstanding the fact that before that time the great bulk of the same account had been presented and filed, contested by the same parties and before the same judge, and by him settled in an elaborately written review and order made and filed August 22, 1885, which order has never been formally vacated or set aside. But, whatever may be the contention of counsel, we think the question is settled by the Codes and the former adjudication of this court. "A judgment is the final determination of the rights of the parties in an action or proceeding." Code Civil Proc. § 577. The proceeding appealed from is not a "final determination of the rights of the parties in an [the] action or proceeding." At most it is but a settlement of one of many matters arising in a probate proceeding, preparatory to a "final settlement of the rights of the parties" in the whole proceeding. In this particular case the paper upon its face shows that it is not even a settlement of the particular matter under consideration, for by its very terms, at folio 285, the sum of more than $1,200, claimed to have been paid out by the administrator, is left unsettled and undetermined, the subject of further consideration in any new account which he may present. "Every direction of a court or judge made in writing, and not included in a judgment, is denominated an order." Id. § 1003. An order, as distinguished from a final judgment, is the judgment or conclusion of the court upon any motion or proceeding. Gilman v. Contra Costa Co., 8 Cal. 57. This is an appealable order, under subdivision 3, § 963, Code Civil Proc.; Dean v. Superior Court, 63 Cal. 477. It is not an order which discharges the administrator from his trust. McCrea v. Haraszthy, 51 Cal. 151. It is one which may be reopened, (Code Civil Proc. § 1637; Estate of Runyon, 53 Cal. 196;) or vacated or set aside; and, if so done, the latter order is not appealable, (Estate of Dunne, Id. 631.) It is not, therefore, a final judgment. We hold, therefore, that upon appeal from an order settling an administrator's account all the proceedings leading up to it, including the evidence upon which it is based, are open to review.

A former appeal from this same order was brought to this court, and dismissed on motion of respondent, on the ground, among others, that the appeal was prematurely taken. That appeal was taken on the 27th of April, 1887, after the signing and filing of the "findings and decree," and before the same was recorded. On authorities then cited the court held that the appeal was prematurely taken, and the same was dismissed. Estate of Rose, 72 Cal. 577, 14 Pac. Rep. 369. Respondent now moves to dismiss on the ground, among others, that the dismissal of the former appeal is a bar to this one. The bar of section 955, Code Civil Proc., will apply where the dismissal is for want of prosecution, (unless it be expressly made "without prejudice,") or where it is on the merits; but an appeal dismissed because there was nothing to appeal from will not preclude another appeal in the same case, when a record shall have been made up from which an appeal can be taken. Preferring, if possible, to dispose of the case upon its merits, in such form that the estate may be speedily closed, without considering the other grounds upon which it is made, the motion to dismiss the appeal is denied.

And looking into the merits of the case we find from the record that Allan E. Rose died intestate, in Kern county, on the 5th of October, 1880, leaving three minor children, and an estate which in December, 1880, inventoried and appraised at $6,066. This amount was increased by a supplemental inventory and appraisement, filed in September, 1881, amounting to $430, making the total estate $6,496, of which $1,555 was real property, all the balance being personal property. At the time of his death Rose was engaged in the cattle, sheep, and dairy business, and was heavily indebted. On the 18th of October, 1880, letters of administration upon his estate were granted to Herman Hirshfeld, appellant, by the superior court of Kern county. On April 20, 1885, the matter of said estate was transferred for further proceedings to Tulare county, a new judge having taken the bench in Kern county, who was disqualified to sit in the case. Claims against said estate were in due course presented and allowed to the amount of $4,805.77. On the 12th of December, 1880, the administrator made and filed his petition in due form, estimating the debts and expenses of administration, accrued and to accrue, at $6,000, and showing that the entire personal estate would be insufficient to pay this amount, and praying for an order of sale of the personal property, and of so much of the real property as should be necessary to raise the amount so estimated to be necessary to pay debts and expenses. This was followed by an order of January 10, 1881, under proceedings which appear to have been regular, authorizing the sale of all the real and personal property of the estate at private sale. It would seem that from the very first the administrator, instead of simply gathering up and taking care of the property of the estate, and in due course converting it into money under proper orders of the court, and out of the proceeds paying expenses of administration and family allowance, applying the balance to the payment of debts, so far as it would go, as he might have done in strict performance of his duty, commenced and continued to carry on the business in which the decedent had been engaged, accounting for the increase of stock and income thereof, and paying the expenses of the conduct of the business out of the same. Whether he has correctly accounted for the increase and income, and correctly reported the expenses, is the principal subject of the investigation, from the result of which this appeal is taken. It has evidently been the source of all his trouble and litigation as such administrator. The business was a hazardous one for an administrator to undertake, and one which the law did not require at his hands. Brenham v. Story, 39 Cal. 188. If it resulted in profit that profit belonged to the estate, and not to himself. It being a business which he was neither required nor authorized by law to conduct on behalf of the estate, if he did do it with the property and funds of the estate, and there was loss, the loss was his. Whenever an administrator undertakes to go beyond the strict line of his duty, he acts upon his own responsibility. He can derive no profit from the success of his venture, but must bear the loss of a failure. Estate of Knight, 12 Cal. 200. If he uses the real estate of the estate, he must account for the rental value thereof, and, if he makes a profit, account to the estate for that also. Walls v. Walker, 37 Cal. 424. To the same effect is Tompkins v. Weeks, 26 Cal. 51. If, as in this case, the administrator elects to assume the peril, and is permitted by the court and parties interested, without objection, to so conduct and manage the business, the liabilities growing out of the management are not claims which could be enforced against the estate by the holders thereof. They are his liabilities. He has a right to pay them out of the increase of the business; but if by so doing a loss is sustained to the estate, he must make the loss good. Protected from loss and from liability at all times, the estate is interested in the business only to the extent of its profits; and in them, not because it is the business of the estate, but because the administrator is using the property of the estate in a way he is not authorized to do, and, consequently, is required to account for all the profit made by its use. It follows from this that the expenses incurred in carrying on such business are not debts of or claims against the estate, nor are they "charges or expenses of administration," within the meaning of the probate law. The items of increase and items of expense of such business are not matters which come within the purview of the itemized account of an administrator, as such, subject to the rules of audit and allowance prescribed in sections 1631 and 1632, Code Civil Proc. He is bound to report to the court, as money or property coming into his hands as administrator, the true net gains or profits derived from the business, in money or kind; but the detailed account of the management or conduct of the business is no part of his accounts as administrator. If he reports them to the court at all it should be done in a separate paper, perhaps as an exhibit attached to his official report or account; and, when so done, it simply serves the purpose of showing his good faith in the premises, and is not a matter for audit by the court. The probate jurisdiction of the court is separate and distinct from its jurisdiction in ordinary civil actions. In re Allgier, 65 Cal. 228, 3 Pac. Rep. 849; Richard v. Wetmore, 66 Cal. 365, 5 Pac. Rep. 620. To the extent that the court, in the exercise of its probate jurisdiction, undertakes to audit the accounts and control the conduct of that business, to that extent, it, also, as well as the administrator, assumes to make a speculative and hazardous use of the property of the estates of deceased persons, not authorized by law. If the administrator fails to honestly account to the estate for the profits, or to make good the loss of his acts ultra vires, he is guilty of a fraud, for which he may be proceeded against in a civil action, as in any other case of fraud, and then, and in that proceeding, those accounts of the business which he conducted, with the property of the estate, without authority of law, will become the subject of investigation, item by item, and their investigation will be governed by the same rules of evidence as apply in the examination of other disputed accounts.

Applying these principles, we proceed to a further examination of the record. It further appears that on the 9th of December, 1881,—less than 14 months after his appointment,—the administrator filed his first, and what was intended to be his final, account, showing that he had received in cash $10,942.43, and paid out $9,145.92, leaving a balance in his hands of $1,796.51. From this account, and the report of sales of personal property filed 20 days later, it appears that of the receipts $5,807.08 was derived from the sale of personal property; the balance, $5,135.35, being the gross income derived from the business as carried on by him. His account of expenditure included the payment in full of all the claims which had been presented and allowed against the estate, ($4,805.77,) the payment of all the charges and expenses of administration, and of taxes; and the balance, comprising the majority in number of the several items, although placed regularly in the account of expenditures of administration, show upon their face that they were expenses of carrying on the business, from which the increase of $5,135.35 was derived. We have taken some pains to segregate these items from the other, and find that they amount to $3,174.63, showing that he gives the estate the benefit of a net gain growing out of the business up to that time of $1,960.72. The record also shows that on the 23d of December, 1881, the attorney of the minor heirs filed objections to this account, contesting it on the ground, among others, "that no sufficient vouchers for the expenses and charges of said estate have been filed by the administrator of above estate." We do not find that the present record shows the next succeeding history of this account, but counsel for respondent says in his brief that it was settled and allowed as filed by the superior court of Kern county on the 29th of December, 1881, from which order an appeal was taken to this court, the decision upon which will be found in 63 Cal. 349. Turning to the case as there reported, we find that the mass of items of which we have above spoken as constituting payments of expenses of the business conducted by the administrator were treated by both sides as expenses and charges of administration, and the distinction was not in any manner called to the attention of the court. As many of those items were unaccompanied by the kind of vouchers required for payments made on account of "charges and expenses of administration," the order settling and allowing the account was reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings. On the 17th of September, 1883, the account came on again for settlement in the superior court of Kern county, when the present contestant filed objections to the same. The court refused to hear the contestant on the ground that he had no standing in court. Contestant appealed. The decision on that appeal will be found in 66 Cal. 242, 5 Pac. Rep. 220. It will be seen that there the court does not discuss or pass upon the merits of the account at all, but holds that the court erred in refusing to give the contestant a hearing, and reversed the case. After the remittitur went down, the case was transferred to Tulare county, as above stated. There the same account and objection came up for hearing April 20-23, 1885. On that hearing the court, in a written decision, filed August 22, 1885, held, as we hold here, that "it is no part of the duty of an administrator to carry on any business for the benefit of an estate. If he does so he is liable for any loss that may be incurred, and can reap no benefit from the profits, if any." "That where an administrator elects to carry on a business for an estate, the person who is employed by him in such business is the employé of such administrator, and not the employé of such estate. Such employé must look to the administrator, and not to the estate, for his pay. The amount due such employé is not a 'charge,' 'debt,' or 'claim' on his behalf against said estate." But, on the other hand,—and, it seems to us, inconsistently with this,—the court holds that if the business pay a revenue to the estate, then the expenses of the business are items of expense under section 1631, Code Civil Proc., for which formal vouchers must be filed under section 1632. If it is not the business of the estate, why is the expense of it expense of the estate? Why either more or less expense of the estate if it results in revenue than if it results in loss? Acting upon the principles thus announced by the court, it takes up the account item by item, and disallows or retires from the expense account, for want of proper vouchers, with leave to bring them forward again in any further account, items aggregating about $850, and surcharges the administrator with about $150, making a difference against the administrator of about $1,000. Of this the appellant does not seem to have complained; but on the 8th of September following, the court, "upon the suggestion" of the respondent, made an order requiring the administrator within 30 days to restate his account in full from the commencement of his administration to date. In pursuance of that order, on the 19th of October, 1885, the restated account was filed. On the 24th of November, 1885, exceptions to the account, covering 46 folios of the record, were filed, contesting the account not only for want of proper vouchers for many of the items thereof, but also upon many other grounds, and notably upon the ground that the administrator had not truly or correctly reported all the moneys received by him, and never reported or filed an inventory of all the property of the estate which had come into his hands. Upon the same and the next succeeding day (November 24, 25, 1885) a hearing was had upon the restated account, and the issue raised or assumed to be raised by these exceptions, and on March 12, 1887, the "findings and decree" were filed, from which, after the document was recorded, this appeal was taken.

The case has been here in different forms many times, and the close of administration delayed beyond all precedent, considering the small estate to be disposed of, and it is desirable that it should be closed at the earliest possible moment. For this reason we have reviewed it at greater length than we otherwise would have done. Looking at the case upon the issues presented by the account and the objections thereto, and as disclosed by the bill of exceptions, we find that in settling the account the court has finally rejected and disallowed items amounting to $154.06, and retired for further consideration upon the coming in of another account, two items amounting to $357,—all of that class which are expenses, of carrying on the business as distinguished from "charges and expenses of administration." As the appellant claims to have debited himself, and the court debits him, with the gross gains of that business, we think that under the evidence and the principles here adopted he should be credited with those items, and the court below is directed accordingly. The court also rejected an item of $15, paid to Noble as appraiser. The record shows that Noble was duly appointed one of the appraisers, served as such three days, and claimed the fee. The administrator swears that he paid it, and we find no contradiction of that evidence. The amount is under $20, and we think should be allowed. The court also rejects an item of $75, expense of administrator to San Francisco. It does not very clearly appear from the record for what this expense was incurred; but the administrator is entitled to necessary traveling expenses when on business of the estate. If this expense is claimed to have been of that class, the bill should not be rejected in toto, but be placed in the list of those items retired, with leave to bring it forward with the proper proofs in a future account. The court allows $756, and rejects $540 paid by the administrator to his counsel for fees and professional services, and also rejects $251 traveling expenses of his counsel. This rejection is based on the proposition that much of the service rendered was unnecessary, not in the interest of the estate, to delay settlement, and was with a view to establish an account in which the administrator had knowingly not charged himself with all moneys and property of the estate which came into his hands. The findings do not show to what particular service the rejected items apply, and we cannot, therefore, say whether the rejection was correct or not. But if any part of it applies to the defense of the two appeals decided in 63 Cal. 346, 349, to that extent we think the rejection was error. An administrator is entitled to credit for payments made for the services and traveling expenses of his attorney, not exceeding a reasonable compensation for the labor actually performed, when the same were necessary to enable him to properly perform the duties of his trust. Estate of Moore, 72 Cal. 336, 13 Pac. Rep. 880. He was not at that time charged with having failed to account for all the property, and was simply in the one case insisting upon the allowance of his account for carrying on the business, and in the other he had acted under order of the court below, and was defending an appeal from such order. He acted under the advice of counsel, and we see nothing to show that such advice was not in good faith. He was not responsible for the mistakes of either counsel or court; and for the reasonable expenses incurred in that behalf, as well as for services in other proceedings in the settlement of the estate, we think he should be allowed. If any portion of these rejected items was for services in either this court or the court below in the matter of procuring the removal of the guardian of the minor heirs, for that portion he is clearly not entitled to be allowed. It was a matter with which he, as administrator, had nothing to do, and no part of the expense of it should be charged to this estate.

Several items of clerk's fees, printing bills, and of moneys paid to the attorneys for the minor heirs, were rejected. All the items of expenditures made in the matter of the estate and guardianship of these minors are properly rejected from this account. These expenses have no place in this account. If upon settlement between the two estates and distribution of this estate it be found that the administrator has made advances to the other estate, by paying, at the request of its representative, proper and necessary expenses therein, he may properly be allowed credit therefor as so much advanced to the minors on account of their distributive share, but he is not entitled to charge such advancement as expenses of this administration. The retiring of the item for administrator's commissions was proper, as he is not entitled to these commissions until the settlement of his final account. We are not disposed, under the evidence, to interfere with the action of the court in rejecting or retiring other items of this account, considered in findings 38 to 62 inclusive.

Turning to the other side of the account, appellant claims that there is absolutely no proof to sustain the findings of the court. In this, we think, he is mistaken. It is not a question whether this court would have found the same way on the same evidence, but (there being no conflict) whether there is any evidence to justify the findings. If there is, under the well-established rule of this court the findings cannot be disturbed. It is not necessary that the evidence should be introduced by the contestant if it is clearly found in the testimony of those called to support the account. It seems to us that there is in that testimony some evidence to support every finding and order of the court surcharging the administrator with amounts omitted from the debit side of that account, and as to many of the charges it is conclusive evidence. The findings and conclusions, 19 to 36, inclusive, will not be disturbed. The finding that no order was ever made by any court or judge thereof authorizing the sale of personal property belonging to said estate, made by said administrator in the year 1881, is in conflict with the record as produced in this court, and is erroneous. The findings of misappropriation or misuse of funds, of failure to report all the funds received, of failure to file an inventory of all the personal property of the estate, of careless loss of books, and generally the findings not herein specifically noticed, seem to be justified by the evidence, and will not be disturbed. The order appealed from is reversed, with instructions to the court below to allow in the account of the administrator the claim of $15 paid Noble for appraisers' fees, and all the items which the evidence shows to have been expenses of carrying on the business, as defined in the foregoing opinion, except such as are duplicated or withdrawn; also that the administrator be allowed to introduce any additional evidence he may have in support of any of the remaining items which have been rejected or retired from his account, and thereupon that the account be restated in accordance with this opinion.

We concur; Sharpstein, J.; McFarland, J.; Thornton, J. Works, J., concurs in the judgment of reversal.

People v. De Lay. (No. 20,519.)

Embezzlement.

1. On trial of an information for embezzlement, it appeared that defendant was the assignee of an insolvent debtor, and that the assignment named the order in which creditors should be paid. A firm of which defendant was a member was second in the list of creditors, but defendant paid the debt of his own firm first, leaving little for payment of other debts. He also received $737 from sales of milk, and only accounted for $427. Held, that the evidence justified the verdict of guilty, as it was for the jury to say whether defendant intended fraudulently to appropriate the property.

2. In such case, under Pen. Code Cal. § 513, providing that if, prior to information laid charging embezzlement, the accused restore, or offer to restore, the property alleged to have been embezzled, such fact is not ground of defense, but goes only towards mitigation of the punishment, it could not avail that defendant offered to return the balance due from him as assignee.

3. Nor is it a defense that defendant has given an indemnity bond for the amount of property coming into his hands as assignee.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; D. J. Murphy, Judge.

Adair Welcker, for appellant. Geo. A. Johnson, Atty. Gen., for the People.

Paterson, J. The defendant was charged with embezzlement, and convicted. The chief contention of the counsel for appellant is that the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict. He obtained possession of the personal property of Mary Furlong under an assignment thereof to him for the benefit of her creditors. By the terms of the assignment defendant was required to apply the proceeds of all sales of property and the revenue received from the dairy and milk route to the payment of Mrs. Furlong's debts, which were classified in the written assignment, and payments thereof required as follows: "(1) In payment of any judgment that may be recovered by John Reis, plaintiff in an action instituted on the 14th day of July, A. D. 1886, wherein the said Reis is plaintiff, and I, the said Furlong, am defendant," etc. "(2) To pay to the said firm of De Lay Bros. whatever amount may be now due to them from me, or that may hereafter become due to them during the running of this agreement. (3) To pay to R. B. Mitchell such moneys as may be now due to the late firm of Mitchell & Ricketts, for fees and costs," etc. "(4) To pay all other unsecured debts that I may now owe, or which may become due from me during the running of this agreement; * * * so much of said book-accounts as may remain uncollected; and whatever personal property or book-accounts, notes, demands, * * * shall be turned over to the said Furlong at the termination thereof; * * * the attachment heretofore issued in the case of Reis v. Furlong to be released, the said De Lay indemnifying Matthew Nunan and Jeremiah Lowney, securities on the undertaking, for release of attachment this day executed against any loss by reason of their signing said undertaking as sureties."

The contract of assignment was executed by both parties on July 21, 1886. The defendant thereupon accepted the trust, took possession of all the property that could be found, and began to collect the book-accounts, sell the cows and other stock, and wind up the business. On November 15, 1886, nothing remained to be sold except a few heifers and calves and a grain wagon. At that time defendant had received about $3,000, and paid out about $2,900. Instead of applying the proceeds of the sales and of the business to the payment of the Reis judgment, which had been entered in the mean time against Mrs. Furlong for $1,600 and costs, he appropriated the whole thereof, except about $85, which he offered to pay over, to the payment of the debt due himself and partner and a few small claims. In a statement rendered November 15th he gave as the total amount received from sales of milk the sum of $427.15. At the trial it was admitted by his counsel that he had received up to November 5th, from sales of milk, at least $737.40. The balance, ($310.25,) not accounted for by him, is the amount charged in the indictment as having been embezzled. The driver of the milk wagon testified that there had been collected $120 for which no receipts could be found, in addition to the above-named sum of $737.40. Defendant testified that he did not understand from the agreement that he was to pay the Reis judgment first, and that he acted on the advice of his attorney in appropriating the proceeds to the payment of his own and other claims. But there is evidence that he knew the terms of the contract required him to pay the judgment first. If he acted on the advice of his attorney, Mr. Wood, it is a singular fact that he did not call the latter to testify in his behalf; although, of course, if the jury believed the testimony of the defendant, his evidence on that subject was sufficient to establish the fact in his favor. Evidently, however, the jury did not believe that he so understood the contract. At the time the contract of assignment was made defendant gave Nunan and Lowney a written indemnity, in which he recites that "whereas, said Mary Furlong has this day made an assignment to me of all her personal property, for the purpose of selling so much of the same as may be necessary to pay such judgment as may be recovered in the above-entitled action, as well as to pay off other indebtedness," and in which he promises to hold so much of the property assigned to him "by Mrs. Furlong, or the proceeds thereof, as may be necessary to satisfy any judgment that may be recovered by said Reis in said action, including all costs and interest." There is other evidence in the record tending to show that the defendant fully understood the obligation imposed upon him by the contract to pay the Reis judgment first out of the funds received from the sales and collections. The explanation given by the defendant as to the difference between the amount actually received from sales of milk and that reported is not very satisfactory. The court fully and fairly instructed the jury upon the law of embezzlement. They were told that "a person may receive property belonging to another, and appropriate it, and divert it from its true channel, and from the purpose for which he received it, but still he might not be guilty of embezzlement, and would not be, unless such diversion or such appropriation or conversion by him was of a fraudulent character and nature; that it is the fraudulent misappropriation of the property that constitutes the gist of the offense."

The question of the guilt or innocence of defendant does not depend upon the construction of the contract as to the order of payments to creditors. If it be conceded that he might lawfully have appropriated the proceeds to the payment of his own and other claims before any payment was made upon the judgment referred to, the fact still remains that, when called upon for an account, he reported that he had received only $427.15, when, in fact, he had received at least $737.40. The balance ($310.25) is the amount which he is charged to have embezzled. Under the contract he was bound to appropriate all the proceeds of sales and collections to the payment of Mrs. Furlong's debts, and return the balance, if any, to her. It was for the jury to say whether or not he intended fraudulently to appropriate the $310.25 retained by him. The fact that he afterwards offered to return or pay over this amount is no defense herein. Section 513, Pen. Code.

The error of the court in admitting the testimony of the witness Nunan was not prejudicial. The testimony elicited was simply a repetition of what had already been given. It was not contrary to the written instrument, nor did it in any manner add to its terms, but was in entire accord with the provisions thereof. The fact that Nunan and Lowney took a written indemnity from the defendant in no way affects the guilt or innocence of the defendant, who is charged with embezzling the property intrusted to him for certain purposes by Mrs. Furlong. Defendant claims that Mrs. Furlong did not turn over to him all the property called for by the assignment. Upon this question there is a conflict of testimony. Defendant, however, was not called upon to account for anything he did not receive. Mrs. Furlong testified that she gave him all the property that could be found, and that he might have had the heifers and calves if he had called for them. The defendant is not charged with embezzling money collected by Mrs. Furlong, or property retained by her. If he was dissatisfied with his agreement on the ground that she had retained a portion of the property, or had collected some of the book-accounts, he should have declined to proceed further with his trust until the whole of the property was turned over to him. So long as he retained any property under the contract, he was bound to use it as required by the provisions thereof. Judgment and order affirmed.

People v. Stewart. (No. 20,512.)

Larceny.

Prosecutor testified that while on a bed with money about his person defendant said he would put the money under his (prosecutor's) head, and raised the pillow as if doing so, and when he awoke in the afternoon the money was gone. Defendant testified that he told prosecutor that he would take care of the money, and prosecutor said "All right;" that he took the money, and deposited it with a friend, and drove to a village some miles distant, where he had previously been intending to go on that day, with a horse and buggy which he had engaged several days before. He told his friends that he would return that night or next morning. On receipt of a dispatch that he was accused of larceny, he immediately started to return, and on the way back met the constable and told him that he had deposited the money with a friend, went there with him, and paid it over. Held, that the evidence was not sufficient to prove a felonious taking of the money beyond a reasonable doubt.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Colusa county; E. A. Bridgford, Judge.

T. J. Hart, for appellant. George A. Johnson, Atty. Gen., for the People.

Paterson, J. The defendant was convicted of grand larceny, and the only question presented for our consideration is whether the evidence is sufficient to support the verdict. The bill of exceptions (which is a model in form and conciseness) shows the following state of facts: On the 30th day of June, 1888, the prosecuting witness, Bryan, was lying on a bench in the shade of a porch at Orland. Some horses which were tied to the porch became frightened, and threw him out into the street. He was picked up by the defendant, and escorted to the latter's room, across the street. Bryan lay down upon the bed in the room, desiring to sleep. The defendant asked him if he had any money on his person. Bryan replied that he had the sum of $180. The defendant said that, as there was a circus in town that day, somebody might come along and take it. Bryan testified that the defendant said he would put the money under his (Bryan's) head, and raised the pillow as if he were putting it there. The defendant testified that he told Bryan that he would take care of his money, and Bryan said "All right;" that he took the money, and placed it on deposit with a friend. When Bryan awoke, about 3 o'clock in the afternoon, he discovered that his money was gone. He made inquiries for the defendant, and learned that he had gone to Germantown. He thereupon made complaint against defendant, and procured his arrest on a charge of grand larceny. As soon as the defendant had deposited the $180 for safe-keeping with his friend he borrowed $10 from one Maupin, and a like sum from Sweeney, and took a horse and buggy which he had engaged several days before and started for Germantown, a village 10 or 12 miles distant from Orland, telling the friends from whom he borrowed the money that he would return that night or the next morning. It appears without contradiction that the defendant had been intending for several days to go to Germantown that day. As soon as the friends of the defendant heard that Bryan was accusing him of larceny they sent him a dispatch, which he received at Germantown. Upon receipt of this telegram he immediately started to return to Orland. On his way back to Orland he met the constable, and told him that he had Bryan's money on deposit with a friend, and, if the latter would go with him, he would get the money and pay it over, which was done. It appears that the defendant and Bryan had been friends for some time, and that on one occasion Bryan said to the defendant that he had $3,000 on his person, and would like to have him (defendant) look out for him. It appears, also, that on one occasion Bryan had lent defendant a small sum of money.

The only conflict there is in the evidence is upon the question whether the defendant placed, or pretended to place, the money under the pillow, as claimed by Bryan, or whether he took it out of the room, without pretending to place it under the pillow, and deposited it, as claimed by defendant; and this portion of Bryan's testimony is the only evidence in the case which in any way tends to show a felonious taking of the money by defendant. Taken altogether, the evidence is entirely consistent with the claim of defendant, that he took it as the friend of Bryan, for safe-keeping, believing that, as the room was not locked, and as there were a great many strangers in town that day, some one might enter the room and take it away from Bryan while the latter was sleeping. Every act of the defendant, subsequent to the taking of the money from the person of Bryan, is indicative of fair and honest dealing. The fact that he went from Orland to Germantown immediately thereafter is explained by the fact that such visit had been contemplated for several days. It is not disputed that the money was placed in the hands of defendant's friend for safe-keeping. As soon as the defendant was notified that he was wanted in Orland he started to return, and when met by the constable immediately informed him where the money was, and promptly and voluntarily offered to return it. The evidence is not sufficient, we think, to produce a conviction in an unprejudiced mind that there was any felonious taking of the money by defendant, and the verdict must have been the result of passion and prejudice. Even in civil cases "that evidence is deemed satisfactory which ordinarily produces moral certainty or conviction in an unprejudiced mind. Such evidence, alone, will justify a verdict. Evidence less than this is denominated 'slight evidence.'" Section 1835, Code Civil Proc. As stated before, the only evidence tending in any way to show a felonious taking is that of the prosecuting witness, in which he says that the defendant pretended to place the money under his pillow. The most that can be said in support of the verdict is that the evidence tending to show guilt is "slight evidence." Judgment and order reversed.

APPEAL—HOMICIDE—EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. The action of the trial court in overruling an objection to evidence cannot be reviewed when the evidence is not before the appellate court; and the case will not be reversed when it appears that the jury were instructed not to consider the evidence, unless it is shown that the substantial rights of defendants were affected by its admission.

2. There was evidence that defendants had conspired to steal the property of deceased, and in carrying out the conspiracy one or more of defendants killed deceased. The evidence was not in the record. The jury were instructed that if defendants conspired to commit a felony, and killed deceased in prosecuting the design, it was murder in all, though only one may have inflicted the fatal blow, the others being present aiding and abetting, and that in such homicides the law superadds the intent to kill to the original felonious intent. Held that, though defendants were not being tried for grand larceny or conspiracy, the fact that the murder was the result of a conspiracy to commit another crime, and the attempt to carry it out, were material for the jury to consider, and the instruction stated the law correctly.

3. In order to show that the killing constituted murder under Pen. Code Cal. § 189, which enumerates the class of homicides to which the law "superadds the intent to kill," it was competent to show that it was done in the commission or attempt to commit a felony, whether such felony was committed or attempted as the result of a conspiracy or not; and in such case the law attaches the felonious intent accompanying the crime contemplated to the act of killing, and constitutes it murder, whether it be one of those enumerated in section 189 or not.

4. An instruction that if the jury find defendant guilty of murder in the first degree, and also find that there is some extenuating fact, it is within their discretion to pronounce such a sentence as will relieve defendant from the extreme penalty of the law,—the jury being invested with that discretion, which is not an arbitrary one, but is limited to determining which of two punishments shall be inflicted, and is to be employed only when the jury is satisfied that the lighter penalty should be imposed,—and that if the evidence shows any of the defendants to be guilty of murder in the first degree, but does not show some extenuating fact or circumstance, the jury must find such defendant simply guilty of murder in the first degree, and leave it to the law to affix the punishment, is not erroneous or misleading, though open to criticism.

5. Defendant cannot complain that the instruction was not sufficiently certain and specific when the attention of the court below has not been called to it, and no more specific instruction has been asked for.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, El Dorado county; GEORGE E. WILSON, Judge.

One Meyer, John Olsen, and William Drager were indicted for the murder of one John Lowell, a ranch-owner in El Dorado county, on March 24, 1888. The two latter, Olsen and Drager, were convicted, and sentenced to death. They moved for a new trial, which was denied, and an appeal was taken therefrom, but no bill of exceptions was settled. They also appealed from the judgment. The record on appeal contained the proposed bill of exceptions, but the appeal was considered on the judgment roll alone. Among others, the court below instructed the jury as follows: "If you find any of the defendants guilty of murder in the first degree, and you also find the further fact that there is some extenuating fact or circumstance in the case of such defendant, it is within your discretion to pronounce such a sentence as will relieve such defendant from the extreme penalty of the law. The Penal Code invests a jury in a criminal case for murder with that discretion, but the discretion is not an arbitrary one, and is limited to determining which of two punishments shall be inflicted, and is to be employed only when the jury is satisfied that the lighter penalty should be imposed. If the evidence shows any of the defendants to be guilty of murder in the first degree, but does not show some extenuating fact or circumstance, it is the duty of the jury to find as to such defendant a simple verdict of murder in the first degree, and leave with the law the responsibility of affixing the punishment."

Irwin & Irwin, J. G. Carpenter, and Prentiss Carpenter, for appellants. George A. Johnson, Atty. Gen., for the People.

WORKS, J. The appellants were convicted of the crime of murder, and sentenced to death. The evidence is not before us, the appeal being on the judgment roll. Counsel for appellants contend that certain evidence was improperly admitted, and claim that we can consider the action of the court in overruling their objection thereto, in the absence of the evidence, because it appears from the instructions of the court that the jury were thereby directed not to consider the same. But the fact that the court, in effect, acknowledged its error in admitting the testimony by thus instructing the jury cannot justify a reversal of the case. So far as we know, the court below may have been right in its first ruling and wrong in directing the jury not to consider the evidence. But, if this were not so, it is not enough for the appellants to show error. It must appear to have been an error affecting their substantial rights. It may be that the evidence was not only not harmful to them, but that it was beneficial. We may fairly assume this to be so as against an appellant who does not bring up the evidence for our inspection.

The court charged the jury as follows: "If a number of persons conspire together to commit a felony and take the life of another person in the prosecution of the common design, it is murder in all, although only one may have inflicted the fatal blow, the others being present aiding and abetting. In such homicides the law superadds the intent to kill to the original felonious intent, and estops the criminal from denying the further intent, thus imputed. The thing done having proceeded from a corrupt mind is to be viewed the same, whether the corruption is of one particular form or another." The appellants contend that this instruction was erroneous. It is stated in the instructions that evidence had been introduced for the purpose of showing that the defendants had entered into a conspiracy to commit the crime of grand larceny in stealing and driving away horses and mules claimed to have been in the possession of the deceased, and that in carrying out the conspiracy, for the purpose of accomplishing its object, one or more of the defendants killed the deceased. What the evidence was, or what it proved or tended to prove, we do not know, as the evidence is not in the record, and in the absence of such knowledge we do not know that the instruction was wrong, conceding that it would have been wrong in any state of the evidence. We do not clearly understand counsel's objection to the instruction, and for that reason give it in full: "The defendants were being tried for the crime of murder, and not for that of grand larceny, and the instruction was given for the purpose of showing their liability as conspirators, and in this respect it was erroneous. What the court intended to say was, that 'if a number of persons conspire together to commit a felony, and in the prosecution of the common design take the life of another person,' etc., and so it must read. In order to make one person liable as a conspirator for the acts done by another, the act done 'must be the ordinary and probable effect of the wrongful act especially agreed on, so that the connection between them may be reasonably apparent, and not a fresh and independent product of the mind of one of the confederates outside of or foreign to the common design.'" It is true, the defendants were not being tried for grand larceny or conspiracy, but the fact that the graver crime charged against them was the result of a conspiracy to commit another crime, and the attempt to carry it out, were material for the jury to consider. Conceding that the act must have been the "ordinary and probable effect of the wrongful act especially agreed on," the evidence on which this instruction was founded may have shown that to have been the case. But, whether it did or not, the instruction only goes to a case where the conspiracy to commit a felony, and the attempt to commit it, are shown, and the murder is committed in the prosecution of the common design, the blow being inflicted by one of the defendants, the others being present aiding and abetting. This conclusively shows that the court was not instructing the jury as to the presumption in the supposed case of counsel where the greater crime was or might have been "a fresh and independent product of the mind of one of the conspirators outside of and foreign to the common design." The instruction stated the law correctly. Pen. Code, § 192; 2 Thomp. Trials, § 2204; State v. Shelledy, 8 Iowa, 485, 495, 505.

Counsel claim that it is only the class of homicides enumerated in section 189 of the Penal Code to which the law superadds the intent to kill. In this counsel are mistaken. The section referred to provides what shall constitute murder in the first and second degrees. The instruction relates to the intent to kill. The mere act of killing, and the circumstances surrounding it, may be, and may have been in this case, sufficient to show that the killing was intentional and felonious; but, in order to show that the killing was such as to constitute the act murder, it was competent to show that it was done in the commission or attempt to commit a felony, whether such felony was committed or attempted as the result of a conspiracy or not. People v. Doyell, 48 Cal. 94; People v. Foren, 25 Cal. 364. And where the killing is the result of the commission or the attempt to commit a felony, whether it be one of those named in section 189 of the Code or not, the law attaches the felonious intent accompanying the crime contemplated to the act of killing, and constitutes it murder. Thus in People v. Foren, supra, it is said: "The common law measures an act which is malum in se substantially by the result produced, though not contemplated, holding the doer of the act guilty of the thing done in the same manner as if it were specially intended, though not always guilty of the crime committed in the same degree. Ruth. Inst. bk. 1, c. 18, § 11. On this principle, if one intending to murder a particular person attempts to shoot him, but, missing his mark, shoots another, or, in an attempt to poison one, another accidentally loses his life by means of it, it is murder in the first degree. 1 Bish. Crim. Law, §§ 255, 257." And in People v. Doyell, supra: "To establish the malice aforethought, however, the specific intent to kill need not be proved.

To constitute a crime there must be a joint operation of act and intention. But the common law measures an act which is malum in se substantially by the result produced, though not contemplated, holding the doer of the act guilty of the thing done in the same manner as if it were specially intended, though not always guilty of the crime committed in the same degree. People v. Foren, 25 Cal. 365. Whenever one, in doing an act with the design of committing a felony, takes the life of another, even accidentally, this is murder. Acts 1850, p. 231, § 25; 2 Bish. Crim. Law, 741. In such homicides the law superadds the intent to kill to the original felonious intent, and estops the criminal from denying the further intent thus imputed. The thing done, having proceeded from a corrupt mind, is to be viewed the same, whether the corruption is of one particular form or another. Ruth. Inst. c. 18, § 9; 1 Bish. Crim. Law, 411. The amendment (of 1856) of the act of 1850, 'concerning crimes and punishments,' did not change the law of murder done in the attempt to commit a felony. It only prescribes a severer punishment where the murder is committed in the attempt to perpetrate arson, rape, robbery, or burglary (on account of the enormity of those offenses) than where it is committed in carrying out any other felonious design. * * * But, besides those committed in the perpetration of felonies, a large number of homicides have been adjudged murder, where the specific intent to take life does not appear or does not exist. Thus, where the killing is involuntary, but happens in the commission of an unlawful act, which, in its consequences, naturally tends to destroy life, it is murder; so, if the intent to kill is not made apparent, but the killing is unlawful, and not done in the heat of passion, or the specific intent to take life not appearing, all the circumstances show an abandoned and malignant heart. In these, and in like cases, the malice aforethought is implied, the law attributing to the slayer the intent to kill, although such intent is not made manifest as a fact." Another branch of the instruction, containing substantially the same enunciation of the law relating to the subject of conspiracy, is objected to on similar grounds, but for the reasons above given the instruction was not erroneous.

The court also gave the instruction found in full in People v. Brick, 68 Cal. 191, 8 Pac. Rep. 858, and counsel contend that this was error. It was expressly held in the case referred to that there was no error in the instruction. But the objection now made is that the instruction was not sufficiently clear and specific in its announcement to the jury that if they found the defendant guilty of murder in the first degree it was within their province to relieve the defendant from the death penalty. The language used is: "It is within your discretion to pronounce such a sentence as will relieve such defendant from the extreme penalty of the law." The instruction is certainly open to criticism in this respect. In the trial of cases of this kind the court should carefully instruct the jury, not only that they have the discretion to relieve a defendant from the extreme penalty of the law, but they should be told in specific terms what verdict they are authorized to return, and the forms of the different kinds of verdicts should be stated, and such forms of verdicts prepared and sent out with the jury, allowing them to select the one agreed upon by them. But the jury were apprised of the fact here that they were not bound to return such a verdict as would result in the infliction of the death penalty. There was nothing in the instruction to mislead. If the counsel for defendant desired a more specific charge on the point they should have asked it, and if they did not do so the responsibility must rest with them. People v. Haun, 44 Cal. 96; People v. Ah Wee, 48 Cal. 237; People v. Collins, Id. 277; People v. Flynn, 73 Cal. 511, 15 Pac. Rep. 102. We do not wish to be understood as holding that an entire failure to instruct on this subject, in this class of cases, would not be error. But where the court does instruct and call to the attention of the jury that it is within their province to determine whether or not the extreme penalty shall be inflicted, and the instruction is not such as to mislead the jury, a defendant cannot be allowed to complain that the instruction was not sufficiently certain and specific, when the attention of the court below has not been called to it, and no more specific instruction has been asked for. Judgment affirmed.

EXAMINATION OF WITNESS—HOMICIDE—BURDEN OF PROOF.

1. Where a witness for the prosecution, in a trial for murder, testifies inconsistently with his testimony at the coroner's inquest, it is not error to call his attention to what he had testified to before the coroner, and, upon his denial thereof, to read such testimony to the jury.[1]

2. Where defendant claims to have killed deceased accidentally he is only bound under Pen. Code Cal. § 1105, which provides that, "upon a trial for murder, the commission of the homicide by the defendant being proved, the burden of proving circumstances of mitigation, or that justify or excuse it, devolves upon him, unless the proof on the part of the prosecution tends to show that the crime committed only amounts to manslaughter, or that the defendant was justifiable or excusable," to produce such evidence as will create in the minds of the jury a reasonable doubt of his guilt of the offense charged, and it was error to charge that "when the killing is proved beyond a reasonable doubt, the defendant must make out his case in mitigation to excuse or justify it by some stronger proof in some appreciable degree than the proof of the prosecution. The burden of proof changes, and the proof on the part of the defendant must be in some degree stronger than the proof on the other side."

[1] Under the Indiana statute allowing the party producing a witness to contradict him by showing that he had made statements different from his testimony, the state, in a trial for homicide, may show that a witness called by it, and who testified that defendant did not strike the fatal blow, had stated that he did strike it. Conway v. State, 21 N. E. Rep. 285. As to how far a party may impeach his own witness, see Gardner v. Connelly, (Iowa,) 39 N. W. Rep. 650, and note; White v. State, (Ala.) 5 South. Rep. 674.

3. An instruction that, if the jury found "from the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the homicide was committed by defendant at the time and place mentioned in the indictment," he could not be excused unless they found "that such homicide was committed by accident and misfortune, in lawfully correcting a child or servant, or in doing any other lawful act, by lawful means, with usual and ordinary caution, and without any unlawful intent, or that such homicide was committed by the defendant by accident and misfortune, in the heat of passion, upon any sudden and sufficient provocation, or upon a sudden combat, when no undue advantage was taken, or any dangerous weapon used, and when the killing is not done in a cruel and unusual manner," was in the language of Pen. Code Cal. § 195, and was proper.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Luis Obispo county; D. S. Gregory, Judge.

Indictment for murder in the first degree.

W. B. Dillard, for appellant. George A. Johnson, Atty. Gen., for the People.

Works, J. The defendant was charged with the crime of murder, and tried and convicted of manslaughter. His motion for a new trial was denied, and he appeals.

It is contended that the court below erred "in allowing purported testimony of the prosecuting witness, Hernandez, given at the coroner's inquest, to be read in the presence and hearing of the jury, and in allowing the coroner to give evidence of the purported testimony given before him by Hernandez on that occasion, and that it erred in not striking out such evidence as hearsay." The evidence referred to was introduced for the purpose of impeaching the witness Hernandez, who had been put upon the stand by the prosecution, and testified in such a way as to prejudice the people's case, and inconsistently with the testimony given by him at the coroner's inquest. It was proper for this purpose to call the attention of the witness to what he had testified before the coroner, and read the same in the presence of the jury, and, upon his denial of said testimony, to prove that he did so testify. Code Civil Proc. §§ 2049, 2052.

It is further contended that instructions 10, 11, 12, and 15, given by the court, were erroneous. The killing of the deceased by the defendant was admitted, but it was claimed at the trial that the killing was done accidentally. In its ninth instruction, which is not objected to, the court instructed the jury as follows: "(9) Upon a trial for murder the commission of a homicide by the defendant being proved, the burden of proving circumstances of mitigation, or that justify or excuse it, devolves upon him, unless the proof on the part of the prosecution tends to show that the crime committed only amounts to manslaughter, or that the defendant was justifiable or excusable." The instructions complained of are as follows: "(10) Up to the moment when the killing is proved to have been committed by the defendant the prosecution must make out its case beyond any reasonable doubt. When the killing is so proved, it devolves upon the defendant to show any circumstances of mitigation to excuse or justify it by a preponderance of evidence on his part; that is, the killing being proved, the defendant must make out his case in mitigation to excuse or justify it by some stronger proof in some appreciable degree than the proof of the prosecution. The burden of proof changes, and the proof on the part of the defendant must be in some degree stronger than the proof on the other side. (11) Every person is presumed to intend what his acts indicate his intentions to have been, and if you find from the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the defendant fired a loaded pistol at the deceased, and killed him, the law presumes that the defendant intended to kill the deceased; and, unless it is shown by the evidence that his intention was other than his acts indicated, the law will not hold him guiltless. (12) Homicide is excusable in the following cases: First, when committed by accident and misfortune, in lawfully correcting a child or servant, or in doing any other lawful act, by lawful means, with usual and ordinary caution, and without any unlawful intent; second, when committed by accident and misfortune in the heat of passion, upon any sudden and sufficient provocation, or upon a sudden combat, when no undue advantage is taken, nor any dangerous weapon used, and when the killing is not done in a cruel or unusual manner; and, if you find from the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the homicide was committed by the defendant at the time and place mentioned in the indictment, you cannot by your verdict excuse him under the law, unless you find that such homicide was committed by accident and misfortune, in lawfully correcting a child or servant, or in doing any other lawful act, by lawful means, with usual and ordinary caution, and without any unlawful intent, or that such homicide was committed by the defendant by accident and misfortune, in the heat of passion, upon any sudden and sufficient provocation, or upon a sudden combat, when no undue advantage was taken, or any dangerous weapon used, and when the killing is not done in a cruel and unusual manner." "(15) The flight of a person immediately after the commission of a crime, or after a crime has been committed with which he is charged, is a circumstance to be weighed by the jury as tending in some degree to prove a consciousness of guilt, and entitled to more or less weight, according to the circumstances of the particular case. Evidence of flight is received, not as a part of the res gestæ of the criminal act itself, but as indicative of a guilty mind; and if you find from the evidence in this case that Louis Cupis was killed, as charged in the indictment, and that immediately after such killing the defendant left and escaped from the place and the vicinity of the killing, it is a circumstance to be weighed by you, gentlemen of the jury, as tending in some degree to prove a consciousness of guilt. It is not sufficient of itself to establish the guilt of the defendant, but the weight to which that circumstance is entitled is a matter for you to determine in connection with all the facts and circumstances called out in the case." The tenth instruction was erroneous. Section 1105 of the Penal Code provides: "Upon a trial for murder, the commission of the homicide by the defendant being proved, the burden of proving circumstances of mitigation, or that justify or excuse it, devolves upon him, unless the proof on the part of the prosecution tends to show that the crime committed only amounts to manslaughter, or that the defendant was justifiable or excusable." The section casts upon the defendant the burden of proving circumstances of mitigation, or that justify or excuse the commission of the homicide. This does not mean that he must prove such circumstances by a preponderance of the evidence, but that the presumption that the killing was felonious arises from the mere proof by the prosecution of the homicide, and the burden of proving circumstances of mitigation, etc., is thereby cast upon him. He is only bound, under this rule, to produce such evidence as will create in the minds of the jury a reasonable doubt of his guilt of the offense charged. People v. Flanagan, 60 Cal. 3; People v. Smith, 59 Cal. 607. It can make no difference whether this reasonable doubt is the result of evidence on the part of the defendant tending to show circumstances of mitigation, or that justify or excuse the killing, or from other evidence coming from him or the prosecution. The well-settled rule that a defendant shall not be convicted unless the evidence proves his guilt beyond a reasonable doubt applies to the whole and every material part of the case, no matter whether it is as to the act of killing, or the reason for or manner of its commission. The section under consideration was not intended to, and does not, change this rule as to the weight of the evidence. It simply provides that, certain facts being proved, the presumption of guilt shall follow, unless the defendant shall himself prove certain other facts. It does not attempt to provide the degree of proof required of him, but leaves the rule as to the degree of evidence necessary to convict as it was before. The jury should have been instructed that the burden of proving circumstances of mitigation, or that justified or excused the killing, devolved upon the defendant; but that if, upon the whole case, they entertained a reasonable doubt, from the evidence, as to his guilt, he should be acquitted. Any other rule as to the weight of the evidence makes one measure applicable to one part of the case, and a different one to another part, and leads to confusion.

In justice to the learned judge of the court below we must say that the instruction given is warranted by some of the decisions of this court, (People v. Hong Ah Duck, 61 Cal. 395; People v. Raten, 63 Cal. 422;) but on mature consideration we feel constrained to hold that they were based upon an erroneous construction of section 1105 of the Penal Code. The eleventh instruction stated the law correctly. People v. Langton, 67 Cal. 427, 7 Pac. Rep. 843. It is claimed that the twelfth instruction was erroneous, because it required both accident and misfortune to constitute a defense. The instruction used the language of the Code, and was proper. Pen. Code, § 195. It is urged that the fifteenth instruction assumed that the crime charged was committed, and was for that reason erroneous. We see nothing in the language of the instruction from which it could be inferred that the court assumed or intended to assume that the crime charged had been committed. For the error in giving the tenth instruction the judgment and order appealed from are reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

PEOPLE v. CARROLL. (No. 20,540.)

GAMING—INDICTMENT—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. Pen. Code Cal. § 330, provides that every person who carries on and conducts any banking or percentage game, "played for money, checks, credit, or any other representative of value, is punishable," etc. Held, that an information that defendant did "willfully and unlawfully open, carry on, and conduct for money a certain banking game, * * * to-wit, a wheel marked with numbers and colors, * * * commonly known as a 'Wheel of Fortune,' " etc., charges no offense under said section, or any other, in that it fails to state that the game was "played for money, checks, credit, or any other representative of value."

2. It is not necessary in an indictment for a violation of Pen. Code Cal. § 330, to state the name of the game or the name of the device by which it is played, and where games may be known under different names the inclusion of such under the name "banking game" does not render the statute so indefinite as to be inoperative. MCFARLAND, J., dissenting.

3. Under Pen. Code Cal. § 1175, which provides that a bill of exceptions must contain so much of the evidence only as is necessary to present the questions of law upon which the exceptions were taken, "and the judge is required to strike out all other matters contained therein," the question whether the venue was proved on the trial or not cannot be raised on appeal when the transcript fails to show that it contains all the evidence, and the sufficiency of the proof of venue does not appear to have been questioned.

4. The question whether the game played was a banking game or not was one of law for the court, and as the court should have charged as to the meaning of the term "banking game" it was not error to permit a witness to define the term and then instruct the jury that it was a matter of fact for them to determine whether the game in question came within the term. MCFARLAND, J., dissenting.

5. One witness cannot describe the game and another testify that, from the description, the game was a banking game or any other, but a person who knows the game may testify in general terms what the game he witnessed was; if not familiar with the game he may describe it, and the court should instruct the jury as to what constitutes the game charged to have been played or conducted, leaving it for them to determine whether the game played was the one charged or not. MCFARLAND, J., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; M. K. HARRIS, Judge.

J. P. Carroll was indicted for willfully and unlawfully carrying on and conducting a certain banking game commonly known as the "Wheel of Fortune." He was convicted, and appeals.

W. A. Anderson, for appellant. George A. Johnson, Atty. Gen., for the People.

WORKS, J. The information in this case charges as follows: "That said P. J. Carroll did, on the 7th day of October, 1887, at and in said county of Fresno, state of California, and prior to the filing of this information, willfully and unlawfully open, carry on, and conduct for money a certain banking game, played with a certain device, to-wit, a wheel marked with numbers and colors, said game being then and there a banking game, commonly known as the 'Wheel of Fortune,' contrary to the form, force, and effect of the statute in such cases made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the state of California." The section of the Code under which the prosecution was instituted provides: "Every person who deals, plays, or carries on, opens, or causes to be opened, or who conducts, either as owner or employé, whether for hire or not, any game of faro, monte, roulette, lansquenet, rouge et noire, rondo, tan, fan-tan, stud-horse poker, seven and a half, twenty-one, or any banking or percentage game played with cards, dice, or any device, for money, checks, credit, or any other representative of value, is punishable by a fine of not less than two hundred dollars nor more than one thousand dollars, and shall be imprisoned in the county jail until such fine and costs of prosecution are paid, such imprisonment not to exceed one year; and every person who plays or bets at or against any of said prohibited game or games is guilty of a misdemeanor." Pen. Code, § 330. The information charges no offense under this section of the Code, or any other. To constitute it an offense to conduct the game it must be "played for money, checks, credit, or any other representative of value." The information does not charge that the game was played for money, but that defendant conducted it for money. It may be that those who were engaged in the game were playing for amusement, and paid the defendant a fixed sum, in no way dependent upon the result of the game, for conducting it. This would be within the allegations of the information, but it would not be a public offense or within the statute. It is contended by the appellant that there could be no conviction for playing or conducting a "banking game," if the information were sufficient in other respects, for the reason that the designation of the offense in the statute is too general and indefinite; and what constitutes a banking game is not generally known, and is not defined by the statute. The same might be said of the game of poker. Both games are no doubt known and understood by gamblers and by many who are not gamblers. The game of poker may be known by a greater number of people, but neither, fortunately, are familiar to the public generally. We can see no reason, therefore, why a statute making it an offense to play a banking game is not as valid and certain as a matter of legal certainty as one making it a public offense to play poker. Both may be said to be commonly known and understood. Section 666 of the Code of Criminal Procedure of Oregon, which provided that "all gambling devices of whatever name or nature adopted, devised, or designed for the purpose of playing any game of chance for money, * * * are prohibited from being set up, kept, used," etc., was held by the supreme court of that state not to include the "game of cards commonly called 'poker,'" because it was not specified by name as one of the devices prohibited by the statute. State v. Mann, 2 Or. 238. The appellant relies upon this case, but it is not in point. Our Code does specify a banking game by name. It may be that there are games known by different names which are included under the term "banking game," but this does not, in our judgment, render the statute so indefinite as to be inoperative. Such a construction would greatly facilitate the discovery of new games or old ones under assumed names, and embarrass the law-making power in a laudable effort to suppress a habit so pernicious and hurtful to society. But the case of State v. Mann, supra, was in effect overruled by the same court in a later decision, in which a statute very similar to our own was held to be sufficiently definite. State v. Gitt Lee, 6 Or. 426. In that case the court said: "We are of the opinion that it is not necessary in an indictment for a violation of this statute to state the name of the game, or the name of the device by which it is played. There is much force in the suggestion of the district attorney, that if it were essential, either in a statute defining the offense of gambling, or in an indictment for the violation of such statute, to give the name of the game or of the device by which it is played, it would always be easy to evade the statute by changing the name of either the device or the game. We think that part of section 1 which prohibits 'any banking or any other game played with cards, dice, or any other device, whether the same be played for money, checks, credits, or any other representative of value,' is sufficiently definite, and renders unlawful all games not previously enumerated in that section, and which are played for 'money, checks, credits, or any other representative of value,' with 'cards, dice, or other device.'" See, also, to the same effect, In re Lee Tong, 18 Fed. Rep. 253; Miller v. State, 48 Ala. 122; Smith v. State, 17 Tex. 191. We think the section of the Code under consideration is sufficiently definite in this respect, and that it includes the offense attempted to be charged in this case.

It is claimed by the appellant that the venue was not proven. But we think he has not put himself in a position to present the question to this court. The transcript does not show in terms that it contains all of the evidence given at the trial. It is only required that it contain "so much of the evidence as is necessary to present the questions of law upon which the exceptions were taken," and the judge is required to "strike out all other matter contained therein." Pen. Code, § 1175. No question appears to have been made in the court below as to the sufficiency of the evidence in this respect, and no such specification of insufficiency of the evidence is made. Therefore the record does not present for our consideration the point attempted to be raised. At the trial evidence was allowed on the part of the prosecution to show what constituted a banking game, and it is urged that this was error, because the witness by whom it was proved was not shown to have been an expert, or to have personal knowledge of the game. We find it unnecessary to determine whether the witness was competent to give an opinion on the subject or not. The question whether the game played was a banking game or not was one of law for the court, and we find that the definition given by the witness of a banking game was substantially correct, and such as the court should have given in its charge to the jury. He described the game as follows: "A banking game, as I understand it, is a game conducted by one or more persons where there is a fund against which everybody has a right to bet, the bank being responsible for the payment of all the funds, taking all that is won and paying out all that is lost. The fund which is provided for that purpose is generally called the 'bank,' and the person who conducts it the 'banker.'" We take this to be a sufficiently accurate definition of a banking game, and, as the court should have so charged the jury as matter of law, the fact that the court permitted the definition to be given by a witness and instructed the jury that it was a question of fact for them to determine could have done the appellant no harm. The court of appeals of Kentucky speaks of "banking games, such as faro, roulette, and other games, where there is a fund of money offered and ready to be staked on all bets others may choose to make against the banker on the game which he shall exhibit to entice bets." Ritte v. Com., 18 B. Mon. 40; Bish. St. Crimes, § 866. But if this were not so this court has held in a late case that the kind of game that was being played might be proved in the mode adopted and followed in this case. People v. Sam Lung, 70 Cal. 515.[1] We do not concur in the view, however, that one witness can describe the game and another can be allowed to testify that, from that description, the game was a banking game or any other. We think a person who knows the game may testify in general terms what the game he witnessed was. If not familiar with the game he may describe it, and the court should instruct the jury as to what constitutes the game charged to have been played or conducted, leaving the jury to determine whether the game played was the one charged or not. To leave the question open to be proved or disproved in every case by experts would lead to great uncertainty in the administration of justice. For the insufficiency of the information the judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded.

We concur: BEATTY, C. J.; SHARPSTEIN, J.

PATERSON, J. I concur in the judgment.

THORNTON, J. I concur in the judgment on the first point discussed in the opinion. I find no other error in the record.

MCFARLAND, J. I concur in the judgment on the first ground mentioned in the opinion of Mr. Justice WORKS, and I also concur in what is said in that opinion on the subject of venue. I do not concur, however, in the other parts of that opinion. I think that the testimony of Judge TERRY was not only erroneously admitted, but was also important and material in the case. The court evidently did not know what a banking game was, as appears from its instructions to the jury; and the witness, although not an expert, (except as to matters of law,) was called to inform the court and jury on that subject. But that was really informing the court what the law was, and if the provision of the statute in question was so indefinite that the court could not tell the jury what facts would constitute a crime under it—that is, what the law of the case was—without the aid of a witness to tell it, then no conviction could be had under it. How would it look for a court to allow witnesses to testify what constitutes "larceny" or "burglary" or "embezzlement?" Of course, there are many well-known games which are designated in the statute by specific names; but that the general term "banking game" has no definite meaning strikingly appeared on the trial of this case, because—First, the witnesses who were erroneously examined on the subject differed in their opinions; and, second, the court itself did not know what it meant. Can a man be held to answer a criminal charge upon such a vague accusation? And the evils suggested as likely to arise from this view can be easily remedied. If the legislature desires to make the playing of "a banking game" a crime, let it simply put into the statute what it means by that term, so that the court can tell the jury what constitutes the offense.

SHARON v. SHARON. (No. 11,991.)

MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL—DIVORCE—FINAL JUDGMENT.

1. A motion for a new trial, made after an order for judgment and decree of divorce, but before a referee appointed to ascertain the amount of community property has made a report, is not a premature proceeding, nor is the trial court without jurisdiction to hear the motion.

2. In an action for divorce and alimony, an order for judgment and decree is a final determination of the issues involved, from which an appeal will lie; and the appointment thereafter of a referee to ascertain the amount and character of the community property is a proceeding to carry the judgment into effect, and any orders in relation thereto are themselves the subjects of appeal.

In bank. On motion for rehearing.

For statement of case and former opinion, see ante, 26.

Wm. F. Herrin and S. M. Wilson, for appellant. D. S. Terry, J. G. Maguire, and W. T. Baggett, for respondent.

FOX, J. The petition for rehearing in this cause is denied. One of the points made in the petition is to the effect that the court ought to vacate the judgment made and given herein on the 17th day of July, 1889, on the ground that the appeal from the order denying the new trial ought not to have been entertained, because the steps taken in the lower court for a new trial were premature, having been taken before the coming in of the report of a referee appointed by the court to report upon the amount and character of the community property of the parties, and that the court below had no jurisdiction to hear the same. Before the argument of this case upon the appeal from the order denying motion for new trial, a formal motion was made to dismiss the appeal, upon several grounds, one of which was substantially the same as the ground of this objection. The motion was elaborately argued, orally and upon briefs, and upon due consideration was by the court denied. The court fully considered the question of jurisdiction to hear and determine the motion for new trial, and the appeal from the order denying the same, at the time, and we see no reason to change the conclusion then reached. The action is for divorce, and before any steps were taken in the matter of a motion for new trial, the cause had been tried upon its merits and the court had made and filed its decision and findings upon all the issues in the cause necessary to the entry of a judgment and decree for divorce, and had ordered judgment and decree accordingly. As ancillary to that decree the court found that the plaintiff was entitled to a division of the community property, but was at the time unadvised as to what was community property. It appointed a referee to take testimony and report to the court upon that question. But that question was not one necessary to be investigated prior to the entry of judgment for divorce. In practice, the settlement of alimony and the distribution of community property are matters which are frequently and properly done after judgment, (sometimes long after,) and so far as they relate to alimony are the subject of frequent change. Orders in this behalf are orders after judgment, and are themselves the subject of appeal. It is never held that motions for new trial must or can properly be delayed until the final settlement of all matters which may lawfully be the subject of consideration and order, or even of supplemental decree after judgment. The reference in this case was not one for the taking of an account, or for report upon any subject necessary to enable the court to render judgment upon the issues in the cause, but was one for the purpose of securing information necessary for carrying a judgment already ordered into effect. Code Civil Proc. § 639. A new trial is the re-examination of an issue of fact, in the same court, after a trial and decision by the court. Id. § 656. In this case all the issues necessary to final judgment had been tried and determined. All that remained was to carry the judgment into effect. The time had come when, if ever, a motion to vacate that decision, and for a new trial, must be made, under the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure, § 657 et seq. It was regularly made, heard, and determined, and from the order denying such motion an appeal was regularly prosecuted to this court, and the court had full jurisdiction to hear and determine such appeal. Here all the issues in the case, necessary to determine whether or not the plaintiff was entitled to a decree for divorce, and also whether she was entitled to share in the community property, had been tried and determined by the court, and the court had determined the same, and filed its findings thereon, and judgment could be, and thereafter in due course was, entered thereon. All that remained was to carry that judgment into effect, by making division of the community property, as provided in the decision, and in the judgment that followed. The judgment of the court on the issues involved was a final judgment. Clark v. Dunnam, 46 Cal. 208. Within 10 days after notice of that decision it was the duty of the defendant to take the initiatory steps towards moving for a new trial, if he ever intended to make such motion, and thereafter to prosecute the same with diligence to a determination. He had the right to waive the notice, and take these steps without waiting for notice. Our conclusion is that the motion for new trial was not prematurely made, and that the court had full jurisdiction to entertain the same, and to hear and determine the motion. It follows that this court had full jurisdiction to hear and determine the appeal from the order denying such motion.

In re CHAMBERS. (No. 20,548.)

ADOPTION OF MINORS.

Under act Cal. April 1, 1878, authorizing managers of orphan asylums to consent to the adoption of children under their care in the same manner that parents are authorized to consent to the adoption of minor children, under Civil Code Cal. c. 2, tit. 2, an order of the superior court, authorizing the adoption of a minor child in the care of an orphan asylum, is not sufficient without the consent of the managers of the asylum.

In bank. Application for habeas corpus.

PER CURIAM. The writ in this case was sued out by a manager and director of the Protestant Orphan Asylum of Sacramento, a corporation duly organized under the laws of this state, and as such entitled to the care, custody, control, and management of orphans and abandoned children, and receives state aid for the support and maintenance of orphans under its care. Clara A. Chambers, in whose behalf the writ was sued out, is an orphan of the age of three years and six months, who for more than two years was under the exclusive care, custody, control, and management of said asylum, and supported entirely by said asylum. The way in which respondents acquired the custody of said Clara sufficiently appears in the following extract from their return to said writ: "Respondents further show to this honorable court that they are husband and wife, and now do, and for more than two years have, resided in the state of California. That they have no children. That, being desirous to adopt a child, the respondent Mrs. Bucklin applied to Mrs. Sarah A. Clayton, and from her received a letter to the matron of said orphan asylum. The result was that she visited the asylum, saw Clara A. Chambers, and by permission of the matron took the child home with her, with a view of adopting her. That she took the child from the asylum on the 4th of January of the present year, and from thence hitherto she has remained, and now does remain, with her in her family. That a few days before the first Tuesday in March of the present year the president of said asylum (who is now Mrs. Rideout) and one of the managers visited the respondent Mrs. Bucklin, and requested her to report to the board of managers of said asylum at their next meeting, to be held on the first Tuesday in March, 1889, if she and her husband elected to adopt said child. That she did so report at said meeting, and did inform them that she and her husband had concluded to adopt said child in pursuance of the provisions of the Civil Code of this state, and thereupon she was notified by the president, Mrs. Rideout, that she would inform respondent of the time when she would accompany them to court, and have entered the necessary order authorizing respondents to adopt said child. Subsequently the secretary of the board of managers informed the respondent Mrs. Bucklin that the matter of adopting said minor was by the president submitted to her, and that she would go with respondents before Van Fleet, one of the superior judges of said county of Sacramento, and have the necessary order made by said judge permitting these respondents to adopt said child. That said secretary delayed the matter for some days, and respondents, becoming anxious to have the matter finally consummated, did, on the 19th of March, 1889, take said minor in company with said Mrs. Sarah E. Clayton before John W. Armstrong, one of the superior judges of the court of said county, and after fully explaining the history of said child, their and Mrs. Clayton's relation to it, to said judge, were informed by him that no notice to or consent from the managers of said asylum was necessary, and such proceedings were had that the agreement required by law was executed, and an order was duly made and entered of record declaring that said Clara A. Chambers should thenceforth be regarded and treated in all respects as the child of said Walter M. and Ida B. Bucklin; a copy of which agreement and order is hereto attached, marked 'Exhibit A,' and made a part of this return. That upon the hearing of said matter the court found as a fact that the respondents were fit and proper persons to have the care, custody, and control of said child, and that the welfare of the child would be promoted by being adopted by these respondents. That the managers of said orphan asylum have never questioned or disputed the fact that these respondents were fit and proper persons to have the care of said child, nor that its welfare would be promoted by being adopted by them."

It does not appear, and is not claimed by respondents, that the act of April 1, 1878, entitled "An act to authorize the managers of orphan asylums to give their consent to the adoption of certain children under their care," was complied with. That reads as follows: "Section 1. The managers of the several orphan asylums in this state are hereby authorized and empowered to consent to the adoption of any orphan child, or child abandoned by its parents, in the same manner that parents are by law authorized to consent to the adoption of their children: provided, however, that such orphan child, or child abandoned by its parents, shall have been in the charge and under the management of the managers of such orphan aslyum for the period of one year prior to such adoption, and during that period supported wholly at the expense of said asylum. Sec. 2. This act shall take effect from the date of its passage." The principal contention of respondents' counsel is that this act does not repeal the provisions of chapter 2, tit. 2, of the Civil Code, entitled, "Adoption," and therefore said chapter is in force, and, when complied with, makes their adoption of this minor child legal. That the act of 1878 does not repeal any part of the Civil Code is, we think, apparent; nor is it amendatory of the Civil Code. It provides, in our opinion, for the adoption of a class of minor children, viz., those in orphan asylums, whose adoption is not provided for in the Civil Code. In no sense are its provisions repugnant to those of the Civil Code. The power to adopt minor children is a creation of the statute, which was unknown to the common law, and the mode must be held to be the measure of the power. It is therefore clear that there was no adoption in this case, and the orphan child, Clara A. Chambers, must be returned to the custody of the orphan asylum from which she was taken by the respondents. We will suggest, however, that if, as seems to be conceded, the only objection to her remaining with the respondents is their failure to adopt her according to law, that the objection be obviated by proceeding at once to have her adopted in the mode prescribed by the statute. Ordered that said Clara A. Chambers be returned to the custody of the Protestant Orphan Asylum of Sacramento.

PEOPLE v. ANDERSON et al. (No. 20,526.)

ROBBERY—VARIANCE.

1. Where an indictment for robbery charges the taking of a pistol, the property of one K., and on the trial K. and one V. claim the pistol, there is no variance, but a conflict of evidence which is properly left to the jury to determine.

2. In such case, under Pen. Code Cal. § 956, providing that when an offense involves the commission of a private injury, and is described with sufficient certainty to identify the act, an erroneous allegation as to the person injured, or intended to be injured, is not material; a charge was proper, that it was not necessary, in order to find the defendants guilty as charged in the indictment, to prove that the pistol was that of K.

3. The felonious taking of the pistol from the possession of K. against his will, by means of force, was robbery whether the pistol belonged to K. or not, under Pen. Code Cal. § 211.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county; J. L. CAMPBELL, Judge.

W. A. J. McDonald, for appellants. G. A. Johnson, Atty. Gen., for the People.

FOOTE, C. The defendants appeal from a judgment of conviction of the crime of robbery, and from an order denying them a new trial. It is alleged that the court below erred in not granting their request that the jury be instructed to acquit them, because of the variance between the allegations of the information and the proof at the trial. The variance is claimed to consist in this: That while the information charges that a certain pistol taken from him feloniously and through force by the defendants was the personal property of one Kiesele, yet the evidence shows it to have been the property of one Voight. It is true that Kiesele swore as a witness that the pistol was his property, and Voight that it belonged to him, but this was a mere conflict in testimony as to the ownership of the property. It was the province of the jury, and not of the court, to settle such conflict, and the refusal of the court to interfere with the determination of the issue by the jury was proper. The further contention is made that error was committed in granting this instruction for the prosecution: "The court further instructs the jury that, in order to find the defendants guilty in the manner and form as charged in the information, it is not necessary that the property alleged to have been taken was the personal property of G. Kiesele; it is sufficient if the property belongs to a person other than the defendants." There was no question from the testimony but that the pistol was in the possession of Kiesele when violently taken by the defendants. The evidence throughout disclosed the fact that no robbery as charged could have taken place, unless it was a taking of that pistol violently and feloniously from him. The act of robbery charged against the defendants in the information was the same, whether the pistol was the property of Kiesele or of Voight.

The point seems to be determined by the provisions of section 956 of the Penal Code: "When an offense involves the commission of a private injury, and is described with sufficient certainty in other respects to identify the act, an erroneous allegation as to the person injured, or intended to be injured, is not material." People v. Watson, 72 Cal. 402, 14 Pac. Rep. 97. The felonious taking of the pistol in the possession of Kiesele from his person or immediate presence, and against his will, accomplished by means of force or fear, was robbery, whether the pistol was his property or that of another. Section 211, Pen. Code; People v. Vice, 21 Cal. 346. The identity of the act of robbery was the same, whether the injury inflicted by the felonious taking involved in the larceny of the property, included in the robbery, would come upon Kiesele or Voight. The argument that the larceny involved in the crime charged is proved to have had relation to personal property belonging to a person other than as alleged in the information is without force. The identity of the crime charged in the information is not affected by this circumstance, for it only goes to the question of the erroneous allegation as to the person upon whom injury was inflicted by the larceny of the pistol included in the robbery, and this is cured by the provisions of the statute supra. No error appearing in the record, we advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: Belcher, C. C.; Vanclief, C.

People v. Dunn, Comptroller. (No. 13,305.)

Enactment of Statutes—Constitutional Law.

1. Const. Cal. art. 4, § 15, provides that no law shall be passed except by bill; that no bill shall be put on its final passage till it and the amendments thereto shall have been printed; and that no bill shall become a law unless the same be read on three several days in each house, except, in case of emergency, two-thirds shall vote to dispense with this provision. Respondent refused to issue his warrant, as comptroller of state, for certain money, on the ground that the bill making the appropriation had not been read on three several days in either the senate or assembly, as required by the constitution. Held, that it is not necessary that the legislative journals show affirmatively that a bill and its amendments were read as required by the constitution; and in the absence of a record, not required by the constitution to be kept, it will be presumed that in the passage of a bill the legislature complied with all constitutional requirements.

2. Act Cal. 1889, p. 69, creating a board of trustees, with authority to select a site for a public building, is not a law which delegates legislative powers and functions.

3. A law making an appropriation of money for the purchase of a building site, and for the erection of suitable buildings thereon as a home for feeble-minded children, is a general appropriation law, and contains only one item for one purpose, as provided in Const. Cal. art. 4, § 34.

In bank. On application for writ of mandamus.

Haggin, Van Ness & Dibble, for petitioner. T. H. Laine, for respondent.

Works, J. This is an application for a writ of mandamus to compel the respondent, as comptroller of state, to issue his warrant for certain moneys, which the relators claim should be paid out of the appropriation contained in the act of the legislature, entitled "An act to provide a permanent site for the 'California Home for the Care and Training of Feeble-Minded Children,' to erect suitable buildings thereon, and making an appropriation therefor." St. 1889, p. 69. The respondent resists the claim of the petitioners on the ground that the said statute is unconstitutional and void for five reasons set forth in his return to the alternative writ, as follows: "First. Said bill was not read on three several days in the senate, prior to its final passage, nor was it declared to be a case of urgency. Second. Said alleged law was introduced, known in its various stages, in the legislature, and passed as senate bill No. 194, which said bill was put upon its final passage in the assembly after it had been amended in its title and in all its sections save section 5, and before and without being printed with the amendments thereto for the use of the members, in violation of article 4, § 15, of the constitution of this state. Third. Said bill was not read at length upon its final passage, in violation of article 4, § 15, of the constitution of this state. Fourth. Said bill or law is void, as it delegates legislative powers and functions to a board of trustees, aided by two citizens; the two bodies forming a commission clothed with legislative powers and functions. Fifth. Said bill or law is void on its face. It is not a general appropriation bill, and does contain more than one item of appropriation, and that for more than one single and certain purpose; wherefore the respondent prays that the writ be discharged, and that he go hence with his cost."

The claim of the respondent is that the journals of the two houses of the legislature do not show affirmatively that the bill was read three several times in the senate; that it was printed with its amendments before its final passage; or that it was read at length upon its final passage,—as required by the constitution. Article 4, § 15. The point made and relied upon is that it must affirmatively appear from the journals of the two houses that every act required to be done in the enactment of a law has been done, and that in the absence of such a showing it must be presumed that such acts were not done. In support of this contention counsel cite: Const. art. 4, §§ 10, 15, 16, 28; article 18, § 1; Pol. Code, §§ 240, 256, 257; Gardner v. Collector, 6 Wall. 499; Santa Clara Railroad Tax Case, 9 Sawy. 226, 227, 18 Fed. Rep. 385; Spangler v. Jacoby, 14 Ill. 298; Weill v. Kenfield, 54 Cal. 111; Paving Co. v. Hilton, 69 Cal. 481, 11 Pac. Rep. 3; Railway Co. v. Potts, 7 Ind. 681; Madison Co. v. Baker, 80 Ind. 374.

The case does not present the question as to the power of this court to go behind the enrolled bill in order to determine from the journals of the two houses whether the bill was properly passed or not. The respondent does not stop with the contention that the journals may be looked to in order to determine this question. His position is that, as the two houses of the legislature are required to keep journals of their proceedings, every act not shown by such journals to have taken place must be presumed not to have been done. His position cannot be upheld by reason or authority. It is uniformly repudiated, even in those states in which it is held that the journals may be looked to as against the enrolled bill. Larrison v. Railroad Co., 77 Ill. 11; Cooley Const. Lim. 164; State v. City of Hastings, 24 Minn. 78; Miller v. State, 3 Ohio St. 476; State v. Railroad Co., 33 Fed. Rep. 760. For these reasons we think the objections to the law, on the ground that it was not legally passed, are not well taken.

Nor do we think there is any force in the objection that, by providing that certain persons should select the site for the building proposed to be constructed, the act attempted to delegate legislative functions and powers. To hold that such a power could not be vested in persons named in the act would be an unreasonably strict application of the rule that legislative functions cannot be delegated. The mere act of selecting a site to be purchased was not a legislative act. State v. Railway Co., 37 N. W. Rep. 786.

The last objection, viz., that the bill is not a general appropriation bill, and contains more than one item of appropriation, for more than one single purpose, is equally groundless. There is but one appropriation in the act, for one purpose. The object and purpose of the appropriation is to supply a permanent location for a home for feeble-minded children. It was not necessary that there should have been a separate appropriation for the purchase of the land, another for the erection of the building, another for the construction of fences, and another for each improvement necessary to the proper completion of the proposed work. Section 34, art. 4, of the constitution, which is relied upon to support this objection to the law, cannot be given any such unreasonable construction. The relators are entitled to a peremptory writ, as prayed for, and the same will be issued.

We concur: BEATTY, C. J.; FOX, J.; PATERSON, J.; MCFARLAND, J.

THORNTON, J. I concur. The first, second, and third reasons given to maintain the respondent's contention that the act of the legislature referred to in the foregoing opinion is unconstitutional are, in my judgment, correctly disposed of adversely to such contention in the case of Supervisors v. People, 25 Ill. 181. The case cited arose under the constitution of Illinois, which, as regards the matter under consideration, is similar to the constitution of this state. It was urged in that case that the senate journal did not show that the bill was read three times in that body before it was put on its final passage, and that hence the constitutional requirements to make it a law were not observed. On this point the court said: "The constitution does require that every bill shall be read three times in each branch of the general assembly before it shall be passed into a law, but the constitution does not say that these several readings shall be entered on the journals. Some acts performed in the passage of laws are required by the constitution to be entered on the journals in order to make them valid, and among these are the entries of the ayes and nays on the final passage of every bill; and we hold in the case of Spangler v. Jacoby, 14 Ill. 297, that where the journal did not show this, the act never became a law. But where the constitution is silent as to whether a particular act which is required to be performed shall be entered on the journals, it is then left to the discretion of either house to enter it or not, and the silence of the journal on the subject ought not to be held to afford evidence that the act was not done. In such a case we must presume it was done, unless the journal affirmatively shows that it was not done." The constitution of this state does not require that the three several readings of a bill to pass it into a law shall be entered on the journal of either house. From the silence of the journals in this matter we are not authorized to infer that the constitutional requirement was not observed. The only evidence that can be regarded to show that the requirement was disregarded should be an affirmative statement to that effect in the journal. In the absence of evidence of this character, we must presume that the duty imposed by the constitution was performed. The above rule applies to each of the three reasons for respondent's contention above referred to.

In re ACKERMAN'S ESTATE. (No. 13,066.)

HOMESTEAD IN WIFE'S SEPARATE ESTATE.

Civil Code Cal. § 1265, provides that, if the selection of a homestead is made from community property, the land, on the death of either spouse, vests in the survivor. Section 1401 declares that on the death of the wife the entire community property, except such as has been set apart to her by judicial decree, belongs to the husband without administration. Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1474, provides that the homestead of married persons, on the death of one of the spouses, goes to the survivor. Section 1475 makes it the duty of the superior court to set it apart to the survivor. Petitioner is the surviving husband of a wife who died without issue. During her life-time a homestead was selected from community property. After her death the petitioner sold the land, and now asks that a homestead be set apart to him from her separate estate. Held, that the land, which vested in petitioner absolutely on the death of his wife, was still a homestead, and, having disposed of it, he has exhausted his homestead right.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. V. COFFEY, Judge.

Nagle & Nagle, for petitioner. Stonehill & Payson, for contestants.

FOX, J. Application by the surviving husband for an order setting apart to him a homestead out of the separate property of the estate of his deceased wife. The application was opposed by the heirs of deceased, and upon hearing of the matter was denied. From the order denying such application appeal is taken to this court. From the findings it appears that the lot which the court was asked to set apart to the surviving husband as a homestead was the separate property of the deceased wife. It was so inventoried by the applicant, who administered the estate, was appraised at the sum of $2,100, and constitutes all the property of the estate; that no homestead had ever been declared thereon, and that no part of it had ever been occupied as a homestead or place of residence by the deceased or her husband during her life-time; that she died September 17, 1885, leaving no children, father or mother, but leaving her husband and a sister, Ysabel Morante, her next of kin and heirs at law. It further appeared that for 13 years before her death deceased and her husband had occupied as a homestead and residence a dwelling-house and lot situate in another part of the city, and which was the community property of applicant and his deceased wife; that on the 5th of May, 1873, the deceased had duly executed and recorded a homestead on the lot so occupied by herself and husband, and the same had never been abandoned; that since the death of his said wife the applicant had sold the said last-named lot (the homestead aforesaid) for $3,000, and appropriated the same to his own use, paying his debts existing at the time of the death of his said wife. After the death of Mrs. Ackerman her sister, Ysabel Morante, died, leaving a will, and leaving a husband and two children, her heirs at law, and devisees, who are the contestants here. Under this state of facts it is contended that under section 1401, Civil Code, immediately upon the death of the wife the entire community property, without administration, went to the surviving husband. That is true, but so much of it as was at the time impressed with the character of homestead went to the survivor, not merely as community property, but as a homestead, subject to no other liability than such as existed or had been created under the provisions of the title on homesteads. Id. § 1265. It was protected to the survivor of the family in the same manner that it had been to the whole family, and was still a homestead. See, also, Code Civil Proc. §§ 1474, 1475. The death of one of the spouses did not alter in any way the estate or character of the homestead. Tyrrell v. Baldwin, 21 Pac. Rep. 116. It required no action of the probate court to pass the homestead, protected as such. It passed immediately upon the death of one of the spouses by operation of law. Civil Code, § 1265. If there had been administration affecting the estate out of which the homestead was carved it would have become the duty of the probate court to set apart the recorded homestead to the survivor, but this setting apart would not have affected the right of the survivor. Such is not the purpose of the order in the case of a recorded homestead; its object and effect is simply to take the property out of administration. Code Civil Proc. § 1465; In re Orr, 29 Cal. 101; Rich v. Tubbs, 41 Cal. 34; Schadt v. Heppe, 45 Cal. 434; Estate of Burton, 63 Cal. 36; Bollinger v. Manning, 21 Pac. Rep. 375. Having been selected from community property, immediately upon the death of either spouse, it vested in the survivor. Mawson v. Mawson, 50 Cal. 539; Estate of Headen, 52 Cal. 295; Gagliardo v. Dumont, 54 Cal. 496; Herrold v. Reen, 58 Cal. 443. Under the statute no property can be set apart by the probate court as a homestead which might not have been dedicated as such under the homestead act immediately preceding the death of the deceased. Kingsley v. Kingsley, 39 Cal. 666; Estate of Noah, 73 Cal. 590, 15 Pac. Rep. 290. At and for a long time prior to the death of the decedent the parties had a duly dedicated and selected homestead, carved out of the community property. No other property could therefore have been dedicated by them, or either of them, to the purposes of a homestead immediately preceding the death of the wife. Upon her death the dedicated and recorded homestead vested, eo instanti, as such, in the surviving husband. He was not then entitled to select another, even out of the community property, much less out of her separate estate. He has had the full benefit of that homestead, and the law will not now permit him to deprive the minor children of his deceased sister-in-law of their moiety of inheritance in the estate of his deceased wife by having that estate also set apart to him as a homestead. The court below was correct in denying the application, and the order is affirmed.

HOAGLAND v. STATE. (No. 13,118.)

SUITS AGAINST STATE—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—EMINENT DOMAIN.

1. When the state permits itself to be sued, the case is simply referred to the court to determine whether the claim constitutes a lawful demand against the state, and the only questions for determination are, what has been done, and what are the legal principles by which the responsibility of the state is to be measured, and whether upon these principles the state should be held liable.

2. By act Cal. March 12, 1885, plaintiffs were authorized to sue the state for damages alleged to have been suffered by them by reason of certain canal improvements made by the state, and to have judgment therefor "if it appears upon the trial * * * that damage has been done [to the plaintiffs] by any act for which the state is legally liable." Held, that the language of the act excludes the idea that any liability was admitted, or any defense waived, except that of immunity from suit. The state may still interpose the defense that it was engaged as a state in a public work for a common good.

3. Under the language of the California constitution as it existed prior to 1879, where the state, for public purposes, turns or straightens the channel of a river where it empties into another river, so that the land on the opposite side is, five years afterwards, injured or destroyed by the increased velocity of the current, such damage is not a "taking" of land for public use, and does not entitle the owner to compensation. THORNTON, J., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county; W. C. VAN FLEET, Judge.

Action by the appellant, Hoagland, against the state in pursuance of an act of the legislature, approved March 12, 1885, entitled "An act to enable John Hoagland, James Reid, Mrs. Rebecca C. Hoagland, George Cooper, William B. Todhunter, Mrs. Mary W. G. Van Arsdall, Henry Lienberger, Christopher Green, and Charles Trainer to sue the state of California" to recover damages alleged to have resulted to them in consequence of the straightening of the channel of the American river at its mouth or point of confluence with the Sacramento river, by the city levee commissioners of the city of Sacramento, done by them in the year 1862, in pursuance of an act of the legislature entitled "An act concerning the construction and repair of levees in the county of Sacramento, and the mode of raising revenue therefor," approved April 9, 1862. St. 1862, p. 151. The straightening of the American river is alleged to have been done in the year 1862. The damages resulting to the lands, etc., of appellant therefrom are alleged to have occurred December 25, 1867; that the appellant owned lands on the west bank of Sacramento river, in Yolo county, and opposite the mouth of the new-made channel of the American river, through which the waters of said river were conveyed into the Sacramento with such force and volume as to press the waters of the Sacramento against its west bank, cause them to break over and through the natural and artificial barriers there, and overflow, undermine, and wash away the lands of appellant, etc. Defendant demurred. The grounds of demurrer assigned were: (1) That the court has no jurisdiction of the person of the defendant, or the subject of the action; (2) that the complaint herein does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action; (3) that plaintiffs have no authority to sue the state, and the act of the legislature approved March 12, 1885, authorizing them to sue, is unconstitutional; (4) that whatever cause of action is stated in the complaint is barred by the provisions of sections 336, 337, 338, 339, 340, and 343, Code Civil Proc. The demurrer having been sustained, plaintiff appeals.

John Heard, for appellant. George A. Johnson, Atty. Gen., for respondent.

WORKS, J. This is an action for damages. The demurrer to the complaint was sustained, and judgment rendered against the plaintiff, from which she appeals.

The case is, in all material respects, like Green v. Swift, 47 Cal. 536, and Green v. State, 73 Cal. 29, 14 Pac. Rep. 610, and on the authority of those cases the judgment is affirmed.

PROLL v. DUNN. (No. 13,866.)

APPROPRIATIONS BY LEGISLATURE.

Act Cal. March 14, 1889, appropriating the sum of $100,000 "for the support and maintenance of the mining bureau," is sufficiently specific, within the meaning of the constitution and statutes of the state, and is not void because it fails to designate on what fund the warrant is to be drawn, and does not state that the money "is appropriated out of any moneys in the treasury not otherwise appropriated."

In bank. Application for writ of mandamus.

Pillsbury & Blanding, for petitioner. Langhorne & Miller, for respondent.

FOX, J. This is an application by petitioner for a peremptory writ of mandate, directing the respondent, state comptroller, to draw his warrant in favor of the petitioner for the sum of $297.75, alleged to be due petitioner for supplies furnished to the state mining bureau for the forty-first fiscal year. The demand has been duly approved and audited by the board of trustees of said mining bureau and by the state board of examiners, and it is claimed that it is payable out of an appropriation provided for by an act of the last legislature, approved March 14, 1889, and entitled "An act making an appropriation for the support and maintenance of a state mining bureau, for the forty-first and forty-second fiscal years." Said act, omitting the title and enacting clause, reads as follows: "Section 1. The sum of $100,000 is hereby appropriated for the support and maintenance of the mining bureau, created under an act entitled 'An act to provide for the establishment and maintenance of a mining bureau,' approved April 16, 1880, and the act supplementary thereto, approved March 21, 1885, and at least 70 per cent. of this appropriation shall be used for geological work in the field. Sec. 2. Not more than one-half of the said sum appropriated under this act shall be expended during the forty-first fiscal year. Sec. 3. This act shall take effect immediately." See St. 1889, p. 149.

The case turns upon the question of the sufficiency or insufficiency of this act to authorize the comptroller to draw his warrant for moneys expended under the appropriation therein attempted to be made.

The contention of the respondent is that the act is insufficient, because the appropriation attempted to be made is not specific within the meaning of the constitution, the statutes applicable to the comptroller's office and the revenue system, and the previous decisions of this court.

The only provision of the constitution relating to the subject, to which our attention has been called, or which we have been able to find, is that found in article 4, § 22. That part of the section bearing upon this question reads as follows: "No money shall be drawn from the treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law, and upon warrants duly drawn thereon by the comptroller." Three other sections of the same article refer to the subject of appropriations, section 16 providing that, "if any bill presented to the governor contains several items of appropriation of money, he may object to one or more items, while approving other portions of the bill." Section 29 provides that "the general appropriation bill shall contain no item or items of appropriation other than such as are required to pay the salaries of the state officers, the expenses of the government, and of the institutions under the exclusive control and management of the state." And section 34 provides that "no bill making an appropriation of money, except the general appropriation bill, shall contain more than one item of appropriation, and that for one single and certain purpose to be therein expressed." This act does not conflict with nor fall short of the requirements of either of these constitutional provisions. There is no provision in the constitution providing or prescribing any particular form of words in which an appropriation shall be made, except that it shall be made by law. Neither is there any provision in the constitution prescribing the duties of the comptroller in the matter of drawing warrants upon the treasury, except as above quoted. The duties of the comptroller are defined by part 3, tit. 1, c. 3, art. 6, Pol. Code. The first section of that article (section 433) has twenty-one subdivisions, each specifying some special duty of that officer. Subdivision 17 is the only one which need to be considered in this case. It reads: "To draw warrants on the treasurer for the payment of moneys directed by law to be paid out of the treasury; but no warrant must be drawn unless authorized by law, and upon an unexhausted specific appropriation provided by law to meet the same. Every warrant must be drawn upon the fund out of which it is payable, and specify the service for which it is drawn, when the liability accrued, and the specific appropriation applicable to the payment thereof." Section 436 is a part of the same article, and reads: "All warrants for claims which have been audited by the board of examiners, and filed in his office, must be drawn in the order of the numbers placed upon them by that board." Article 18 of the same chapter provides for the organization, powers, and duties of the board of examiners. In that article, at section 660, it is provided that "any person having a claim against the state, for which an appropriation has been made, may present the same to the board in the form of an account or petition, and the clerk of the board must date, number, and file such claim, and the board must allow or reject the same in the order of its presentation. The board may for cause postpone action upon a claim for not exceeding one month. Sec. 661. If the board approve such claim, they must indorse thereon, over their signatures, 'Approved for the sum of ——— dollars,' and transmit the same to the office of the comptroller of state; and the comptroller must draw his warrant for the amount so approved in favor of the claimant or his assigns, in the order in which the same was approved." No point is made that this claim has not been properly presented to and approved by the board of examiners and filed with the comptroller. Other sections of the article provide for the action to be taken by the board of examiners when claims are presented for which no appropriation has been made, or where the appropriation has been exhausted; but these do not contemplate any action by the comptroller on such ground; the only further provision in regard to his powers and duties in that regard being that found in section 672, where it is provided that he shall not draw his warrant for any claim unless it has been approved by the board, except in certain cases of exemption from that rule, of which this is not one, when he may draw his warrant without the action of the board. It is his duty to keep an account under the head of each specific appropriation, showing at all times the unexpended balance of such appropriation. Section 433, subd. 7. And it is the duty of the board, who have the right at any time to call upon him for information, and to examine his books, to keep themselves advised as to the condition of that account.

It is claimed that the act does not specify upon what fund the warrant is to be drawn; and, as he is required in every warrant to specify the fund out of which it is payable, therefore that it is insufficient. Several authorities are cited which are claimed to support the proposition that the act itself must specify the fund out of which the money is to be drawn, but we do not think they bear that construction in the sense in which it is claimed for it here; and, as to the statutes, not one appropriation act in fifty designates the fund out of which the money is to be drawn. The majority of all appropriations are drawn out of a single fund, and that without any designation in the act as to what fund the money shall be drawn from.

In Fowler v. Peirce, 2 Cal. 167, cited by counsel, the question under consideration in that part of the opinion from which the quotation was made was whether or not mandate was the proper remedy. The words quoted by counsel were not necessary to the determination of that question, and, although the language quoted seems to assume that the fund out of which the money was payable had been specified in the act referred to, a reference to the act itself shows that such was not the fact in any sense other or different from that found in the act under consideration here. The case, as a whole, is against, rather than in favor of, the position taken by respondent. In McCauley v. Brooks, also cited by respondent, (16 Cal. 24,) there was nothing in the act designating the fund out of which the money was to be drawn. The language of the act there was: "Appropriated out of any money in the treasury not otherwise appropriated." These words constitute no designation of "the fund," in the sense in which that term is applied in this objection. By reference to the act referred to in Stratton v. Green, 45 Cal. 149, (the act creating a board of tide-land commissioners, St. 1869-70, p. 541,) it will be seen that it provided for the incurring of large expenses and salaries, and that the comptroller should draw his warrant upon the general fund for the payment of the same, but neither in that act, nor in any other, did the legislature make any appropriation out of the general fund or any other fund for the payment of those expenses or salaries. No attempt was made to appropriate money for that purpose, and the mandate was in that case refused for want of appropriation. Baggett v. Dunn, 69 Cal. 75, 10 Pac. Rep. 125, was a case where the claim was for a salary,—a claim which was not required to be presented to the board of examiners. The comptroller refused to draw his warrant, because no appropriation had been made for the payment of the salary for that year, and the court sustained him. In Marshall v. Dunn, 69 Cal. 223, 10 Pac. Rep. 399, the warrant was refused because the appropriation was exhausted, and the court sustained the ruling.

Neither the constitution nor the Code requires that an appropriation act shall specify the fund out of which the appropriation shall be paid, nor is it usual in appropriation acts to do so. If such a specification is required, the wheels of the government ought long since to have stopped, for out of many acts which we have examined, including the general appropriation bills for the current and past years, we find none which make such designation. It has become and is the custom in this state, of very general, but not universal, application, to use the phrase "appropriated out of any money in the treasury not otherwise appropriated;" but it seems to be mere custom, not founded upon any constitutional or other legislative requirement. And we learn from the argument that the comptroller interprets that phrase to mean "out of the general fund." We know of no law which authorizes such an interpretation. On the contrary, it would seem that everything authorized by law to be paid out of the state treasury is payable out of the general fund, if not specially made payable out of some specific fund,—as the "school fund," the "interest and sinking fund," and the like. The truth is, there are not many separate funds in the treasury, but there are many appropriations, and most of the latter are payable out of the same fund,—the general fund. The treasurer keeps an account of the separate funds, while the comptroller keeps account of the separate appropriations, as well as of the separate funds. "Appropriation" and "fund" are not synonymous terms. All through the statutes there is a distinction made between them. In the section of the Political Code (3713) which provides for the amount of revenue to be raised, (and which is amended at each session of the legislature,) a given amount is provided for each separate fund, but nothing is said about appropriations. The amount named for the general fund is supposed to be sufficient to meet the aggregate of all the appropriations made for the year, except such as have been expressly made payable out of some special fund. But if the word "fund," as used in subdivision 17, § 433, Pol. Code, is synonymous with the word "appropriation," it only remains to determine whether there has been an appropriation in this case. Appropriations are made, and can only be made, by the legislature. The constitution has prescribed no set form of words in which it is to be done. All that is required is a clear expression of the legislative will on the subject. It has declared that the sum of $100,000 is hereby appropriated, not more than one-half of which shall be expended in the forty-first fiscal year. That appropriation is made for the maintenance of a bureau theretofore established by act of the legislature, and for several years past supported in whole or in part by legislative appropriation. See St. 1883, p. 279; 1885, p. 86; 1887, p. 62. "But," says the comptroller, "it has not designated the fund out of which the appropriation is payable." It did not in any of the former years. Nor has it designated the fund out of which the salaries of any of the officers of the state, or the expenses of any of the other bureaus or departments of the government, shall be paid. "It has not said that the money is appropriated out of any moneys in the treasury not otherwise appropriated." What of it? The legislature can make no appropriation except "out of the treasury." The remaining words are not only a form not required by law, but usually a fiction, for at the time of the passage of appropriation bills there is not usually any money in the treasury in excess of existing appropriations, and whenever the legislature makes a new appropriation it is to be assumed that it will provide funds to meet the same. As said by Chief Justice FIELD in McCauley v. Brooks, supra: "Appropriations are made in anticipation of the receipt of the yearly revenues." "An appropriation is the act of setting apart, or assigning to a particular use or person, in exclusion of all others; application to a special use or purpose, as of * * * money to carry out some public object." Webst. Dict. "An appropriation of the money to a specific object would be an authority to the proper officers to pay the money, because the auditor is authorized to draw his warrant upon an appropriation, and the treasurer is authorized to pay such warrant if he has appropriated money in the treasury." Ristine v. State, 20 Ind. 339.

In this act we have a clear, distinct expression of the legislative will, making the appropriation. The words, "out of any moneys in the treasury not otherwise appriated," are not necessary to the expression of that will, or the making of such appropriation. They are in common use in this state, but nowhere made necessary, and are not always used. See act to provide for improvements of the deaf, dumb, and blind asylum, St. 1889, p. 303; act to provide for a system of irrigation, etc., St. 1877-78, p. 634, subd. 1, § 4; act making appropriations for benevolent purposes, St. 1875-76, p. 828. No doubt further examination would disclose many similar omissions. So far as we have observed they are never used in the acts of congress. Whether they are in common use in other states, and, if so, whether there is a reason for it, we have not time to inquire, nor do we deem it necessary, in the absence of any requirement for their use in this state. If the word "fund," in the point here made by the comptroller, and in subdivision 17, § 433, Pol. Code, is used in its technical sense, as designating the separate funds in the treasury, then the whole history and practice under it in this state, from its earliest organization, is against the contention now made, that the appropriation act itself must specify the fund upon which the warrant is to be drawn; but if it is used as an alternative for "appropriation," then all difficulty is removed, provided there is a specific appropriation against which the warrant may be drawn, and the case does not differ from all others where the appropriation is not by express words made payable out of some one of the separate funds in the treasury other than the general fund. The board of examiners have, by their action under sections 660, 661, Pol. Code, by implication at least, held that in this case there was a specific appropriation for the maintenance of the mining bureau, and that this claim was payable out of that appropriation. In this we think the board was correct, and, unless the appropriation has been exhausted, (of which there is no claim,) the comptroller has no discretion, but is required by law to draw his warrant therefor upon such appropriation. Let the writ issue as prayed.

In re FIL KI et al. (No. 20,580.)

PUNISHMENT FOR CONTEMPT—HARD LABOR—HABEAS CORPUS.

1. Pen. Code Cal. § 1446, provides that a judgment that defendant pay a fine may also direct that he be imprisoned till the fine be satisfied, at the rate of a day's imprisonment for each dollar of the fine. Defendants, being adjudged guilty of contempt of court, were fined $500 each, and the judgment directed that in default of payment they be confined in the county jail at the rate of a dollar a day each till the fines were paid. Held, that the prisoners could not be put to hard labor on the streets or elsewhere, as the imprisonment authorized by the judgment was intended as a means of collecting the fine, and not as a punishment.

2. Const. Cal. art. 11, § 11, provides that any county, city, or town may make and enforce within its limits all such local, police, sanitary, and other regulations as are not in conflict with general laws. Held, that this provision does not authorize county supervisors to put a prisoner to hard labor where his imprisonment is for the purpose of collecting a fine, because to do so would be to add to the judgment of the court.

3. A contempt of court, though a quasi criminal offense, is tried summarily by the court, and without the right of jury, and is not a misdemeanor within the meaning of St. Cal. 1889, p. 289, § 30, which authorizes the board of supervisors to require a prisoner confined in the county jail for a misdemeanor to be put to work.

4. Prisoners unlawfully put to work at hard labor on the streets, and discharged from such unlawful imprisonment by habeas corpus, are not discharged from the custody of the sheriff, or from lawful imprisonment in the county jail.

In bank. Hearing on habeas corpus.

For statement of the case and opinion on another application for habeas corpus, see 21 Pac. Rep. 974.

Frank M. Stone, for petitioners. E. A. Forbes and A. L. Hart, for respondent.

WORKS, J. This is an application for a discharge of the petitioners under a writ of habeas corpus. The allegations of the petition, tending to show the illegality of the alleged imprisonment, are as follows: "That the petitioners were held by the supreme court of this state at first to be legally imprisoned, but since such holding, the sheriff of said county of Yuba has placed petitioners at hard labor daily; that petitioners are held only by virtue of a warrant or judgment in contempt proceedings, and by no other warrant or judgment; that they are, and each of them is, daily caused to labor at hard labor upon the county highways or otherwise; that such hard labor for such (held) contempt of court is illegal, and in conflict with the substantial rights of said petitioners, in that the imprisonment is cruel and unusual (in most counties) for contempt for the court so holding by its judgment." The sheriff makes return that he holds the petitioners by virtue of a judgment of the superior court of Yuba county, convicting the defendants of contempt of court in disobeying an order of injunction in a civil case, and adjudging that they pay a fine of $500 each, and that in default of payment thereof they be imprisoned in the county jail of said county at the rate of one day for each dollar of said fine until the same is fully paid and satisfied. This judgment, it will be seen, only authorizes the imprisonment of the petitioners in the county jail, and that, not as a punishment, but as a means of collecting such fine. It was contended at the argument by the respondent that the detention of the petitioners at hard labor on the streets was justified and made lawful by a resolution of the board of supervisors of the county, by which it was provided that the sheriff should work and cause to be worked such convicted prisoners as were or might be confined in the county jail of said county.

Both the petition and return are so defective as not to present the real question intended to be presented, and which was argued at the hearing. The petition does not show that at the time the application for the writ was made the petitioners were imprisoned elsewhere than in the county jail, but that they "were daily caused to labor at hard labor." The return is equally faulty, in that it does not allege that any order of the board of supervisors was made authorizing the working of the petitioners on the streets or other highways. But counsel on both sides seem to have regarded these defects as unimportant, and have conceded the facts as above stated, and we decide the question thus presented. There was nothing in the judgment under which the petitioners were held authorizing their imprisonment or detention elsewhere than in the county jail, or justifying the sheriff in putting them at hard labor. If the judgment had provided for the kind of imprisonment now being imposed upon the petitioners the judgment would have been void. The Code allows the imprisonment in the county jail until the fine imposed is paid or satisfied by such imprisonment, or otherwise, but does not authorize imprisonment at hard labor. Pen. Code, § 1446; Ex parte Kelly, 65 Cal. 154, 3 Pac. Rep. 673; Ex parte Arras, 20 Pac. Rep. 683.

It is contended by the respondent that under section 11, art. 11, of the constitution of this state, the board of supervisors might, as a police regulation, provide that prisoners in the county jail might be worked on the streets or other public places, and that, having made such an order, the sheriff was thereby justified in putting the prisoners at hard labor, as therein provided for. But this would be giving a remarkable construction to the constitutional provision relied upon. If the board could add to the judgment of the court by ordering a prisoner to be worked on the streets as a means of rendering his imprisonment less burdensome and expensive to the county, they might, on the same principle, order him to be hanged, thereby relieving the county entirely from the expense of his keeping. The action taken by the board in this case was not an exercise of their police powers. They are authorized by statute to make and enforce such an order where a prisoner is confined in the county jail under judgment of conviction of a misdemeanor. St. 1889, p.

239, § 30. But the imprisonment in this case was not as a punishment, but as a means of collecting a fine which was imposed as a punishment.

As we have seen, the court could not have authorized imprisonment at hard labor by its judgment, and it is equally clear that the board of supervisors could not, by its order, do what the court could not have done by its judgment. The power to provide for the working of prisoners must be confined to such prisoners as are consigned to the county jail as a punishment, and not to cases where the punishment inflicted is a fine, and the imprisonment a means adopted for its collection. Besides, a contempt of court, which is summarily tried by the court, without the right of trial by jury, is not a misdemeanor within the meaning of the section authorizing the working of prisoners. It is a quasi criminal offense against the court, for which a party may be fined and imprisoned as for a specific criminal offense, but it is not a misdemeanor in the strict sense of the term. Ex parte Ah Men, 19 Pac. Rep. 380; New Orleans v. Steam-Ship Co., 20 Wall. 392. For these reasons the imprisonment of the petitioners at hard labor on the streets or elsewhere than in the county jail was unlawful, and from such imprisonment they must be discharged. But it does not follow that the petitioners must be discharged from the custody of the sheriff. They are properly in his custody under a judgment that has been held by this court to be valid, (21 Pac. Rep. 974,) and by virtue of such judgment he is entitled to hold and confine them in the county jail. It is therefore ordered that the petitioners be, and they are hereby, remanded to the custody of the sheriff of Yuba county, to be held and imprisoned by him in the county jail in accordance with the judgment under which they are held.

SIMPSON v. SIMPSON et al. (No. 13,001.)

DIVORCE—AWARD OF HOMESTEAD TO WIFE.

A wife had executed and recorded a declaration of homestead on certain land, and held possession under a decree rendered in a subsequent action for divorce, awarding the homestead property to her, "to be held by her in trust for her support and for that of her children." Held, that no trust was created in the homestead property by such decree, but it passed an absolute title to the wife, under Civil Code Cal. § 146, subd. 3, which provides, in case of a divorce, that if a homestead has been selected from the community property it may be assigned to the innocent party, either absolutely or for a limited time, subject in the latter case to the future disposition of the court.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county; A. VAN R. PATERSON, Judge.

Action by John K. Simpson against Joshua Simpson and others, to quiet his title to certain land held by them as children and heirs at law of Roxanna Simpson, wife of the plaintiff, and from whom he was divorced. Judgment for plaintiff for an undivided one-half interest in the land and defendants appeal.

L. W. Elliott, for appellants. Baldwin & Campbell, (Edward I. Jones, of counsel,) for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. While the plaintiff and Roxanna Simpson were husband and wife they acquired title to the land described in the complaint by patent from the United States to plaintiff. Afterwards, while they, with their children, were residing upon the land, the wife executed, acknowledged, and recorded a declaration of homestead upon the land, the validity of which is not questioned. Thereafter the wife brought an action against the plaintiff herein for a divorce on the grounds of extreme cruelty and habitual drunkenness, in which, on the 10th day of September, 1875, the district court rendered a judgment and decree, without written findings, other than recited in the decree, of which the following is a copy: "In the district court of the Fifth judicial district of the state of California, in and for the county of San Joaquin. Roxanna Simpson, Plaintiff, vs. John K. Simpson, Defendant. In this action it appearing to the satisfaction of the court from the evidence in the action that the defendant herein has been guilty of extreme cruelty as charged in the complaint in this action, and that said defendant has been for two years last past an habitual drunkard, it is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the bonds of marriage between plaintiff and defendant be, and they are hereby, dissolved, and said parties are, and each of them is, hereby released from all of the obligation thereof. And it is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the plaintiff in this action have and own, and that she be entitled to the possession of, the homestead and common property in the complaint described in this action, with the exception of three horses, their harness, and a wagon, and that said defendant have and own said horses, harness, and wagon as his separate property. It is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the children of plaintiff and defendant be, until the further order of this court, with the exception of their son John J. Simpson, awarded to the care and custody of plaintiff, and that the care and custody of their said son, John J. Simpson, until the further order of this court, be awarded to said defendant. It is further ordered that said homestead property hereby awarded to plaintiff be held by her in trust for her support, and for that of the children of the parties to this action. It is further ordered and adjudged that the said parties to this action be, and each of them is, authorized to visit and enjoy the society of their children at all suitable times and occasions. S. A. BOOKER, District Judge. September 10, 1875." On September 6, 1877, Roxanna Simpson died, leaving her surviving eight children of her marriage with the plaintiff, who are the defendants in this action, and three of whom were still minors when the judgment in this action was rendered.

The object of the action is to quiet plaintiff's alleged title to said homestead land, which title is denied by the defendants. What was the effect of the divorce decree upon the husband's title to the homestead? is the only question presented for decision. Upon the foregoing facts the trial court adjudged that from and after the entry of the decree of divorce Roxanna Simpson and the plaintiff held and owned the homestead land "as tenants in common, subject to the trust declared in said decree for the benefit of said Roxanna and her children; that, so long as any of said children are under age, said property must be held in trust for his or their support and maintenance; and that when the youngest of said children arrives at the age of majority said John K. Simpson will be entitled to have, hold, and own an undivided one-half interest therein, relieved from said trust." Subdivision 3 of the 146th section of the Civil Code provides, in case of a divorce, that "if a homestead has been selected from the community property it may be assigned to the innocent party, either absolutely or for a limited period, subject in the latter case to the future disposition of the court." The third paragraph of the divorce decree expresses an absolute, unconditional assignment of the homestead property to the wife—"the innocent party"—in pursuance of the authority conferred upon the court by the above section of the Code, unlimited to any period of time, and which is not limited to any period by any other part of the decree; nor, properly construed, does the fifth paragraph of the decree reduce the estate assigned to a trust, or otherwise qualify its absolute character.

The meaning of the fifth paragraph of the decree is certainly indefinite and obscure, and therefore properly subject to construction. The intent to create a trust does not clearly appear from the language of the decree itself, to say nothing of other considerations which may be properly invoked as aids to the construction. In section 1009 of Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence the author says: "The declaration of trust, whether written or oral, must be reasonably certain in its material terms; and this requisite of certainty includes the subject-matter or property embraced within the trust, the beneficiaries or persons in whose behalf it is created, the nature and quantity of interests which they are to have, and the manner in which the trust is to be performed. If the language is so vague, general, or equivocal that any of these necessary elements of the trust is left in real uncertainty, then the trust must fail." The decree under consideration is uncertain as to what interest the children are to have. Are they entitled to support for life or only during their minority? When a part of them arrive at the age of majority or die, is the interest of the infants or survivors thereby increased? Under any circumstances would the beneficiaries be entitled to have the land sold and the proceeds expended for their support, or are they limited to the rents and profits? In case the rents and profits should be more than sufficient to support those entitled to support, what disposition is to be made of the surplus? Who would be entitled to call upon the trustee to account for such surplus? And, finally, in what manner is the trust to be performed? Again, in the same section, the author proceeds to say: "No particular technical words need be used. Even the words 'trust' or 'trustee' are not essential; any other words which unequivocally show an intention that the legal estate was vested in one person, but to be held in some manner, or for some purpose on behalf of another, if certain as to all other requisites, are sufficient. On the other hand, if the words 'trust' or 'trustee' are employed, they do not necessarily show an intention to create or declare a trust." See, also, Perry, Trusts, § 83.

As to the inference of a trust from the uses of the words, "for her support, and for that of the children," and like words and phrases, Mr. Pomeroy says, (section 1012:) "No definite rule can be laid down; each case must stand upon its own circumstances. If the language is sufficient for the intention to be clearly inferred, the trust will be enforced; otherwise the donee will take an absolute estate, and the provisions concerning maintenance will be regarded as mere motives for the gift, and recommendations addressed to his discretion."

The words in the divorce decree from which it is claimed that a trust may be inferred, immediately follow the paragraph giving the wife the custody of seven minor children, and thereby casting upon her the duty of supporting and educating them, regardless of any aid which the court might allow her from the property of her husband. Under these circumstances it seems not to have been inappropriate for the court to express, as a reason or motive for giving her the homestead, that it was intended for the support of herself and children, for which, by the decree, she had been made solely responsible. Another consideration tending to support the construction here given to the decree is that the law did not authorize the court to assign the homestead, or any equitable interest in it, to the children, nor to the wife in trust for any purpose; and, in the absence of a reasonably clear expression to the contrary, the court must be presumed to have intended to act within the scope of its authority, and not to exceed it. The authority of the court, in actions for divorce, to transfer the property of either party to the other, or otherwise to dispose of it, is purely statutory; and the statute did not authorize the court to create a trust in the homestead or community property, but only to assign it directly to the innocent party "absolutely or for a limited period." If any trust was created in this case by the divorce decree, it must have been a direct or express trust, created not by the owner personally, nor by any agency authorized by him, but by the court, acting by authority of law; but it is plain that the court had no such statutory authority, and our courts have no common-law authority to create any kind of trusts, certainly not express trusts. In the exercise of equity jurisdiction they find and adjudge trusts to exist by reason of contracts, devises, bequests, gifts, or wrongful or fraudulent acts, and may always appoint trustees when necessary to execute them, but never, by common-law authority, create them. It should be further remarked in this connection that as to the interest given to the wife she could not be trustee for herself, it being a legal impossibility for a person to be both trustee and cestui que trust at the same time, (Perry, Trusts, § 13;) and, moreover, that it is at least doubtful whether an express trust, for the purpose claimed in this case, is authorized by our Civil Code, (sections 847 and 857,) since it is not expressed nor clearly implied in the divorce decree that the rents and profits only of the homestead property were to be applied to the use of the wife and children. Indeed, "rents and profits" are not mentioned in the decree. It is not necessary or proper to decide what would have been the effect of a decree (as to being void or only voidable by appeal) clearly expressing an assignment of the homestead in trust; since it appears, by proper construction of the decree rendered, that by it the court did not intend to create a trust, or to limit or qualify the absolute assignment to the wife expressed in the third paragraph of the decree. I think the judgment should be reversed, and that the trial court should be directed to give judgment for the defendants upon the findings of fact.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; GIBSON, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is reversed, and the court below directed to enter judgment for the defendants upon the findings of fact.

BORN v. HORSTMANN et al. (No. 12,586.)

APPEAL—REVIEW—SUPERSEDEAS.

1. In a case where appellants are not required to do anything by the judgment, the filing of the statutory undertaking on appeal ipso facto operates as a supersedeas, staying all proceedings on the judgment.
2. In such case, an application by one of the respondents for a modification as to her of an order staying all proceedings on the judgment pending appeal, will not be allowed where the consideration of such motion presents an important issue of fact, and involves a question of law upon the construction of a provision of a will, even if the right to grant such modifying order were unquestioned, where such statutory undertaking has been filed.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JAMES G. MAGUIRE, Judge.

Suit by Caroline Born against Herman Horstmann, trustee, and Magdalena Ellen Lux, Elizabeth Zimmer, Mary Schieffler, and the minor children of said three defendants, for partition of certain real estate in which plaintiff claims an interest under a will. The trial court ordered the property sold and the proceeds distributed. The minor defendants, by Charles A. Sumner, their guardian at litem, filed the statutory undertaking, and appealed from said decree, praying for a supersedeas to stay the distribution of said proceeds. The supreme court thereupon granted a temporary restraining order. Pending this appeal, respondent Elizabeth Zimmer now makes application to this court for a modification of the stay of proceedings, in order that she may immediately receive what she claims to be her share of the proceeds of said sale.

Charles A. Sumner, guardian ad litem, (M. T. Moses, of counsel,) for appellants. E. J. Linforth, (Henry N. Clement, of counsel,) for respondent Elizabeth Zimmer. A. H. Loughborough, for respondents Lux and Schieffer.

PATERSON, J. The $300 undertaking on appeal herein stays all proceedings on the judgment, independently of the restraining order made by the court on the 27th day of April, 1888. In Re Schedel, 69 Cal. 243, 10 Pac. Rep. 334, it was held that "sections 942 to 945, inclusive, apply to appellants who are required to perform the directions of the judgment or order appealed from." In the case before us the appellants are not required by the judgment to do anything. Therefore the perfecting of the appeal by giving the undertaking mentioned in section 941 ipso facto operates as a supersedeas, and the order heretofore made herein, on motion of appellants, was not essential to preserve their rights on appeal.

Counsel for Mrs. Zimmer, one of the respondents, now asks for a modification of the order as to her, for the reason that by a decree of divorce made and entered in the superior court on the 24th day of May, 1888, dissolving the marriage which had existed between her and her husband, she has become "lawfully separated from her husband," and therefore is entitled, under the provisions of the will, to her one-fifth share of the money,—$2,540.06. In support of this motion a certified copy of the decree of divorce referred to is presented to us. As the $300 undertaking operates, under the statute, as a stay of proceedings, however, it is questionable whether we could, under any circumstances, grant the order asked for; but under the peculiar circumstances of this case we should be unwilling to make the order if the power to do so were undoubted. The provisions of the will which are to be construed are very peculiar,—unusual. The motion now under consideration presents not only an important issue of fact, viz., whether Mrs. Zimmer has been "lawfully separated from her husband," within the meaning of the phrase as used in the will, but also a question of law as to the proper construction of one of the provisions of the will,—a question which ought to abide a hearing on the merits of the appeal. Motion denied.

Bell v. Marsh. (No. 13,041.)

New Trial—Notice.

Under Code Civil Proc. Cal. §§ 656, 659, providing that "a new trial is a re-examination of an issue of fact in the same court after a trial and decision by a jury, or court, or by referees," and that the party intending to move for a new trial must, within 10 days after the verdict of the jury, or after notice of the decision of the court or referee, if the action is tried without a jury, file notice of such intention, in a case tried as in equity, and submitted to the jury on special issues, notice of an intention to move for a new trial, filed and served by plaintiff within 10 days after the decision of the court, was in time, though nearly 9 months after the verdict of the jury was filed, as the verdict of the jury in such a case is not a "decision."

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Santa Barbara county; R. M. Dillard, Judge.

Thos. McNulta, for appellant. Hall & Taggart and R. B. Canfield, for respondent.

Paterson, J. This is an appeal from an order granting the plaintiff a new trial. The action was upon a promissory note. The answer denied that the sum named in the complaint, or any other sum, was due or unpaid on the note; and for a second defense, and by way of counter-claim, averred that defendant was induced to execute and deliver the note by certain false and fraudulent representations. Defendant asked for affirmative relief. The case was tried before a jury upon special issues, framed and submitted by the court, and the verdict was rendered and filed on the 7th day of May, 1887. All of the issues raised by the pleadings were submitted to the jury. The plaintiff objected to the entry of the verdict, or its adoption by the court, upon the ground that in certain specified particulars the findings were not justified by the evidence. The court took and held the matter under advisement until the 1st day of February, 1888, and then adopted the findings of the jury as the findings of the court, and entered judgment thereon that the plaintiff take nothing, and that the defendant recover his costs. Afterwards, on the 10th day of February, 1888, the plaintiff filed and served notice of his intention to move for a new trial, and on this notice and a statement of the case, subsequently filed, the new trial was granted.

The only question presented here for decision is, was the notice of intention to move for a new trial filed and served within proper time? Section 656, Code Civil Proc., provides that "a new trial is a re-examination of an issue of fact in the same court after a trial and decision by a jury, or court, or by referees;" and section 659, Code Civil Proc., provides that "the party intending to move for a new trial must within ten days after the verdict of the jury, if the action were tried by a jury, or after notice of the decision of the court or referee, if the action were tried without a jury, file with the clerk and serve upon the adverse party a notice of his intention," etc. These two sections of the Code must be read together. No proceedings for a new trial can be had until "after the trial and decision by a jury or court." In equity cases the findings of the jury are merely advisory. A case has not been tried until all the issues have been disposed of, and there has been no decision until the court has passed upon the facts, and drawn its conclusions of law therefrom. And so it has been held that in equity cases the time to give the notice does not begin to run until the court has either adopted or rejected the findings of the jury. Bates v. Gage, 49 Cal. 126; Warring v. Freear, 64 Cal. 54. The case at bar was treated by the court, and by the parties, in all respects as an action in equity; whether properly or improperly so treated it is unnecessary now to inquire. To hold that the time to give the notice of intention begins to run from the rendition of the special verdict would necessarily put each party to the trouble, in the protection of his rights, of preparing and prosecuting motions for a new trial before either party knows what the decision of the court is to be. Order affirmed.

Limitation of Actions—Mistake.

Under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 338, providing that an action for relief on the ground of fraud or mistake must be commenced within three years after the cause of action accrued, such cause of action not to be deemed to have accrued until the discovery of the mistake by the aggrieved party, a complaint for relief on the ground of a mistake which occured 30 years previous, and which is silent as to the time when such mistake was first discovered, is bad on demurrer.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; W. E. Greene, Judge.

Action by James Smith and others against Henry P. Irving. A demurrer to the petition was sustained, and plaintiffs appeal. Pending appeal, Henry P. Irving, respondent, died, and William Matthews, his executor, was substituted in his place. Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 338, prescribes a three-years period of limitation for the commencement of "an action for relief on the ground of fraud or mistake; the cause of action in such case not to be deemed to have accrued until the discovery by the aggrieved party of the facts constituting the fraud or mistake."

Mich. Mullany, Aylett R. Cotton, and W. H. H. Hart, for appellants. George Leviston, for respondent.

Per Curiam. This is an action for relief on the ground of mistake. It was not commenced until more than 30 years after the mistake occurred. As to the time when the mistake was first discovered by plaintiffs, the complaint is silent. The complaint was demurred to on the ground, among others, that the alleged cause of action was barred by the provisions of section 338 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The demurrer was sustained, plaintiffs declined to amend their complaint, judgment was entered for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Section 338 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that an action for relief on the ground of fraud or mistake must be commenced within three years after the cause of action accrued. In People v. Blankenship, 52 Cal. 619, it was held that an action for relief on the ground of fraud was barred after the lapse of three years, unless the plaintiff alleged a discovery of the facts constituting the fraud within three years before the commencement of the action. In that case an order overruling a demurrer was reversed. In Sublette v. Tinney, 9 Cal. 423, the court says: "The policy of the law is that actions on this ground should be commenced within three years; but that innocent parties may not suffer whilst in ignorance of their rights, the statute excepts them from the limitation until a discovery of the fraud. The latter clause of the section must, therefore, be construed as an exception, * * * and be pleaded as such. In the present case, then, the cause of action accrued upon the execution of the contract." It has always been held that statutes of limitation should be strictly construed. The language of the statute is plain, and we think the demurrer was properly sustained. It is unnecessary to consider the other grounds of demurrer. Judgment affirmed.

THORNTON, J., heard the agument, but took no part in the decision of this case, thinking himself disqualified

(No. 11,531.)

LIABILITY ON TREASURER'S BOND—LIMITATION OF ACTIONS.

1. Defendant H. gave a bond as city treasurer for the faithful discharge of official duties then or thereafter imposed on him. As such treasurer he received money arising from the sale of certain street bonds, under St. Cal. 1875-76, p. 443, authorizing the widening of a certain street, and providing (section 11) that the treasurer "shall receive and safely keep the same as moneys belonging to said city and county are kept," and designating a separate fund therefor. A warrant—No. 92—on an award for damages to a certain lot was issued to one A. as owner, without knowledge of plaintiff's claim of interest therein, but on the discovery of such claim another warrant—No. 114—was issued to the owner or owners of said lot, and notice thereof given to defendant H. The money was illegally paid by defendant's deputy on warrant No. 92; and the fund was sufficient to pay only a part of plaintiff's share under warrant No. 114. Held, that the sureties on the bond were liable for the residue.

2. Where the evidence showed that at the end of the official term for which the bond sued on was given the principal had on hand $24,963.91 in the fund, against which there were no legal demands prior to warrant No. 114 for $10,932, a finding that there was a balance of $1,800 in said fund is against the evidence, if it relates to the first term of the treasurer, and if it relates to the end of his second term it is beyond the issues pleaded.

3. Where plaintiffs, whose cause of action depended on warrant No. 114, payment of which could not be enforced until the conflicting claims between them and the lot-owner were finally determined, commenced their action within seven months after such determination, though more than four years after the illegal payment by the treasurer, their right of action was not barred by Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 337, providing that actions upon any contract, obligation, or liability founded upon an instrument in writing shall be commenced within four years.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JOHN F. FINN, Judge.

Action by Pierre Priet and others against J. de la Montanya and others on the official bond of Charles Hubert, as treasurer of the city and county of San Francisco, to recover the balance due and unpaid on a warrant held by plaintiffs and drawn by the board of Dupont-Street commissioners on the "Dupont-Street Fund." Plaintiffs had judgment. Defendants moved for a new trial, which was denied, and from the judgment and order denying their motion they appeal.

Mastick, Belcher & Mastick, for appellants. D. H. Whittemore, for respondents.

GIBSON, C. Defendant Hubert was treasurer of the city and county of San Francisco from December 6, 1875, until December 6, 1877, and before entering upon the discharge of his official duties gave the bond in suit, upon which his co-defendants are sureties. Upon the expiration of his term of office he succeeded himself by re-election.

Under the provisions of an act entitled "An act to authorize the widening of Dupont street, in the city and county of San Francisco," approved March 23, 1876, (St. 1875-76, p. 443,) he, as such treasurer, received from the sale of Dupont-Street bonds the sum of $966,950 to the credit of the "Dupont-Street Fund." A lot on Dupont street, belonging to one David Hunter, in which plaintiffs had a leasehold interest, was, pursuant to the act, taken for the improvement of the street, and the board of commissioners awarded the sum of $10,932 as damages for the taking of the lot, to David Hunter, as owner; and on April 20, 1877, issued to him, in his favor, a warrant, numbered 92, for the amount. Hunter, seven days thereafter, indorsed these words: "Received payment. DAVID HUNTER,"—upon the warrant, and delivered it to Henry S. Tibbey, the secretary of the board of commissioners. At the time the warrant was issued, the board was unaware of the interest of plaintiffs in the lot, but subsequently, on July 9, 1877, having discovered plaintiffs' claim of interest therein, it drew another warrant, numbered 114, for the same amount, payable to "the owner or owners" of the lot taken, and in compliance with section 15 of the act of March 23, 1876, deposited the same with the county clerk, and notified defendant Hubert, as treasurer. Both warrants were payable out of the Dupont-Street fund. The first warrant, No. 92, was afterwards illegally presented at the treasurer's office by Tibbey, and illegally paid to him by a deputy of the treasurer. The plaintiffs, in order to have determined the proportion of the amount so awarded that they were entitled to under said section 15 of the act, brought an action against Hubert, as treasurer, T. H. Reynolds, as county clerk, and David Hunter, and prosecuted the same to final judgment, which was entered on the 5th day of January, 1883, in accordance with the decision of this court rendered therein on appeal, (Priet v. Hubert, 62 Cal. 9;) in which decision it was also determined that the payment of warrant No. 92 was no defense to the payment of warrant No. 114. On the day after judgment was entered, the then treasurer paid on warrant No. 114 the sum of $1,800, being all that remained in the Dupont-Street fund. This amount was divided pro rata between plaintiffs and Hunter,—the former receiving the sum of $178, and the latter the remainder, leaving the sum of $1,472, with interest thereon, together with $100 as costs in that action, due the plaintiffs, to recover which this action was brought against Hubert and his sureties. Plaintiffs had judgment, from which and an order denying a new trial comes this appeal. Appellants contend (1) that Hubert, under the act of March 23, 1876, was not the agent of the city, but of the state, and consequently his sureties are not liable for any transaction under the act; (2) that the breach of the bond sued on did not occur within the official term for which it was given; (3) that the cause of action is barred by the statute of limitations.

In support of the first point, Liebman v. San Francisco, 11 Sawy. 147, 24 Fed. Rep. 705, is relied upon. That was an action against the city to recover on certain coupons attached to bonds issued under the act of April 1, 1872, (St. 1872, p. 911,) authorizing the opening of Montgomery avenue, and is similar in its provisions to the act in question here. The principal question in that case was as to the liability of the city on the bonds. It was held by the court that the board of public works created by the act was not the agent of the city, but of the state, and acted for the state in the performance of the duties imposed by the act, and that the city was not liable. Moreover, the act itself expressly declared that the city and county of San Francisco should not, in any event, be liable upon the bonds. Conceding that the Dupont-Street act simply made the board of public works or commissioners therein created, together with the treasurer, agents for the state, and not for the city and county, it does not follow that the treasurer would not be liable on his official bond for the loss of funds received under section 11 of the act, which provides that "the money arising from the sale of said bonds shall be paid to the treasurer of said city and county, who shall receive and safely keep the same, as moneys belonging to said city and county are kept; and said funds shall be known and designated as the 'Dupont-Street Fund.'" The general rule regarding sureties on an official bond is that they are only liable for such money as it is the legal duty of their principal to receive by virtue of his office, and must be determined by reference to the statutes making such principal a custodian of public funds. Brandt, Sur. § 451. The legislature, under the constitution of California of 1849, had plenary power to prescribe the duties of the treasurer of the city and county of San Francisco; and by the consolidation act of April 19, 1856, (St. 1856, p. 145, §§ 79, 80, 82,) did prescribe that such treasurer should receive, safely keep, and lawfully disburse "all moneys belonging to, or which shall be paid into, the treasury, and shall not * * * pay out any part of said moneys except upon demands authorized by this act," (section 79.) As the act only provides for the payment of demands against the city, it may be said that the statutory direction regarding the receiving, keeping, and paying out moneys applies only to moneys belonging to the city and county. Yet the legislature, having full power to prescribe the duties of the treasurer, could also curtail or enlarge those duties, and at any time within his official term. By the act of March 23, 1876, his duties were increased, and he was thereby charged with the additional duties of receiving and safely keeping all money derived from the sale of Dupont-Street bonds in the same manner "as moneys belonging to said city and county are kept," (section 11,) and of paying out the same in a certain manner. The county treasurers of the state are required to receive, safely keep, and pay out in the prescribed manner all moneys belonging to their several counties, and all other moneys directed by law to be paid into the county treasuries. Pol. Code, §§ 4144, 4161.

A familiar instance of where money other than county funds is directed to be paid to the county treasurer is in the matter of the sale of state school lands. No one would seriously contend that such a legislative direction does not make it obligatory upon the several county treasurers of the state to receive and account for such money to the state, or render their sureties liable. Hubert and his sureties, in compliance with Pol. Code, §§ 954, 960, gave the bond sued on, in view of this power of the legislature, and on the express condition therein that the sureties would answer for any failure on the part of their principal to faithfully discharge all official duties then required of him, as well as such additional duties as might be lawfully imposed upon him. Therefore, whether we regard Hubert as the agent of the state for the discharge of the additional duties imposed by the Dupont-Street act or not, the liability of his sureties for the faithful performance thereof remains the same.

Sureties on an official bond are liable only for a breach of official duty committed by their principal during the term of office for which the bond was given, (People v. Aikenhead, 5 Cal. 106; Brown v. Lattimore, 17 Cal. 93; Hubert v. Mendheim, 64 Cal. 213,) or committed by him after the expiration of his official term, and before he yields up the office to his successors, (Placer Co. v. Dickerson, 45 Cal. 12.) The evidence in this case shows without conflict that at the expiration of the official term for which the bond sued on was given, the principal, as treasurer, had on hand, belonging to the Dupont-Street fund, the sum of $24,962.91, against which no legal demands prior to that evidenced by warrant No. 114 appear. This amount was more than sufficient to meet the payment of warrant No. 114, if it could have been presented for payment during the first official term of Hubert. And as the treasurer had in the fund at the expiration of his first term of office the sum above stated, the court, in finding "that the balance left by said Hubert in the said Dupont-Street fund was the sum of $1,800," erred in finding against the evidence. If the finding relates to the end of his second term of office, it is beyond the issues tendered by the pleadings, as they only pertain to his first official term.

Considerable evidence was adduced tending to show the misappropriation of portions of the Dupont-Street fund, notably the illegal payment of warrant No. 92; but, as warrant No. 114 was not payable out of any particular portion of the fund, the misappropriations could not concern plaintiffs as long as there was enough in the fund not subject to prior demands to meet their warrant at any time prior to the expiration of Hubert's first term of office. If the deficiency illegally caused, whereby plaintiffs were prevented from obtaining the full amount of their portion of warrant No. 114, occurred during Hubert's second term of office, the sureties on the bond given for the second term would be responsible. See Heppe v. Johnson, 73 Cal. 270, 14 Pac. Rep. 833.

Plaintiffs' cause of action depended on warrant No. 114, issued under the Dupont-Street act, and payment thereof could not be enforced until the conflicting claims of plaintiffs and Hunter thereto were finally determined, pursuant to section 15 of the act, which was not done until the final judgment in Priet v. Hubert was entered on January 5, 1883; and, as this action was commenced on August 2, 1883, it results that the court correctly found that the right of action was not barred by the provisions of section 337, Code Civil Proc., as contended for by appellants. The judgment and order should be reversed, and the cause remanded.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded.

(No. 13,187.)

STATE OFFICERS—ELECTION BY LEGISLATURE—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.

Under Const. Cal. 1879, art. 3, § 1, providing that the powers of the government of the state shall be divided into three separate departments, the legislative, executive, and judicial, and no person charged with the exercise of powers belonging to one department shall exercise any functions appertaining to the others, except as expressly directed or permitted in the constitution; and article 20, § 4, that all officers or commissioners whose election or appointment is not provided for by the constitution, and all officers or commissioners whose offices or duties may hereafter be created by law, shall be elected by the people, or appointed, as the legislature may direct,—the power of appointment to office is not exclusively an executive function, but, so far as it is not regulated by express provisions of the constitution, may be regulated by law, and, if the law so prescribes, may be exercised by the legislature; and Pol. Code Cal. § 2292, providing for the election of a board of trustees, to control the state library, by the legislature in joint convention assembled, is constitutional.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county; JOHN W. ARMSTRONG, Judge.

Information in the nature of a quo warranto, instituted by the attorney general, through special counsel, upon the relation of R. W. Waterman, governor of the state of California, against A. C. Freeman, to test his right to hold the office of trustee of the state library, under and by virtue of Pol. Code Cal. § 2292. Judgment for defendant, and the relator appeals.

George A. Johnson, Atty. Gen., (Henry C. Dibble, of counsel,) for appellant. Freeman & Bates, for respondent.

BEATTY, C. J. By section 2292 of the Political Code it is provided as follows: "The state library is under the control of a board of trustees, consisting of five members, elected by the legislature in joint convention assembled, and holding their offices for the term of four years." Under and in pursuance of this provision of the Code, the legislature in joint convention elected the respondent a member of said board of trustees, and he thereupon assumed, and has since exercised, the duties of the office. The relator, holding that the above-quoted provision of the Political Code is unconstitutional in so far as it attempts to confer upon a joint convention of the senate and assembly the power of appointment to the office in question, has instituted this proceeding for the purpose of ousting the respondent.

The contention on the part of the relator is that appointing to office is intrinsically, essentially, and exclusively an executive function, and therefore cannot be exercised by the legislature. Section 1 of article 3 of the constitution of 1879 provides: "The powers of the government of the state of California shall be divided into three separate departments,—the legislative, executive, and judicial; and no person charged with the exercise of powers properly belonging to one of these departments shall exercise any functions appertaining to either of the others, except as in this constitution expressly directed or permitted." If the making of appointments to office is a function which, in the sense of the constitution, appertains to the executive department of the state government, there would seem to be no escape from the conclusion that the appointment of the respondent by the members of the legislative department was invalid, unless by some specific provision of the constitution such appointment is expressly directed or permitted. On the part of the respondent, it is contended that such specific provision is found in section 4 of article 20, which reads as follows: "Sec. 4. All officers or commissioners whose election or appointment is not provided for by this constitution, and all officers or commissioners whose offices or duties may hereafter be created by law, shall be elected by the people, or appointed, as the legislature may direct." But we cannot construe this section as an express direction or permission to the legislature to exercise the power of appointment to office, if that is essentially an executive function. It would, upon such an assumption, amount only to this: That with respect to newly-created offices, or offices not provided for in the constitution, the legislature may direct whether they shall be filled by popular election or by executive appointment; in other words, that the legislature may prescribe the rule of selection, but may not itself make the selection. State v. Kennon, 7 Ohio St. 561. Our decision, therefore, must depend upon the solution of the question whether appointment to office is essentially an executive function. As to this point the authorities cited by counsel are meager and conflicting. In the case of Taylor v. Com., 3 J. J. Marsh. 404, the court of appeals of Kentucky held that the removal of a county clerk and the appointment of another in his place by the county court could not be reviewed on writ of error, because such removal and appointment, though made in pursuance of authority delegated to the court as such by the constitution, was essentially an executive and not a judicial act. In the case of Field v. People, 2 Scam. 80, and Hoke v. Henderson, 4 Dev. 1, the question was not involved, and of course was not decided, although incidentally discussed. In a dissenting opinion in the Illinois case a letter of Thomas Jefferson is quoted, (page 141,) in which he says: "Nomination to office is an executive function. To give it to the legislature as we do is a violation of the principle of the separation of powers. It swerves members from correctness by temptation to entreat for office for themselves, and to a corrupt barter for votes, and destroys responsibility by dividing it among a multitude. By leaving nomination in its proper place among executive functions, the principle of the distribution of power is preserved, and responsibility weighs with its heaviest force upon a single head." To the same effect is the decision above cited from 7 Ohio St. 561. No doubt these views as to the intrinsic nature of the power of appointment or of nomination to office, and the expediency of confining it to the executive department of the government, are entitled to the highest consideration; but the question here is not what the constitution ought to be, but what it is; or, in other words, what was the intention of its framers as to this particular matter? Of course, if there had been at the time of its adoption a general consensus of opinion in harmony with the views of Mr. Jefferson, as above quoted, we should be forced to conclude that its framers intended to forbid to the legislature the exercise of the power of appointment to office. But there was no such consensus of opinion. On the contrary, it had not only been decided in other states of the Union, under constitutions containing provisions substantially equivalent to the sections above quoted from our own, that the legislature could fill offices by itself created, but our own supreme court, construing identical provisions of our old constitution, had come to the same conclusion. People v. Langdon, 8 Cal. 16. In view of this construction, so long acquiesced in and acted upon, it must be held that the convention of 1879, in readopting the provisions so construed in the identical terms of the old constitution, intended that they should have the same operation and effect formerly attributed to them. If they had meant to prescribe a different rule it would have been easy to express such intention in language not to be misunderstood, and leaving nothing to construction. Upon these considerations we feel constrained to hold that the power of appointment to office, so far as it is not regulated by express provisions of the constitution, may be regulated by law, and, if the law so prescribes, may be exercised by the members of the legislature. Judgment affirmed.

PROCEEDINGS BELOW AFTER REMAND—RECORD.

1. Pending ejectment, a receiver was appointed to take charge of the property and collect wharfage therefrom. Plaintiff recovered the land, but not the wharf attached, and the court ordered that the money collected by the receiver be paid to plaintiff. This order being reversed on appeal, the lower court, after hearing the evidence, made an order for an equal division of the wharfage, and that plaintiff pay the money into court. Held that, as the evidence showed that defendant was entitled to at least one-half the wharfage, the order will be affirmed.

2. Where the record shows no error of the court in making an order, and no exception thereto appears, the order will not be disturbed on appeal.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JOHN HUNT, Judge.

Craig & Meredith, for appellant. Fox & Kellogg, for respondents.

VANCLIEF, C. Ejectment for land, and a wharf connected therewith. The plaintiff recovered the land, but not the wharf. Pending the action, a receiver had been appointed to take charge of the land and wharf and to receive all wharfage and income from the same; and there was in the hands of the receiver $2,214.45, subject to be paid to the parties to the action as the court should direct; and the court ordered the whole sum to be paid to the plaintiff. From this order the defendant appealed, and this court reversed the order, on the ground that plaintiff was not entitled to all the money, but did not determine what portion thereof either party was entitled to, and remanded the case, with instructions to adjust the accounts in accordance with the opinion of the court. 57 Cal. 201. On the receipt of the remittitur the lower court heard the evidence produced by the parties, and ordered that the money be equally divided between plaintiff and defendants. From this order the present appeal is taken, on the ground that it is not justified by the evidence.

The evidence strongly tends to prove that the defendants were entitled to at least one-half of the money. The record shows no ground for the point that the court erred in ordering plaintiff to pay the fund into court. All that appears is that "motion for order to compel plaintiff to pay said fund into court granted." Neither the motion, nor the grounds upon which it was made or granted, nor any exception to the granting of it, appears. And it is even uncertain whether or not any appeal from it has been taken. I think that both orders should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; GIBSON, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the orders appealed from are affirmed.

APPEALABLE ORDER.

An appeal will not lie from an order denying a motion to set aside a judgment, there being no motion for a new trial, and the judgment being itself appealable.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; H. K. S. O'MELVENY, Judge.

Wicks & Ward, for appellant. W. T. Williams and Williams & McKinley, for respondent.

HAYNE, C. This was an action for divorce. Judgment passed for the plaintiff. After the judgment had been entered, the defendant moved the trial court to set such judgment aside on the ground that no findings had been made. This motion was denied, and the defendant appeals from the order denying such motion. The plaintiff moves to dismiss this appeal, and we think that the motion should be granted. The motion was not for a new trial, but was merely to set aside the judgment; and the judgment was itself appealable. It is settled that when a judgment or order is itself appealable the appeal must be taken from such judgment or order, and not from a subsequent order refusing to set it aside. Larkin v. Larkin, 76 Cal. 323, 18 Pac. Rep. 396; Tripp v. Railroad Co., 69 Cal. 632, 11 Pac. Rep. 219; Reay v. Butler, 69 Cal. 585, 586, 11 Pac. Rep. 463; Railroad Co. v. Railroad Co., 65 Cal. 295, 4 Pac. Rep. 13; Holmes v. McCleary, 63 Cal. 497; Coombs v. Hibberd, 43 Cal. 452; Water Co. v. Parker, 16 Cal. 83; Stearns v. Marvin, 3 Cal. 376. There are some exceptions to this rule, but the case does not fall within any of them. The plaintiff should have appealed from the judgment, with a bill of exceptions upon that appeal. We therefore advise that the appeal from the order refusing to set aside the judgment be dismissed.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregong opinion the appeal from the order refusing to set aside the judgment is dismissed.

RECORD ON APPEAL—REVIEW.

1. Where an appeal is taken from a judgment for want of findings, and the record discloses no findings, but also fails to show that they were not waived, waiver will be presumed, and the judgment will be affirmed.

2. A bill of exceptions, filed in an appeal from a non-appealable order, cannot be considered in an appeal from a judgment in the same case.

Wicks & Ward, for appellant. W. T. Williams and Williams & McKinley, for respondent.

HAYNE, C. Action for divorce. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. The sole point made is that the judgment should be reversed for the want of findings. None appear in the record. But, on the other hand, there is nothing in the record to show that findings were not waived. There is another appeal in the same case from a non-appealable order, which appeal has been dismissed. And there was a bill of exceptions upon said appeal. But such appeal was from a different determination from the one in question here, which determination was not the subject of an appeal, and the bill of exceptions thereon is not even in the transcript on this appeal. That bill cannot be considered here. As above stated, therefore, there is nothing in the record before us to show that findings were not waived; and in such case it must be presumed that they were waived. Mulcahy v. Glazier, 51 Cal. 627; Smith v. Lawrence, 53 Cal. 34. The respondent has made a motion to dismiss this appeal, but, as we think that the judgment should be affirmed, we have not considered it necessary to examine the questions presented by that motion. We therefore advise that the motion to dismiss the appeal from the judgment be denied, and that the judgment be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the motion to dismiss the appeal is denied, and the judgment is affirmed.

ACCOUNTING—STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS.

1. A complaint showing that intestate, having a separate estate of $1,800 in money, and other personalty, died in 1860, leaving him surviving a widow and two children, the plaintiffs, aged ten and eight years; that there were no claims against the estate, which was not administered upon; that the widow took possession of the money and personalty for the benefit of herself and plaintiffs, and sold the personalty for $400, retaining the $2,200 until she married in 1861, when she invested it in real estate in her husband's name; that both knew of plaintiffs' interest in the money, and acknowledged their rights until within 60 days before suit brought; and praying for an accounting and a lien on the realty for the amount found due,—is sufficient to put defendants to answer.

2. Where plaintiffs and defendants are tenants in common in the fund of which an accounting is sought, and in the equitable ownership of the property in which the fund is invested, of which defendants are in possession, the statute of limitations will not commence to run until their rights are disputed or disturbed by defendants.[1]

[1] As to the running of the statute of limitation between co-tenants, see Berg v. McLafferty, (Pa.) 12 Atl. Rep. 460, and note; Mayes v. Manning, (Tex.) 11 S. W. Rep. 136, and note.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Tehama county; CHARLES P. BRAYNARD, Judge.

Action for an accounting by P. T. and J. A. McClure as heirs at law of John G. McClure, deceased, against John G. Colyear and Amanda, his wife, and widow of said John G. McClure. Defendants demurred, and the demurrer was sustained, and judgment entered accordingly, from which plaintiffs appeal.

John F. Ellison and Jackson Hatch, for appellants. Chipman & Carter and L. V. Hitchcock, for respondents.

FOX, J. Defendants' demurrer to plaintiffs' complaint was sustained, with leave to plaintiffs to amend. For failure to do so within the time granted, their default was entered, and judgment in favor of the defendants was thereupon rendered, from which plaintiffs appeal. From the complaint it appears that in 1860 one John G. McClure, a resident of Tehama county, died intestate, leaving as his separate estate $1,800 in money, and other personal property of the value of $400, and surviving him as his successors the plaintiffs, aged at the time, respectively, ten and eight years, and his widow, now the wife of her co-defendant herein. There were no claims against the decedent or his estate, and no administration was had, but his widow took possession of the money and personal property for the benefit of herself and her children, the plaintiffs in this cause. She sold the personal property, realizing $400 therefor, and retained the whole $2,200 until she married her co-defendant in 1861. During this year she, with her co-defendant, invested the money in business, and thereafter, with the money and its proceeds, bought the realty described in the complaint, and took the title thereto in the name of the defendant John G. Colyear, in whose name it still appears of record. Both defendants knew that the plaintiffs were the owners each of one-third of this money. Quoad their respective shares this fund was an express trust in the hands of the mother. The character of the trust was not and could not be changed by the act of the defendants in investing it in lands, although the title to such land was taken in the name of one not interested in the money, he having knowledge at the time that it was a trust fund. The complaint expressly avers that both defendants knew of and always acknowledged the rights of plaintiffs until within 60 days next before the commencement of this action. The demurrer was sustained on the ground that the complaint was indefinite and uncertain, but we think it sufficiently certain and definite to put the defendants to their answer.

Defendants also demurred on the ground that the claim was barred by the statute of limitations. Against such a trust the statute does not begin to run until the trustee repudiates the trust by clear and unequivocal acts or words, and claims thenceforth to hold the estate as his own, not subject to any trust, and such repudiation and claim are brought to the knowledge of the cestui que trust. Janes v. Throckmorton, 57 Cal. 368. The plaintiffs were not guilty of laches in failing to assert their rights until the defendants had taken some steps to dispute or disturb them. Barroilhet v. Anspacher, 68 Cal. 116, 8 Pac. Rep. 804. In addition to this the plaintiffs and the defendant Amanda have been at all times, and still are, tenants in common in the ownership of the fund, or the equitable ownership of the property in which the fund is invested, and she has been and is in possession. Her possession was their possession, so that in that view of the case the statute has never commenced to run against them, until their rights were denied, and she claimed to hold in hostility to them. Treating her husband as the holder of the legal title, holding it in trust for the benefit of his wife and her co-owners in the money which she furnished for the purchase of the property, then we find that she has been in possession with him all the time, and, through her the plaintiffs, her co-owners in the equitable title, have also been in possession. In such case the statute will not run in his favor, as it never runs in favor of a trustee, as against the cestui que trust, while the latter is in possession of the trust estate. Gilbert v. Sleeper, 71 Cal. 290, 12 Pac. Rep. 172; Love v. Watkins, 40 Cal. 548. Judgment reversed and cause remanded for further proceedings.

PENNIE v. REIS, Treasurer. (No. 13,198.)

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—POLICE DEPARTMENT—PENSIONS—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.

1. Act. Cal. April 1, 1878, §§ 9–13, providing that on the death of a police officer of San Francisco the city and county treasurer shall pay a certain sum to his legal representatives out of a certain fund created by such act, does not create a vested right in such sum during the life of such officer; and a subsequent act, which repeals the former, passed before the death of such police officer, is not unconstitutional, as depriving him of property without due process of law.

2. Act Cal. March 4, 1889, created a police relief and pension fund, in the several cities and counties of the state, and provided (section 13) that "any fund provided by law, heretofore existing in any county, * * * city, or town, for the relief or pensioning of police officers, * * * or for the payment of a sum of money on their death," should be merged with the fund created by that act, and (section 15) repealed all inconsistent acts or parts of acts. Held, that this act impliedly repealed the provision of the act of 1878 for the payment of a sum on the death of a police officer, though it did not expressly refer to that act.

3. The title of the act of March 4, 1889, "An act to create a police relief, * * * and pension fund in the several counties, cities and counties, cities and towns, of the state," is sufficient.

4. Such act, in providing for a board to manage the fund created, does not create a "special commission" within the prohibition of Const. Cal. art. 11, § 13.

5. Nor does it contravene Const. Cal. art. 4, § 32, prohibiting the granting of "extra compensation" to public officers, in that it grants pensions to certain officers who have served for a certain time, or become disabled.

In bank. Petition for mandamus.

James C. Pennie, administrator of the estate of Edward A. Ward, deceased, petitions for a writ of mandate to C. Reis, the treasurer of the city and county of San Francisco, commanding him, as treasurer of the Police Life and Health Insurance Fund of the city and county of San Francisco, to pay the petitioner the sum of $1,000, or to show cause.

Naphtaly, Friedenrich & Ackerman, (Alfred Clarke, of counsel,) for petitioner. Davis Louderback, for respondent.

McFarland, J. This is a petition for a writ of mandate to compel the treasurer of the Police Life and Health Insurance Fund of the city and county of San Francisco to pay petitioner, as administrator of Edward A. Ward, deceased, the sum of $1,000. On April 1, 1878, an act of the legislature was approved in relation to the police force of the city and county of San Francisco. It provided, (section 2,) among other things, that the compensation of police officers "shall not exceed" $102 per month, and that the treasurer "shall retain from the pay of each police officer the sum of $2 per month, to be paid into a fund to be known as 'The Police Life and Health Insurance Fund,' which shall be administered as is provided in sections 9 to 13, inclusive, of this act." These last-named sections provide, generally, that the mayor, auditor, and treasurer of the city and county shall constitute "the Police Life and Health Insurance Board," that such board shall invest the moneys of the fund in certain securities, and that upon the death of a member of the police force there shall be paid to his legal representatives, by said treasurer, the sum of $1,000. The said deceased, Edward A. Ward, was a member of said police force at and before the time of the passage of said act of April 1, 1878, and continued to be a member of said force until the time of his death, which occurred March 13, 1889. But before his death there went into effect an act of the legislature, approved March 4, 1889, entitled "An act to create a police relief, health, and life insurance and pension fund in the several counties, cities, and counties, cities and towns, of the state." This act is very comprehensive, and has many details. It provides, generally, for a police relief and pension fund, and for a board to manage it; for pensions to persons over 60 years old, who have been in the service for a certain period, and to those who become disabled in the performance of their duties, and to the widows or children of those who lose their lives in the performance of such duties; for the payment of a certain sum of money to the widows or children of those who die from natural causes after they have served 10 years, and for other benefits to members of the police force, not necessary to be here mentioned. Section 13 of the act provides that "Any police life and health insurance fund, or any fund provided by law, heretofore existing in any county, city and county, city or town, for the relief or pensioning of police officers, or their life or health insurance, or for the payment of a sum of money on their death, shall be merged with, paid into, and constitute a part of, the fund created under the provisions of this act." Section 15 provides that "All acts or parts of acts in conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed." Under this act the respondent refuses to pay the money demanded by the administrator of the said Ward, deceased.

The petitioner makes numerous attacks on the validity of said last-named act, and upon its efficiency to accomplish the purpose for which it was evidently intended. We will notice a few of them.

1. The main contention of petitioner is that the act is in violation of the provisions of the constitutions of the United States and of this state, that no person shall be deprived of property without due process of law. This contention goes upon the theory that the deceased had a vested property right in the thousand dollars of public money which the statute had at one time directed to be paid to his legal representative upon the happening of the contingency of his death. Had he died while the law still directed such payment, a different question would have been presented. He had a mere expectancy, which could have none of the elements of a vested right until the contingency contemplated by the statute had happened; but when that event came there was no statute which gave it any significance. A public officer—at least one whose term and compensation are not prescribed by the constitution—has no contract by which he can have or hold either his office or his salary against the legislative will. In Miller v. Kister, 68 Cal. 144, 8 Pac. Rep. 813, this court say: "But it is well settled that salaried public officers created by the legislature are not held by contract or grant. The legislature has full control over them, unless restricted by the constitution, and may abolish them altogether, or impose upon them new duties, or reduce their salaries." And such an officer "accepts the office with the direct understanding that during his term of office the legislature may modify or amend the acts concerning fees of office, without impairing any legal right acquired by him by virtue of his election and entry upon the duties of his office." Miner v. Solano Co., 26 Cal. 118. See, also, Attorney General v. Squires, 14 Cal. 13; People v. Haskell, 5 Cal. 357. The said act of March 4, 1889, therefore, did not interfere with any vested right, and is not obnoxious to the constitutional principle invoked by petitioner.

2. It is contended that the said act last named did not repeal the provision of said act of April 1, 1878, under which petitioner claims. It is true that it does not expressly refer to that part of the former act, and repeal it in terms; but it repeals it by necessary implication. "The latter takes place whenever by subsequent legislation it becomes apparent that the legislature did not intend the former act to remain in force." Christy v. Sacramento Co., 39 Cal. 1. And it is apparent that the legislature, when passing the act of 1889, did not intend the act of 1878—so far, at least, as said provision is concerned—to remain in force. The two acts, with respect to the matter before us, are utterly inconsistent, and cannot both stand. The provision of section 24 of article 4 of the state constitution, about revising or amending a law by reference to its title, applies clearly to acts which are in terms revisory or amendatory of some former act. It does not apply to an independent act. When two independent acts are incurably inconsistent and contradictory there is only one rule to follow, and that is, to give effect to the latest expression of the legislative will.

The two foregoing points are the main ones presented by petitioner; but his counsel makes one or two other points in his brief, and suggests or intimates a number of others, which we have no time to notice here in detail. We will content ourselves with saying that, in our opinion, the title of the said act of March 4, 1889, is sufficient; that it does not create a "special commission" within the prohibition of section 13 of article 11 of the state constitution; that it is not violative of the prohibitions in the constitution of granting an "extra compensation," etc., to any public officer, or increasing such compensation, or making any gift of public money; and that, so far, at least, as those parts of said act which affect the rights of petitioner are involved, we see no legal objection to the validity and efficiency of said act. The prayer of the petitioner is denied, and the writ dismissed.

We concur: WORKS, J.; THORNTON, J.; PATERSON, J.

(No. 12,578.)

MINES AND MINING—CONVEYANCE OF MINES.

1. Under Laws Cal. 1880, p. 131, providing that it shall not be lawful for the directors of any mining corporation to sell or dispose of the mining ground of the corporation without the consent or ratification of the holders of two-thirds of the capital stock, in writing, signed by such stockholders, or by resolution duly passed at a stockholders' meeting, a conveyance of such ground without such consent does not pass title.

2. Such consent cannot be presumed from the mere fact of the conveyance, even though it is under the corporate seal.

3. The term "mining ground," as used in such statute, includes a ditch and water-right, by means of which a mine is operated, as an appurtenance thereof.

THORNTON, J., dissenting.

Commissioners' decision. Appeal from superior court, Nevada county; GEORGE E. WILLIAMS, Judge.

Action by A. McShane to enjoin R. D. Carter, sheriff, from selling plaintiff's property under judgment obtained against him by one J. M. Smith, who is a party defendant. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal.

C. W. Cross and Cross & Simonds, for appellants. Joseph Kirk, Fred Searls, and Spencer & McEnerney, for respondent.

HAYNE, C. This was a suit to enjoin the defendant Carter, who is a sheriff, from selling the property of the plaintiff under a judgment obtained by the defendant Smith against the Nevada Reservoir Ditch Company, from which plaintiff deraigned his title. The property which the sheriff was proceeding to sell is described in the complaint as follows, viz.: "That certain reservoir ditch, sometimes called the 'Big Ditch,' having its head about one-half mile above the residence of Joseph Perrin, on Little Wolf creek, in Grass Valley township, Nevada county, state of California, and extending thence westerly to the west line of Nevada county; and also that certain water-right, being the right to take the waters of said Wolf creek, and divert the same from said creek to the extent of the capacity of said ditch." The plaintiff alleges that he was the owner of several mining claims described in the complaint, and that "said property advertised for sale and levied upon under said execution has been for years past and now is by plaintiff used as appurtenant to said mining claims and reservoirs and mining lands of plaintiff, and is necessary and requisite to the working and operating thereof, and was and is appurtenant thereto." And this was found to be the fact both as to the plaintiff himself and as to his predecessors in interest. In the plaintiff's chain of title to the claims and ditch were two deeds from mining corporations, viz., a deed from said Nevada Reservoir Ditch Company to the Golden Gate Consolidated Mining Company, made in 1882, and a deed from the latter to one Patrick Campbell, made in 1884. These deeds were authorized by the boards of directors of said respective companies, and were executed by the proper officers, but were not ratified by the stockholders of said corporations. In 1880 the legislature passed an act entitled "An act for the further protection of stockholders in mining companies," which contained the following provision: "Section 1. It shall not be lawful for the directors of any mining corporation to sell, lease, mortgage, or otherwise dispose of the whole or any part of the mining ground owned or held by such corporation, nor to purchase or obtain in any way any additional mining ground, unless such act be ratified by the holders of at least two-thirds of the capital stock of such corporation. Such ratification may be made either in writing, signed and acknowledged by such stockholders, or by resolution duly passed at a stockholders' meeting called for that purpose." Laws 1880, p. 131. The court below gave judgment for the plaintiff, and the defendants appeal from said judgment and from an order denying their motion for a new trial. The appeal from the judgment was taken too late, and must for that reason be dismissed. The appeal from the order denying the motion for a new trial, however, is properly presented, (Pico v. Cohn, 20 Pac. Rep. 706,) and the important question arising on that appeal is whether the evidence is sufficient to show that the plaintiff was the owner of the property which the sheriff was proceeding to sell, and this depends upon whether the directors of said mining companies had power or authority to convey the property in the absence of a ratification by the stockholders as specified in the act of 1880.

1. We think that the provision of said act goes to the power or authority of the directors. It cannot be construed to relate merely to their personal liability, for no penalty is imposed upon them; and to so construe it would be to practically nullify the act. In our opinion the directors of mining corporations have no power or authority to convey the mining ground without the consent of holders of two-thirds of the stock, given as prescribed by the act, and it follows, without such consent, the title does not pass; and if this be so, the question can be raised by any one who connects himself with the title of the corporation which owned the property, as well as by the stockholders thereof. Nor can the consent of the stockholders be presumed from the mere fact of the conveyance, whether under the corporate seal or not, for such consent or "ratification" may be after the deed is executed, and hence is not necessarily or presumptively involved in the execution of such deed.

2. Is the property in controversy here within the purview of the act? It is to be observed that the requirement relates to "the mining ground." Just what that term includes might perhaps admit of question in certain cases. Does it include only the ground actually mineralized, or does it embrace all the other adjacent lands of the corporation? It is not necessary to consider that precise question in this case; but we think that whatever realty is incident or appurtenant to the mineralized ground worked as a mine—whatever would pass by a conveyance of "the mine" itself, as an appurtenance thereto—is within the meaning of the requirement. The transfer of a thing transfers all its incidents and appurtenances, (Civil Code, § 1084;) so that the question is whether a ditch and water-right, by means of which "mining ground" is operated and used, is an incident or appurtenance thereof. In this regard it is to be remembered that the court finds that the ditch and water-right were appurtenant to the mines formerly owned by said corporations, and purported to have been conveyed by them and necessary to the use and operation thereof, and we think that this finding is in accordance with correct principles. The relation of a mine to the water by which it is operated is analogous to the relation between an ordinary mill and the water upon which its use depends. Water is as essential to the use of the one as it is to the use of the other, and it is well settled with reference to ordinary mills that the water-right is appurtenant to the mill, and will pass by a conveyance thereof, either with or without express mention of "the appurtenances." This has been the law from early periods. In Touchstone it is laid down that "by the grant of mills, the waters, flood-gates, and the like, that are of necessary use to the mills, do pass." Shep. Touch. 89. And in the old case of Nicholas v. Chamberlain, Cro. Jac. 121, "it was held by all the court, upon demurrer, that if one erect a house, and build a conduit thereto in another part of his land, and convey water by pipes to the house, and afterward sell the house with the appurtenances, excepting the land, or sell the land to another, reserving to himself the house, the conduit and the pipes pass with the house, because they are necessary and appurtenant thereto." Chancellor KENT says: "A conduit conveying water to the lands sold, from another part of the lands of the grantor, will pass as being necessary or quasi appendant thereto. So a race-way, conducting water from a mill to another part of the grantor's land, has been held to pass by a conveyance of land with the mill thereon." 4 Kent, Comm. *467. And in Richardson v. Bigelow, 15 Gray, 154, the court, per Chief Justice SHAW, said: "It is a well settled rule of law that the grant of a mill carries with it by necessary implication the right to the use of the water coming to the mill and furnishing power for working it, and also to the canal or race-way which carries the water from the mill, to the full extent of the grantor's right and power so to grant them." And this proposition is in accordance with the preponderance of authority, both as to the water connected with or arising from the particular tract and that arising from or connected with adjacent tracts of the same grantor, provided it was necessary to the use of the mill and was so used. Perrin v. Garfield, 37 Vt. 312; Morgan v. Mason, 20 Ohio, 401; New Ipswich Factory v. Batchelder, 3 N. H. 190; Neaderhouser v. State, 28 Ind. 257; Whitney v. Olney, 3 Mason, 280; Bank v. Miller, 7 Sawy. 163, 6 Fed. Rep. 545; Pickering v. Stapler, 5 Serg. & R. 110; Hammond v. Woodman, 41 Me. 177; Baker v. Bessey, 73 Me. 472; Coolidge v. Hager, 43 Vt. 9; Le Roy v. Platt, 4 Paige, 82; Curtis v. Norton, 58 Mich. 411, 25 N. W. Rep. 327. And the rule holds not only as to the water-right itself, but also as to the conduit or ditch through which the water flows; for while, as a general rule, land does not pass as an appurtenant to other land, yet it may be of such a nature as to pass with the principal thing. In Sheets v. Selden, 2 Wall. 187, 188, it was held that an adjoining parcel of land passed by a grant of a canal, and the court, per FIELD, J., said: "The objection that the deed does not cover the premises in controversy rests upon the fact that it does not convey the parcels of land for which the action is brought by specific designation and description. Such designation and description, though usual, are not always essential. Land will often pass by other terms. Thus a grant of a messuage, or a messuage with the appurtenances, will carry the dwelling-house and adjoining buildings, and also its orchard, garden, and curtilage. * * * The true rule on the subject is this, that everything essential to the beneficial use and enjoyment of the property designated is, in the absence of language indicating a different intention on the part of the grantor, to be considered as passing by the conveyance." And see to the same effect, Sparks v. Hess, 15 Cal. 195, 196. The statutory definition of an appurtenance is in harmony with the above rule. "A thing is deemed to be incidental or appurtenant to land when it is by right used with the land for its benefit, as in the case of a way, or water-course, or of a passage for light, air, or heat from or across the land of another." Civil Code, § 662. And in pursuance of this definition, it was held in Farmer v. Water Co., 56 Cal. 11, that where water had been conducted through a pipe to the grantor's premises, and rightfully used for domestic purposes and for irrigation of his grounds, it passed by his deed as an appurtenance to the land. And a decision similar in principle was made in Mining Co. v. Moses, 58 Cal. 168, with reference to a ditch used to operate a mine. And compare McDonald v. Mining Co., 13 Cal. 235, 236; Quirk v. Falk, 47 Cal. 455; White v. Barlow, 72 Ga. 887. If, therefore, we are right in our construction that the term "mining ground" includes all the realty that is incident or appurtenant thereto, it follows that the provision applies to the case in hand, and that the title did not pass by the deeds in question, in the absence of a ratification by the stockholders. In this view it is unnecessary to consider the other questions argued.

We therefore advise that the appeal from the judgment be dismissed, and that the order denying the motion for new trial be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

I concur: BELCHER, C. C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the appeal from the judgment is dismissed, and the order denying the motion for new trial is reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

ADAMS v. LAMBARD. (No. 12,234.)

APPEAL—REQUISITES—PAROL EVIDENCE—TRUSTS —INTEREST.

1. The supreme court will not examine 26 account-books, covering 12 years, and involving large amounts submitted to show that the evidence does not support the finding of the trial court, where the evidence contained in the record amply supports such finding, although the statement submitted contains an agreement by all the parties that such books may be used by either party without further identification, and that inaccuracies in said statement are to be corrected according to such books.

2. Plaintiff and others, by absolute deed, conveyed mining property to persons to whom plaintiff and one of the grantors, who had no interest in the property, were indebted, and about two months thereafter the creditors executed an agreement to reconvey one-third of the property to plaintiff when the creditors had realized sufficient to cancel the indebtedness due them. Held, that parol evidence was admissible to show the consideration for both the deed and the agreement, and to show that the latter was executed in pursuance of a parol agreement made at the time of the conveyance.

3. The conveyance constituted a valuable consideration which supported the agreement, and, on the happening of the contingency, a trust resulted in favor of plaintiff.

4. Where it appeared that plaintiff was in the employ of, and sustained confidential relations to, such creditors, and the contingency had occurred, it was proper, considering the nature of the transaction, to find and enforce a trust in favor of plaintiff, simply on the agreement.

5. In determining whether the amount realized by the creditors from the mine was sufficient to cancel the indebtedness, a sum paid by them to a third person for his interest in the mine, in pursuance of a covenant in the deed, is no part of such "indebtedness."

6. Where such agreement is silent as to interest, and such indebtedness became extinguished by the conveyance of the mine property, and said creditors were permitted to work the mine or not, at their discretion, interest will not be allowed on the amount of such indebtedness, or on moneys expended in working the mine, especially as the creditors were to retain an interest in the property in consideration of the money advanced, besides receiving payment for the indebtedness and the expenses.

7. Where the creditor neglected to render an accounting of the expenses and income of said mine, though often requested by plaintiff, and without plaintiff's knowledge sold the mine to an innocent purchaser, plaintiff is entitled to compound interest from the date of the sale.

BEATTY, C. J., and THORNTON, J., dissent.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, El Dorado county; GEORGE E. WILLIAMS, Judge.

Action by Horace Adams against O. D. Lambard. Plaintiff died pending trial, and Margaret A. Adams, his executrix, was substituted in his stead. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

G. J. Carpenter, (Prentiss Carpenter and W. C. Belcher, of counsel,) for appellant. Fox & Kellogg, (Chas. F. Irwin and Geo. G. Blanchard, of counsel,) for respondent.

PATERSON, J. This action was commenced by Horace Adams, plaintiff's testator, on September 2, 1880, for an accounting, and to compel the defendant to convey to him an undivided one-third interest in the Mount Pleasant mine. When the plaintiff learned from the answer to his complaint that the defendant had conveyed the property to innocent purchasers, and that a specific performance of the contract to reconvey was impossible, he filed an amended complaint, alleging the value of the mine, and praying that, if it should appear from the evidence that a specific performance could not be enforced, a judgment be entered against the defendant for the value of the property. The history of the transactions involved is clearly and fully set forth in the findings of the court. These findings show substantially the following facts: In 1868 the defendant and one Goss were engaged in carrying on a manufacturing and foundry business in the city of Sacramento. Until the dissolution of the copartnership of Goss & Lambard, Horace Adams continued to be an employe in their foundry, and his relations to the members of the firm were, and for a long time had been, and until after the dissolution of the partnership continued to be, of a close and confidential nature. Adams & Grissim were at that time, and for some time prior thereto had been, the owners of and in possession of the Mount Pleasant mine and a 20-stamp mill, hoisting-works, machinery, etc., situated thereon, holding the same under title acquired by valid locations duly made under the mining laws of the United States and of the district in which the mine was situate, but the mining claim had not then been patented. Adams was the owner of an undivided two-thirds and Grissim the owner of an undivided one-third thereof. Adams & Grissim were indebted to Goss & Lambard to a very large amount for milling and mining machinery, tools, etc., furnished for the use of the mining claims, and the firm held a lien under the mechanics' lien law upon the mine and mill for about $16,000 of the indebtedness, and had commenced a suit for the foreclosure thereof. On June 27, 1868, and while the foreclosure suit was pending, Grissim conveyed his interest in the mine to one Waters. On July 23d, in pursuance of a parol agreement theretofore made between the parties, Adams, Grissim, and Waters executed and delivered to Goss & Lambard a deed of conveyance of the whole of the mine, and put them in possession thereof. At the time of this conveyance the indebtedness of Adams & Grissim to the firm amounted to the sum of $31,148.88. Goss & Lambard agreed in consideration of the conveyance, and the conveyance was made, delivered, and accepted upon the condition that, in consideration thereof, they should cancel the indebtedness of Adams & Grissim to them, and should pay in addition thereto other indebtedness of Adams & Grissim to an amount not exceeding $5,000, and should also pay Waters for his interest in the mine the sum of $10,000 cash, which like sum they then and there did pay. Afterwards they paid on account of the indebtedness of Adams & Grissim to others such claims as were presented, not amounting in the aggregate to more than $5,000. It was also agreed between the parties and the deed and possession of the property were delivered upon the further condition that Goss & Lambard should work and develop the mine according to their judgment and discretion, and without any unnecessary expense, and without any charge for their own services in the premises, and upon the further condition that whenever they had realized sufficient from the mine to reimburse themselves for the amount of the indebtedness of Adams & Grissim, together with the costs and expenses of caring for, operating, and working the same, they should reconvey to said Adams the undivided one-third of the mining claim and property. On the 18th day of September, 1868, in pursuance of said agreement, and in completion of the transaction of which the delivery of the deed and the possession of the property under it was a part, the defendant, Lambard, and said Goss executed and delivered to Adams an agreement in the following language: "Whereas, Leonard Goss and O. D. Lambard, on the 26th of July, A. D. 1868, purchased of Horace Adams, —— Waters, and W. T. Grissim the Mount Pleasant mine, situated in Grizzly Flat, El Dorado county, and are now the sole owners of said property: now, this agreement witnesseth, that in consideration of $1 to them, the said Goss & Lambard, paid by H. Adams, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, they hereby bind themselves, their heirs and executors, to convey to the said Adams the title they now possess to one undivided one-third of said property whenever the said property shall have canceled its indebtedness to them, and no indebtedness shall be incurred that is not strictly required, and neither of the said Goss & Lambard shall receive any salary for attention to the business till the indebtedness is canceled. Witness our hands and seals this the 18th of September, A. D. 1868. O. D. LAMBARD. LEONARD GOSS." In pursuance of this agreement, Goss & Lambard commenced to work and develop the mine, and continued the same until April 21, 1871, with varying success, when the firm of Goss & Lambard was dissolved. In the distribution of their partnership property, Goss conveyed his interest in the mine to the defendant, Lambard, who accepted the same with full knowledge of all the conditions of the agreements between them and Adams. Lambard continued to work, develop, and operate the mine with some interruptions, suspending the work at times to suit his own pleasure, until the 30th day of July, 1880, when, without consultation with, or the knowledge of, Adams, he sold and conveyed the same, and delivered the possession thereof for a valuable consideration to an innocent purchaser. While the defendant held the mining claim and property he procured a patent therefor from the government of the United States for a distance of 3,635 feet along the lode, and 300 feet in width on each side thereof, and from the state of California for 200 acres of land adjoining the same, but all the mining ground covered by these patents was embraced within the tract known as the "Mount Pleasant Mine." These patents were procured in further assurance of, and to protect, the title acquired from Adams, Grissim, and Waters, and not in hostility thereto; and the defendant based his claim to the patent upon, and received the same because of, his claim to the property under Adams, Grissim, and Waters. Adams at all times acknowledged that the legal title stood in Goss & Lambard, but at all times up to the commencement of the suit, which was commenced without a knowledge that Lambard had conveyed away the property, claimed that Goss & Lambard, and afterwards Lambard, held the property, as to the undivided one-third thereof, in trust, to be reconveyed to Adams as soon as and whenever Goss & Lambard should have realized sufficient from the total income from the property to reimburse them for the amount of the indebtedness of Adams & Grissim, and the other advances agreed upon, including the expenses of operating the mine. Adams frequently requested the defendant for information as to the costs and disbursements, and the income from the mine, and demanded an accounting thereof. The defendant never, to the knowledge of Adams, disputed his claim until after this suit was brought, but always made evasive replies, always postponed, and never made any accounting, as requested. Before the day of the sale and transfer of the mine and mining property he had received from the workings of the mine and the sale of bullion more than sufficient to repay the indebtedness, and the costs and expenses of working the mine, and of improvements made thereon, and of procuring and protecting the title thereto. There had been received from sales of bullion $183,834.06, from sales of machinery $3,600; making a total of receipts in the sum of $187,434.06. The total amount expended in the working and improvement of the mine and procuring patents, traveling expenses, etc., is $148,403.37; the amount of the original indebtedness, which, with the expenditures, the defendant is entitled to have deducted from the receipts, is the sum of $36,000; making a total of $184,403.37 to be deducted. The receipts and expenditures having been received and incurred from month to month, and from time to time, during all the period from July, 1868, to July, 1880, the court below was unable from the accounts to fix exact periods of rest and strike balances at different times of receipts and expenditures. The value of the property on the 30th day of July, 1880, when defendant sold the same, was the sum of $50,000.

The court adds its conclusions of law, to the effect: (1) That by the delivery and acceptance of the deed of July 23, 1868, all indebtedness of Adams & Grissim to Goss & Lambard was settled and canceled; (2) that by the terms and conditions of the conveyance a trust was created in favor of Adams whereby Goss & Lambard were to hold, operate, and manage the mine, as to the undivided one-third part thereof, as trustees, and were to reconvey the same to Adams as soon as they realized from the mine a sum of money sufficient to reimburse them for the indebtedness in satisfaction of which the interest of Adams, and such interest as Grissim then had, was received, and for the further advances then agreed upon, amounting in the aggregate to $36,000, together with the costs and expenses of operating and managing the same; (3) that when the interest of Goss in the property was conveyed to Lambard, Lambard had full knowledge of the trust, and the same passed to him fully charged therewith; (4) that immediately prior to the 15th day of July, at which time the court has found he had received from the mine an amount more than equal to all the indebtedness on account of which the interest of Adams & Grissim had been received, together with the expenditures made by him and the said Goss during the whole period in which they had managed the property, it was the duty of defendant to account to Adams and pay over one-third of the moneys which he had already received, less the indebtedness and expenditures aforesaid, and to convey an undivided one-third part of the mine to Adams; (5) that the patents did not vest the defendant with any title adverse to the title acquired and received under the deed of July 23, 1868, but that the defendant is entitled to have costs and expenses of procuring them allowed to him out of the income of the mine as a part of the expense of managing the same; (6) that, inasmuch as the defendant, Lambard, in selling and conveying the property without the knowledge and consent of Adams, had been guilty of a violation of the trust under which he held the same, and a fraud upon Adams, and by that act had placed it out of his power to comply with the terms of the trust, and reconvey the undivided one-third of the property to Adams, plaintiff became and is entitled to receive from the defendant the sum of $16,666.66,—one-third of all the moneys derived from the income of the mine, over and above the sum of $184,403.37,—with interest thereon at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum, compounded annually, from July 30, 1880, to the day of judgment. Upon the filing of these findings and conclusions of law, a judgment was entered against defendant in favor of plaintiff for the sum of $27,126.38, and costs, taxed at the sum of $1,868.65.

The only important question upon which appellant and respondent appear to differ is the question whether the amount defendant had realized from the mine at the time he sold it was sufficient to cancel the indebtedness mentioned in the agreement. This question involves the inquiries as to whether the $10,000 paid to Waters should be considered as a part of the "indebtedness," and whether interest should be computed on the account. It is contended by appellant that the agreement of September 18, 1868, was without consideration, was an independent transaction, and that the court erred in its construction of the agreement, and in admitting parol evidence to explain it. Nevertheless defendant disavows any intention to repudiate the agreement or deny any of the rights of plaintiff thereunder. It is admitted that the contract is to be construed in the light of the surrounding circumstances, and that proof on that subject was proper; but it is claimed that the parol evidence introduced by the plaintiff went further, and accomplished a modification of the written agreement. It is conceded by all parties that the transaction between Adams and Goss & Lambard was not a mortgage, but that the deed conveyed the legal title to the latter parties. It is also conceded that the defendant was not bound absolutely to work the mine, but was at liberty to cease work whenever in his judgment it was impolitic or unwise to work it longer, (respondent insisting, however, that, and correctly, we think, if he did work it and receive back the amount of indebtedness, etc., defendant could not sell it,) and that he had the right to sell the mine in good faith, if, after reasonable efforts, the proceeds of the mine should be insufficient to pay the indebtedness. The court found that the deed to and possession of the property were delivered "upon the further condition that the said Goss & Lambard should work and develop the said mine according to their judgment and discretion, and without any unnecessary expense, or any charge for their own services in the premises, and that whenever they had realized sufficient therefrom to reimburse themselves for the amount of the indebtedness to Adams & Grissim, together with the costs and expenses of caring for, operating, and working the same, they should reconvey to said Adams the undivided one-third of said mining claim and property." The court has found, also, that the agreement of September 18th was made, executed, and delivered in pursuance of the parol agreement, and in completion of the transaction of which the delivery of the deed and possession under it was a part, and that it was not made without consideration, but was given as a part of the consideration for the deed. There can be no doubt, we think, that parol evidence was admissible to prove the true consideration of both the deed and the agreement. The two constituted one transaction. Adams conveyed his entire interest in the mine in full satisfaction of a debt for which he and another were personally liable, and he delivered possession thereof, and surrendered all control over the same. Grissim paid no part of the debt. Adams paid it all. To the extent of Grissim's share of the debt, certainly, which was one-third, Adams had in effect paid the purchase price allowed by Lambard for the property. In consideration of that fact, and of the further fact that the whole purchase price was to be returned out of the property and an interest in the mine retained by Lambard, the latter agreed that, as soon as he had realized sufficient from the property to cancel the indebtedness for which it was received, with the costs of management, he would convey to Adams an undivided one-third of the property so received from him. The consideration for the agreement was certainly a valuable one, and there was not merely a part performance, but a full performance on the part of Adams; and upon the subsequent happening of the contingency provided for a trust was created in favor of Adams. If it be conceded that the rights of the parties turned upon the agreement of September 18, 1868, the court was correct, considering the confidential relations of the parties, and the nature of the transaction, we think, in finding the existence of a trust, and enforcing it. Adams had fully executed the trust, and the contingency had arisen under which Lambard had promised to reconvey. Under such circumstances, a court of equity will enforce the trust. Brison v. Brison, 17 Pac. Rep. 689; Thomas v. Jameson, 19 Pac. Rep. 177; Sandfoss v. Jones, 35 Cal. 481; Hearst v. Pujol, 44 Cal. 230; Janes v. Throckmorton, 57 Cal. 368; Love v. Watkins, 40 Cal. 547; Estate of Webb, 49 Cal. 541; Bostwick v. McEvoy, 62 Cal. 501. There is nothing in Feeney v. Howard, 21 Pac. Rep. 984, (filed July 1, 1889,) in conflict with this view.

It is claimed by appellant that the finding of the court to the effect that the amount received by defendant from the mine prior to his sale thereof was sufficient to cancel the indebtedness, is not supported by the evidence. This contention seems to be based largely upon the condition of the account, as shown in the books of the Mount Pleasant mine, kept by the defendant. It is said that these books are part of the res gestæ, and furnish prima facie evidence of the facts stated therein. Upon the evidence contained in the record we think that the finding of the court is amply supported. We have no means of knowing what opinion the learned judge of the court below entertained of the books kept by the defendant. It may be that they were entirely discredited. It is contended by the respondent that the books show upon their face that they had been made up for the purposes of the trial; that the receipts and returns correspond in number with the number of entries made upon the loose fly-leaves presented, but do not correspond in dates or amounts; that there is not an instance in which the weight of shipment and weight of receipt correspond. As to the truth of these contentions, on either hand, we do not purpose to investigate. It is true, the parties have stipulated at the end of the statement "that the original books of account of the Mount Pleasant mine, given or offered in evidence on said trial, may be exhibited and used by either party, or upon motion for new trial herein, or in the supreme court on appeal, without further identification, and with the same force and effect as if the same had been fully incorporated in this statement; and that, if any inaccuracies are discovered in the foregoing statement, purporting to be collated from said books, the same may at any time be corrected according to the books." This is a very convenient way of making a statement, but it places a burden upon this court which, notwithstanding the fact that it is agreed to by all the parties, we decline to assume. It is the duty of the party moving for a new trial to present a statement containing the grounds upon which he intends to rely, and so much of the evidence as may be necessary to explain the same, and no more. The parties have presented for our consideration the books of the Mount Pleasant mine, kept by the defendant, 26 in number, covering a period of 12 years, and representing transactions amounting in value to hundreds of thousands of dollars. We do not feel called upon to perform the labor the examination of these books would impose upon us.

We think the court properly refused to allow as a part of the moneys which defendant was authorized to deduct from the income of the mine the $10,000 paid to Waters for his one-third interest. Waters had become the owner of an undivided one-third in the mine. Of course Grissim's interest, which Waters acquired, was subject to its proportion of the lien claimed by Goss & Lambard, but the purchase seems to have been an independent transaction,—one not in any way connected with the real purpose of the transaction between Goss & Lambard and their debtors, Adams & Grissim. The deed, it is true, was executed by Waters as well as by Adams & Grissim; but Goss & Lambard knew that Grissim had no interest in the property at the time he joined in the deed. The $10,000 paid to Waters we think constituted no part of the debt which Adams undertook to pay off by conveying his two-thirds interest in the mine. It does not seem to have been contemplated in the negotiations leading up to the final adjustment of their affairs. The court below evidently believed, from all the circumstances surrounding the transaction, that the parties did not understand Adams was to buy any outstanding one-third of the mine for Lambard, or to allow the latter to purchase it, and figure the purchase price in the amount of indebtedness which he (Lambard) was to be reimbursed for before Adams could receive anything in return. The indebtedness referred to in the contract was the indebtedness of Adams & Grissim, and not the indebtedness which Lambard might incur by purchasing an outstanding title.

We think the court properly refused to allow the defendant interest on the amount of the indebtedness or moneys expended in working the mine. As said in Tirrell v. Jones, 39 Cal. 655: "As we construe the contract, it was not within the contemplation of the parties that the defendant was to charge interest on the money to be advanced by him." It is conceded by all parties that the indebtedness was paid by the conveyance of the property; and it is also conceded that the defendant was not bound absolutely to work the mine at all, and that he was at liberty to cease the work whenever in his judgment it was best to do so. Therefore the debt no longer existed as a subsisting debt. Adams took the risk of losing his interest in the mine, which rested upon their disposition to work the mine, without reserving to himself any power to compel them to do so. It does not seem reasonable to suppose that Adams intended to take the risk of allowing an accumulation of interest on the $36,000 of indebtedness until principal and interest had grown to an indefinite amount. Furthermore, it was for the advantage of Goss & Lambard to recover back their principal sum in the manner agreed upon as quick as possible, and secure the one-third interest in the mine without cost to themselves, except the use of their money. We think that, where the agreement is silent as to interest, and where the creditor secures the property of the debtor under such circumstances, no interest should be allowed; especially where, as in this case, in addition to paying the indebtedness out of the property, and all advances made thereon, the creditor is to retain an interest in the property in consideration of the use of the money advanced.

The court has found that the defendant, in fraud of the rights of the plaintiff, and without the knowledge of the latter, sold and conveyed the property, and delivered possession thereof, for a valuable consideration, to an innocent purchaser; that the plaintiff frequently requested the defendant for information as to the costs and disbursements, and the income from the mine, and demanded an accounting thereof, but that the defendant, without notifying the plaintiff of any intention to claim the property as his own, always made evasive replies, always postponed, and never made any accounting as requested. Under these circumstances he was not entitled to any interest on his account, and the plaintiff was entitled to compound interest after the date of the sale of the mine by defendant. Hollinshead v. Simms, 51 Cal. 163; Tyler v. Granger, 48 Cal. 259; Tirrell v. Jones, supra. It is a general rule that where the omission of the trustee is due to simple negligence, without any actual intent to cheat or defraud, simple interest alone is allowed the cestui que trust on the trust funds; but if the omission is willful, compound interest is allowed. Tiff. & B. Trust, 593; Lathrop v. Smalley, 23 N. J. Eq. 192; State v. Howarth, 48 Conn. 207.

We have fully considered the other points made upon this appeal, and find nothing in any of them warranting a reversal of the judgment. Judgment and order are therefore affirmed.

(No. 11,609.)

RIGHTS OF MORTGAGEE—FIXTURES.

1. Under Civil Code Cal. § 2929, providing that "no person whose interest is subject to the lien of a mortgage may do any act which will substantially impair the mortgagee's security," a complaint alleging that one of defendants had executed a mortgage on certain realty to plaintiff; that defendants detached and removed certain permanent fixtures, thereby impairing plaintiff's security, which they well knew; that plaintiff thereafter foreclosed and failed to realize the amount of his mortgage claim; that defendant mortgagor was insolvent; and that a personal judgment for the deficiency was entered and remained unsatisfied,—states a cause of action.

2. Under Civil Code Cal. §§ 658, 660, providing that real property embraces land and that which is affixed thereto, and that a thing is deemed to be affixed to land when it is permanently attached, "as by means of cement, plaster, nails, bolts, or screws," soap-kettles, candle-machines, a gun-metal digester, and a high-pressure boiler, which are permanently attached to the realty by bolts, and to each other by pipes, and which were placed in the building to be used in manufacturing, for which the premises were used, are fixtures.

3. Under Civil Code Cal. § 2926, providing that a mortgage is a "lien upon everything that would pass by a grant of the property," and a clause of the mortgage, providing that "all boilers, engines, and fixed machinery shall be deemed to be included in said property," such fixtures were covered by the mortgage lien in the absence of evidence aliunde to the contrary.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. F. Sullivan, Judge.

Daniel Titus and Mastick, Belcher & Mastick, for appellants. T. C. Coogan and Freeman, Johnson & Bates, for respondent.

Gibson, C. Action on the case for damages suffered by the impairment of a mortgage security. Judgment for plaintiff, from which, and an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. The complaint shows that the plaintiff had from the Mege Pacific Commercial Company, one of the defendants, a properly executed and recorded mortgage upon the realty therein described; that the other defendant, knowing this fact, with the said mortgagor, dug up, detached, and removed certain fixtures, permanently attached to the realty, well knowing that such severance and removal would impair and render insufficient plaintiff's security, and by such acts it was rendered insufficient; that said mortgagor was at the time insolvent, and has since so remained; that thereafter plaintiff foreclosed his mortgage and failed to realize sufficient to satisfy his claim; that a personal judgment for the deficiency was entered and remains unsatisfied. These facts are amply sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and the demurrers were properly overruled.

The Civil Code (section 2929) provides that "No person whose interest is subject to the lien of a mortgage may do any act which will substantially impair the mortgagee's security." The converse of this rule was declared in Hill v. Gwin, 51 Cal. 47, in which it was held that a mortgagor was answerable in damages for the removal, prior to foreclosure, of fixtures attached to the mortgaged property. "In New York, a mortgagee may have an action on the case against the mortgagor for an injury to the mortgage security." 2 Wash. Real Prop. 141, and the leading case of Van Pelt v. McGraw, 4 N. Y. 110, there cited. That case was approved by this court in support of the same principle, in the case of Robinson v. Russell, 24 Cal. 467. That was a suit by a mortgagee in possession for an injunction to restrain the defendants from removing from the premises mortgaged certain trees and vines, and a steam-engine and pump erected to irrigate the land, and to prevent one of the defendants from paying over to his co-defendants certain money in his hands, representing fruit sold from the premises. It was found by the trial court that the defendants had not removed, and did not intend removing, from the premises anything besides the growing fruit, nursery trees, and vines, which had been attached by the sheriff at the suit of some of the defendants. Defendants had judgment, which was affirmed, for the reasons that the injuries resulting from such acts were not irreparable, and it did not appear but what adequate damages for the trespass could be recovered against the defendants, as it was not shown that they were insolvent. The court said: "There can be no doubt but that an action can be maintained by the mortgagee for injuries of the character set forth in the complaint in this case when it appears that by the acts complained of the mortgage security is impaired. This is clearly shown in Yates v. Joyce, 11 Johns. 136; Lane v. Hitchcock, 14 Johns. 213, and Gardner v. Heartt, 3 Denio, 232, cited by the appellants' counsel, and more fully in Van Pelt v. McGraw, 4 N. Y. 110. But all those were actions on the case for the wrongful and fraudulent injury committed upon the premises, whereby the mortgagee's security was impaired. There can be as little doubt that the mortgagee may, by injunction, stay the commission of waste upon the mortgaged premises when he makes a proper case in equity and shows that the commission of the threatened acts will materially impair the value of the property subject to the lien, so as to render it an inadequate security for the mortgage debt." Thus it appears that the mortgagee has concurrent remedies by an action at law for damages, or by suit in equity for an injunction to prevent threatened damages. This seems reasonable under a system like ours, where nothing but a lien passes to the mortgagee, which would not enable him to maintain replevin for fixtures severed from the freehold, as could be done at common law where the legal title passed to the mortgagee. The removal of the fixtures complained of in this case deprived the mortgagee of his lien thereon, (Buckout v. Swift, 27 Cal. 433,) and before he could resort to other property of the mortgagor it was incumbent upon him to exhaust his mortgage security, (Code Civil Proc. § 726; Ould v. Stoddard, 54 Cal. 613; Bartlett v. Cottle, 63 Cal. 366; Mascarel v. Raffour, 51 Cal. 242.) This he did do, and found it insufficient by reason of the wrongful removal of some of the fixtures, and his personal judgment against the mortgagor of little worth on account of its insolvency.

The findings substantially show that on and prior to the 20th day of November, 1882, the plaintiff was the owner of certain real property in South San Francisco, with the building thereon, and certain machinery and fixtures therein, viz.,—1 gun-metal digester, 2 soap-kettles, 1 high-pressure boiler, and 13 candle-machines, each and all of which were permanently affixed to the realty, and formed a part thereof. There were on that date certain other fixtures in the building that had been detached and severed therefrom, and which were not included in or subject to the mortgage executed on the same date and hereinafter mentioned. All of these appliances were adapted to the manufacture of soap and candles, and were by the plaintiff put in, and together with the premises, were used by him for such purpose. On the 22d day of August, 1882, he leased the premises to one Easterbrook for 90 days from said date, with the knowledge that the lessee intended to manufacture oleomargarine and stearine on the premises, if the lessee should determine that such business could be conducted at a profit, in which event he (the lessee) intended to form a corporation to carry on such business on the premises and place thereon machinery suitable for the purpose. Thereafter the defendant corporation, the Mege Pacific Commercial Company, was formed, and on the 20th of November, 1882, purchased the premises and fixtures of the plaintiff for the sum of $25,000, of which sum it paid $10,000, and gave its promissory note for the remainder, and on the same date, to secure the payment of the note, executed and delivered to plaintiff a mortgage on the same premises. This mortgage was on the 23d day of the same month duly recorded. After the execution of the mortgage, Easterbrook and the mortgagor, at an expense of about $9,386.86, placed on the property certain machinery and appliances, only adapted for manufacturing oleomargarine and stearine, which, on the suspension of the business, became and remained useless, and did not add anything to the salable value of the mortgaged premises. None of these appliances so put in by the mortgagor were intended to be or were received by the plaintiff as security for the promissory note in place of the fixtures which were covered by the mortgage. Prior to the 13th day of April, 1884, the mortgagor became insolvent, and, finding its business unprofitable, suspended the same permanently, and about said date sold to its co-defendant, the Standard Soap Company, the gun-metal digester, 2 soap-kettles, 1 high-pressure boiler and mountings, and 13 candle-machines, together with other fixtures not attached to nor a part of the realty, nor subject to the mortgage lien. The Standard Soap Company thereupon dug up, detached, and removed from the premises, without the consent of plaintiff, the said digester, soap-kettles, boiler, and candle-machines. These articles, at the time of their removal, were of the aggregate value of $4,950, to which extent plaintiff's mortgage security was permanently decreased by such removal. Both defendants knew at the time of the removal that the articles were subject to the mortgage lien, and that the removal of them would impair and render insufficient the mortgage security of plaintiff, which, prior and up to the time of the removal was of the value of $25,000. Plaintiff, after the removal of the articles, foreclosed his mortgage, and caused the property to be sold on execution, and the proceeds realized therefrom failed to the extent of $9,947.50 to satisfy his claim. For this deficiency a personal judgment was entered against the Mege Pacific Commercial Company, which still remains insolvent.

The principal question raised by the appellant is whether the articles for the value of which the court below gave judgment were affixed to the realty and were covered by the mortgage lien. Real property, as defined by the Civil Code, (section 658,) is land and that which is affixed thereto; and "a thing is deemed to be affixed to land when it is attached to it by roots, as in the case of trees, vines, or shrubs; or imbedded in it, as in the case of walls; or permanently resting upon it, as in the case of buildings; or permanently attached to what is thus permanent, as by means of cement, plaster, nails, bolts, or screws." Id. § 660. In order to determine whether a thing is a fixture or not, we must look at the manner in which it is annexed, the intention of the person who made the annexation, and the purpose for which the premises are used. Fratt v. Whittier, 58 Cal. 126; 1 Jones, Mortg. §§ 429, 444. The fixtures here consisted of a digester made of gun-metal, 2 soap-kettles, 1 high-pressure boiler, and 13 candle-machines The digester was 20 feet long and 40 inches in diameter. It was 4 or 5 feet under the ground below the basement floor, and extended up through this floor and about 3 feet above the next floor. There was a brick wall 4 inches thick surrounding it and extending up to the second floor. The digester contained a pump, and was connected by steam-pipes with the high-pressure boiler. The soap-kettles were large, each having a capacity of 50,000 pounds. They were attached to heavy brick walls, extending about 5 feet above the basement floor, by sheet-iron bolted thereto, and were also connected by steam-pipes with the boiler. The high-pressure boiler was 16 feet long and 3 feet in diameter, and was connected with two other boilers by a brick wall and steam-pipes and a heavy cast-iron front piece. It rested on a brick foundation, and was all inclosed, except the front, with brick walls, which formed a nest. The sides of this nest were bolted together with iron bolts three-fourths of an inch in diameter, extending through from one side to the other, and were fastened with nuts. On one side they ran through the timbers that supported the building, and on the other side through iron braces. The candle-machines were on the third floor of the building, and were nailed to scantlings, which were in turn fastened to the floor. They contained perforated steam-pipes, and were attached to the boilers by steam-pipes. All these appliances were of a permanent character, and were put into and attached to the building by the plaintiff with the intention of using them for the making of soap and candles, for which purpose the premises were used and solely appropriated by him prior to his lease thereof to Easterbrook, and the subsequent transfer of the property in November of the same year to the Mege Pacific Commercial Company. Thus it is clear, considering the character of the appliances, the manner in and the intention with which they were affixed to the land and building, and their necessity for the uses to which the premises were devoted, that they were fixtures, and formed part of the realty within the meaning of the provisions of the Civil Code; and as the court has found upon evidence that is not without conflict that they were all in position and undetached at the time the mortgage was executed, we cannot disturb the finding. The mortgage contains this clause: "All boilers, engines, and fixed machinery shall be deemed to be included in said property." As the fixtures in dispute were part of the realty, they passed with the grant of the property to the Mege Pacific Commercial Company, and became subject to the lien of the mortgage that was given back to plaintiff, which created "a lien upon everything that would pass by a grant of the property." Civil Code, § 2926. Therefore the words quoted, in the absence of evidence aliunde, cannot be construed to restrict the operation of the mortgage to the land and building alone. Allen v. Woodard, 125 Mass. 400.

There was a bill of sale of "all the machinery, boilers, pipes, shafting, belting, candle-moulds, presses, wheels, pulleys, barrels, tubs, tallow, and any and all other personal property" on the premises, given to the Mege Pacific Commercial Company with the deed of the premises. This, together with certain parol evidence, was adduced by defendants to show that at the time the sale of the premises and fixtures was consummated all the parties thereto understood all the appliances on the premises, whether detached or not, to be personal property, and that the bill of sale was given as evidence of the sale thereof, and the mortgage, being a mortgage of real property, was not intended to, and did not, include them. But the trial court, in finding that the articles for which damages were awarded were part and parcel of the realty, and were covered by the mortgage, which finding, as before remarked, cannot be disturbed, must have concluded that the bill of sale, if it had any operation at all, transferred only the fixtures that, at the time, were severed from the premises, and that the deed carried the undetached fixtures as part of the realty. Looking at the entire record, we perceive no error, and therefore advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

SMITH v. SMITH. (No. 12,955.)

EJECTMENT—JOINDER OF ACTIONS—MORTGAGES—ADVERSE POSSESSION—EVIDENCE.

1. Under Code Civil Proc. Cal. §§ 427, 1048, providing that claims to recover specific real property may be united in the same complaint, and that two or more causes of action pending at the same time between the same parties, and in the same court, upon causes of action which might have been joined, may be consolidated, two actions of ejectment brought in the same court, at the same time, between the same parties, to recover separate tracts of land in the same county, are properly consolidated.

2. Whatever may be the exact nature of the interest which a partner takes under a deed of land to the firm, he takes a sufficient interest to enable him to maintain ejectment against a mere intruder.

3. Where the evidence in ejectment shows that the deed, absolute on its face, under which plaintiff claims, was in fact given to secure a debt, and is therefore merely a mortgage, he has failed to show either title or right of possession.

4. Defendant set up in his answer that the deed under which plaintiff claimed was only a mortgage, and that the debt had been fully paid; but he did not ask for any affirmative relief from the mortgage. Held, that the answer was in effect only a denial of plaintiff's title; that whether the debt had been paid or not was immaterial; and that plaintiff was not entitled to proceed first with the trial of the question as to whether the deed was a mortgage, on the ground of an equitable defense.

5. Defendant testified in support of his claim of adverse possession that plaintiff "told me to go on the place, and live on it, and make it my home, and he would give it to me for to stay there permanently." Also, that the arrangement was that he was to take some of plaintiff's sheep on the place, and take care of them on shares. He admitted that he afterwards agreed to take a lease from plaintiff if one could be made to suit him. During a portion of the time of his possession, he caused the land to be assessed to plaintiff. Defendant would not deny that he knew of an offer made by his wife during the time to purchase the land from plaintiff, or that he did not object thereto. Held, that the evidence failed to show adverse possession.

In bank. On rehearing. For former opinion, see 21 Pac. Rep. 4.

Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 427, provides that "the plaintiff may unite several causes of action in the same complaint where they all arise out of * * * claims to recover specific real property," and section 1048 provides that "whenever two or more actions are pending at one time between the same parties, and in the same court, upon causes of action which might have been joined, the court may order the actions to be consolidated."

PER CURIAM. A rehearing was granted in this case and the same has been reargued; but we adhere to our former decision, and adopt the former opinion of Commissioner HAYNE as the opinion of the court.

The judgment and order are reversed as to the N. W. ¼ of section 13, township 2 S., range 13 E., and the cause remanded for a new trial as to said property, and said judgment and order are, in all other respects, affirmed, the appellant to recover one-half of the costs on appeal.

WARD v. MATTHEWS. (No. 13,095.)

TRUSTS—TAX-TITLES TO TRUST-ESTATE—JUDGMENT.

1. Although a tax-title to land acquired by one who holds the legal title to the land in trust to secure the payment of a debt is also held in trust, yet where the debtor was in possession, claiming ownership, when the tax assessment was made, and failed to pay the taxes, he can only demand a conveyance of the trustee's interest on payment of the amount of the debt, taxes, costs, and interest.

2. Where a decree orders a conveyance to the debtor within a specified time, upon payment or tender of the specified amount, and the trustee appeals therefrom, a refusal by the latter to accept a tender made by the former within the time specified does not entitle the debtor to a commissioner's deed conveying a good title, as the decree is not final until the appeal is decided.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Butte county; P. O. HUNDLEY, Judge.

Gray & Sexton, for appellant. H. V. Reardan, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. C. The plaintiff brought an action of ejectment to recover possession of 320 acres of land. The case was tried upon the issues raised by the answer, and on the 12th day of June, 1885, the trial court found and adjudged that the plaintiff held the title to the demanded premises in trust to secure the payment by defendant to him of the sum of $1,192.93. It further adjudged "that said defendant pay to said plaintiff the said sum of eleven hundred and ninety-two and 93-100 dollars within twenty days from the date of this decree;" "that if payment or tender of payment is not made within the time herein specified, then this decree shall be null and void and of no effect, and judgment shall be entered for plaintiff as prayed for in his complaint;" "that upon payment or tender of payment by said defendant to said plaintiff within the time herein provided, then at the time of such payment or tender of payment said plaintiff shall execute and deliver to said defendant a good and sufficient deed of the premises in the complaint herein described;" "that if said plaintiff shall refuse and neglect to execute and deliver such deed for the space of one day after such payment or tender of payment, then the clerk of the superior court, * * * or his successor in office, is hereby constituted and appointed the commissioner of this court, with full power to make, execute, deliver, and have recorded such deed." The plaintiff moved for a new trial of the case. The defendant, on the twentieth day after the decree was rendered, tendered to the plaintiff the amount of money named in the decree, and demanded a deed of the premises, but the plaintiff refused to accept the money or make the deed. The defendant did not deposit the money, and never applied to the commissioner appointed by the court to execute a deed. Subsequently the plaintiff moved the court to enter judgment in his favor, on the ground that defendant had failed to comply with the terms of the decree. The court denied the motion for new trial and the motion for judgment, and the plaintiff appealed from both orders. Judgment affirming the orders appealed from was entered in this court on the 30th day of June, 1887, (73 Cal. 13, 14 Pac. Rep. 604,) and thereafter, on the 8th day of July, 1887, plaintiff tendered to defendant a deed of the premises, duly executed, conveying all the right, title, and interest which vested in and belonged to plaintiff on and prior to the 12th day of June, 1885, and demanded payment of the amount of money named in the decree, but defendant refused to accept the deed or pay the money. The deed was then left by plaintiff in the office of the clerk of the court. On the 17th day of January, 1889, the plaintiff again moved the court below that judgment be entered in his favor, on the ground that the defendant had failed and refused to pay to plaintiff the money, or any part thereof, which he was adjudged to pay, or to comply in any respect with the terms of the decree. The motion was made upon affidavits showing all of the foregoing facts. The defendant opposed the motion by a counter-affidavit, made by himself, in which he stated, among other things, that on the first Monday in March, 1885, the legal title to the land in controversy stood in the name of plaintiff, and that it became and was plaintiff's duty to return the property to the county assessor as his, and thereafter to pay and discharge all taxes levied against it for that year; that plaintiff failed and neglected to return the property to the assessor, and it was assessed to defendant; that the taxes became delinquent, and the land was sold therefor in February, 1886; that at the sale the plaintiff became the purchaser, and, there being no redemption, he, in the month of February, 1887, demanded and received from the tax collector a deed of the premises; that on the 13th day of May, 1887, plaintiff commenced another action, based upon his tax deed, to eject the defendant from the land, which action is still pending; that, in consequence of the said deed and action, defendant's right to the land became clouded and uncertain, and it was impossible for him to raise any money upon the land; that defendant is a poor man, and has no other means of complying with the decree, except by raising money on the land; that defendant is now, and has at all times been, ready to pay to plaintiff the money found to be due him, but the plaintiff has at all times refused to execute a deed conveying all his title to the land. Upon this showing the court denied the plaintiff's motion, and the appeal is from that order.

The motion seems to have been resisted and denied on the ground that the deed tendered by plaintiff did not include the interest acquired by him under the tax sale and deed. And in support of the ruling it is argued that, as plaintiff held the title in trust for defendant when the assessment was made and when the property was sold and the tax-deed executed, he took the tax-title also in trust, and was not entitled to the relief demanded until he offered to convey all the title which he then held. The argument appears to be sound, but, conceding it to be so, still, as the defendant was in possession of the property, claiming ownership, when the assessment was made, it was properly assessed to him, and it was his duty to pay the taxes when they became due. Reily v. Lancaster, 39 Cal. 357; Christy v. Fisher, 58 Cal. 259. He failed to perform this duty, and the plaintiff was, therefore, justified in buying in the property for his own protection, and has now a just claim for the repayment of the taxes and costs, with legal interest thereon. Plaintiff has also a just claim—and this is not questioned—for the payment of the amount found due him by the decree. This money he might and perhaps should have taken when it was tendered to him at the end of the 20 days, but he had a right to question the correctness of the decision by a motion for new trial and appeal, and the judgment was not final until the appeal was decided. And in this connection it was said on the former appeal, (73 Cal. 17, 14 Pac. Rep. 608:) "It will still be incumbent on the defendant to tender to and deposit the money with the commissioner named in the decree before he can obtain a deed to the land, which will divest the plaintiff's title thereto."

Evidently the defendant ought not to be permitted to retain both the land and money, and the plaintiff should have some means of securing his rights. In our opinion, the plaintiff ought to be permitted to renew his motion in the court below, and if he shall do so, and shall tender to defendant a good and sufficient deed, conveying all the interest he has in the property, upon payment by defendant of the sum directed by the decree to be paid by him, and also the amount paid by plaintiff for taxes and costs, with interest thereon, then, on failure of defendant to make such payment within a reasonable time, the relief asked for should be granted. The order here appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: Gibson, C.; Vanclief, C.

Carter v. Paige. (No. 12,637.)

Pleading—Judgment.

In pleading a judgment it is unnecessary, after alleging the giving and entry of the judgment, to allege further that said judgment was in full force, and not appealed from. Thornton, J., dissenting.

In bank. On rehearing. For former report, see 20 Pac. Rep. 729.

D. S. Terry, (Edward J. Pringle, of counsel,) for appellant. Stanton L. Carter, for respondent.

Beatty, C. J. In this cause there were so many motions and proceedings to dismiss the appeal, amend the record, etc., preliminary to the hearing on the merits, and so many printed arguments were filed by counsel, that the court cannot be severely blamed for having overlooked one of the additional and supplemental briefs filed on the part of the appellant. When the case was taken up for decision, we considered the single point made by appellant in his points and authorities, and pronounced the opinion reported in 20 Pac. Rep. 729. Our attention being called to the fact that we had neglected to notice a point made in a supplemental brief filed by appellant under leave of the court, a rehearing was granted in order that we might consider that point.

The suit is for damages for the malicious levy of an attachment by the defendant upon lands of the plaintiff. The complaint shows that the attachment suit was upon a promissory note not alleged to have been secured by mortgage or otherwise, and shows, consequently, that defendant had an undoubted right to an attachment, if there was anything due on the note. But it is alleged that the note had been paid before suit brought, and that the malice of defendant consisted in suing and attaching when he knew that his debt had been paid. It is clear from all the allegations of the complaint that the question of malice or no malice in issuing the attachment depended entirely upon the further question whether the defendant had a right of action,—whether, in other words, his note had been paid. This being so, defendant contends in support of his appeal from the judgment entered against him by default that the amended complaint is not sufficient to support the judgment, because, as he claims, it does not show that a final judgment was given or entered against him in the attachment suit before this action was commenced. The allegations of the complaint on this point are as follows: "That thereafter, to-wit, on the 8th day of December, 1880, said cause came on for trial in the said superior court of the county of Stanislaus, state of California, in which court said action was then duly pending, and upon said trial judgment was duly given, made, and entered in favor of this plaintiff, (the defendant therein,) and against this defendant, (the plaintiff therein,) which said judgment was duly entered and recorded in the judgment book of said court, in vol. 1, at pages 831 and 832, and no appeal was taken from said judgment within five days after the entry thereof, and no bond or undertaking was given to continue said attachment in force, and because and by reason thereof said attachment became and was dissolved and discharged by said judgment." It will be seen that here is an allegation that judgment was given and entered for the defendant in the attachment suit, (plaintiff here,) and that no appeal was taken therefrom within five days. Evidently the theory upon which the complaint was drawn was that a right of action for a malicious attachment accrued at least as soon as the attachment was dissolved, irrespective of the finality of the judgment, and that the attachment was finally dissolved by judgment for the defendant, unappealed from within five days. Code Civil Proc. § 946. We doubt the correctness of this theory, but we deem it unnecessary to decide upon it. We may concede for the purposes of our decision that the appellant is right in his contention that no cause of action could have accrued against him on account of the attachment in his suit against respondent until final judgment was given and entered against him therein, for we must hold that such final judgment is sufficiently alleged. It was not necessary, after alleging the giving and entry of the judgment, to allege further that it was in full force and effect, and not vacated, set aside, reversed, or appealed from. Such allegations are not uncommon where a judgment is pleaded, but they are not necessary. If the judgment has been appealed from, or set aside, or reversed, or is for any reason no longer in force, the allegation of that fact comes more properly from the party against whom it is pleaded. Campbell v. Cross, 39 Ind. 156, 157, and authorities there cited. The allegation that the judgment was not appealed from within five days cannot be held an admission that it had been appealed from after five days. It was clearly intended for no other purpose than to show a dissolution of the attachment on the theory above stated, and, with respect to the material fact of the finality of the judgment, must be treated as surplusage. We think the amended complaint was sufficient to sustain the judgment, and the judgment is affirmed.

Younglove v. Steinman et al. (No. 13,068.)

Injunction — Notice — Corporations — Assessments.

1. A notice of a motion to dissolve an injunction, given at the statutory time, is sufficient, though the court in which the motion is to be heard has no jurisdiction of the case at that time, where it has jurisdiction when the motion is made.

2. Though the notice states that the motion will be "based upon the papers, pleadings, and records in said cause, and upon affidavits hereafter to be filed," the court may hear evidence outside of that mentioned in the notice, if necessary.

3. Under Civil Code Cal. § 331, providing that the directors of a corporation may levy assessments "for the purpose of paying expenses, conducting business, or paying debts," an assessment to pay for the repair of an engine and other machinery necessary in conducting the corporation's business is valid.

4. A finding that a meeting of directors of a corporation was "duly and regularly convened," and that an assessment made thereat was "lawfully and rightfully" levied, includes a finding that the necessary notice was given.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county; John W. Armstrong, Judge.

L. N. Goldsby, for appellant. S. C. Denson and C. H. Oatman, for respondents.

Works, J. This is a suit to enjoin the enforcement of an assessment of the stock of a corporation on the grounds that the meeting of the board of directors, at which the assessment was ordered, was not legally called, and that the assessment was not made for any of the purposes allowed by law. There was a temporary injunction. The suit was commenced in the county of Santa Cruz, and subsequently transferred to the county of Sacramento. On the 13th of August, 1888, that being the day the order transferring the cause was made, the defendants gave notice that they would, on the 23d of the same month, move the superior court of Sacramento county to dissolve the injunction. At the time and place named in said notice, the attorney for the plaintiff appeared and objected to the hearing of the motion, on the ground that at the time the notice was served upon him the papers in the case had not been filed in that court. His objection was overruled, the motion heard, and the injunction dissolved. A trial was subsequently had which resulted in findings and a judgment in favor of the defendants. A motion by the plaintiff for a new trial was denied, and this appeal is from the order dissolving the temporary injunction, the final judgment, and the order denying a new trial.

The appellant contends that the notice of the motion to dissolve was not given in time, and that it was not effective, as a notice, for the reason that the court in which the motion was to be heard had no jurisdiction of the case at the time it was given. There is no force in either of these points. The notice was given for 10 days, which was sufficient as to the time. Code Civil Proc. § 1005. The mere giving of the notice was not a proceeding in court, and it was not necessary to its validity that the superior court of Sacramento county should have had jurisdiction of the case at that time. It was enough that it had jurisdiction when the motion was made.

The further point is made that the notice stated that the motion would be "based upon the papers, pleadings, and records in said cause, and upon affidavits hereafter to be filed," and that the court below erroneously admitted in evidence an answer filed by the defendants after the notice was given. There was no error in this ruling. The notice did not confine the defendants to the use, as evidence, of such pleadings, only, as were on file at the time it was given; but if it had, the court might in its discretion very properly hear evidence outside of that mentioned in the notice, if necessary to aid it in arriving at a proper determination of the question. There was no error in the order dissolving the injunction.

It is contended in support of the appeal from the judgment and order denying a new trial that the evidence shows that the meeting of the board of directors, at which the assessment was levied, was not a legal meeting, for the reason that no notice of the meeting was given. But the court below found that the meeting was "duly and regularly convened," and that the assessment was "lawfully and rightfully" levied. This included a finding that the necessary notice was given, and the finding is supported by sufficient evidence. The secretary testifies that written notices were sent to the directors of all of the meetings of the board, whether regular or special, and the plaintiff, who was himself one of the directors, admitted having received notices of some of the meetings, and declined to say that this meeting was not one of them. The minutes of the meeting proved the other facts necessary to show that the same was regularly and legally held, and that the levy of the assessment was properly made.

It is further contended that the levy of the assessment was not made for the purpose of "paying expenses, conducting business, or paying debts," as authorized by section 331 of the Civil Code. The evidence shows that the defendant corporation was an electric light company, and that the money to be raised by the assessment was necessary for the repair of its engine and other machinery, and that without such repairs the company would be unable to answer the demands upon it for the supply of electric lights. This brought the case clearly within the provisions of the statute. The judgment and orders appealed from are affirmed.

COUNTERFEITING—FOREIGN BANK-NOTES—INFORMATION—CONFLICT OF LAWS.

1. Pen. Code Cal. § 480, providing that "every person who makes, or knowingly has in his possession," anything employed "in counterfeiting bank-notes or bills, is punishable," applies to foreign as well as domestic bank-notes.

2. Under Pen. Code Cal. § 959, subd. 6, § 960, providing that an information is sufficient if the offense charged is set forth in such clear and distinct manner as to enable a person of common understanding to know what it is, and defendant is not prejudiced in any substantial right by the defect, an information for having possession of tools for counterfeiting notes of the "Bank of England" need not allege the incorporation of such bank.

3. Proof that the bank is known and acting as a corporate company, and as such issues bills which come within the statute, identifies the notes set out sufficiently to show that they were "bank-notes."

4. The state courts have jurisdiction of such offense, under the statute which is an exercise of the general police power of the state, though it is also punishable under a federal statute.

5. A charge in substance that to constitute the crime a mere possession and intention to use, though without ability to use, is sufficient, is proper.

C. B. Darwin, (Crittenden Thornton and F. H. Merzbach, of counsel,) for appellant. George A. Johnson, Atty. Gen., and Davis Louderback, for the People.

FOOTE, C. The defendant was charged by information, under section 480 of the Penal Code, with having knowingly, willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously in his possession a certain stamp, block, and plate, made use of in counterfeiting bank-notes, designed and engraved for the purpose of striking and printing counterfeit bank-notes, in the likeness and similitude of the genuine "five pound" notes of the "Bank of England;" such possession being had by him for the purpose of knowingly and feloniously counterfeiting such "bank-notes." His demurrer to the information on various grounds was overruled. He then pleaded not guilty, was tried, and convicted as charged. A motion for a new trial was made and refused, as also a motion in arrest of judgment. From the two orders made upon the motions mentioned, and the judgment of conviction, the defendant has appealed.

The jurisdiction of the trial court is assailed on the ground that the information did not present any offense against the laws of this state, in that the note set out, and which the plate was said to be intended to print, was not sufficiently averred to be a "bank-note;" that if it was a "bank-note" it was a foreign one, and not within the "bank-note" protected by the Penal Code of this state, in section 480 thereof; that if the note set out in the information, to quote the language of his brief, "did fall within the bank-note named in our state Code, yet the state had no jurisdiction herein, because the congress of the nation, by virtue of its international power, and in discharge of its international duty, had enacted a law for the protection of the very same bank-note, and denounced the very same plate, in the same terms, and with the same intent, and had therein submitted the jurisdiction to its own tribunals, and had made no reservation in favor of state courts; that, therefore, under the laws regulating judicial cognizance, the state court had no jurisdiction of the offense, even though she had denounced the same transaction in her Code." Section 480 of the Penal Code, under discussion, is as follows: "Every person who makes, or knowingly has in his possession any die, plate, or any apparatus, paper, metal, machine, or other thing whatever, made use of in counterfeiting coin current in this state, or in counterfeiting gold dust, gold or silver bars, bullion, lumps, pieces, or nuggets, or in counterfeiting bank notes or bills, is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison not less than one nor more than fourteen years; and all such dies, plates, apparatus, paper, metal, or machine, intended for the purpose aforesaid, must be destroyed." The suggestion is made that the legislature, when it used the words "bank notes or bills," did not mean to include any foreign bank notes or bills; and in support of this it is ingeniously and strenuously argued that such intention could not have existed on the part of the law-making body, or else it would have used more apt and certain language upon the subject, such as had been formerly employed in prior laws, and in the New York Code, upon which our Penal Code is modeled. However plausible the argument may be, we cannot suppose that the legislature intended by the comprehensive words "bank notes and bills" to mean less than all bank notes and bills, both foreign and domestic, current in this state or otherwise. To say to the contrary would be to declare, without proper foundation, that the legislative assembly of our state had deliberately made California an asylum for all those evil-disposed persons who might desire to injure the currency of foreign nations, or to defraud our own citizens by passing off upon or selling to them counterfeit bills of such nations. Without some more direct and positive declaration of legislative intent to that end than has been shown in the argument of appellant, we should be very much averse to the belief which he so much desires us to entertain in his behalf. Nor was it necessary that the information should have alleged the incorporation of the Bank of England. The fact of incorporation was not an element of the crime. People v. Ah Sam, 41 Cal. 652; People v. Henry, 19 Pac. Rep. 832; Pen. Code, § 959, subd. 6, § 960. "So, too, as a matter of identity, we think the description is satisfied by proof that the company is known as a corporate company, and is acting as such, and as such issues bills which come within the statute." People v. Ah Sam, supra.

A painstaking and lengthy argument is made that the federal courts have exclusive jurisdiction of this crime, since the enactment of section 711 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, which reads as follows: "The jurisdiction vested in the courts of the United States in the cases and proceedings hereinafter mentioned shall be exclusive of the courts of the several states—First, of all crimes and offenses cognizable under the authority of the United States." That provision of law was in existence when the supreme court of the United States, through Mr. Chief Justice WAITE, delivered its opinion in the case of U. S. v. Arjona, 120 U. S. 479-488, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 628. This was a case where the defendant had been indicted for the violation of sections 3 and 6 of the act of congress of May 16, 1884, c. 52, (23 St. 22,) "to prevent and punish the counterfeiting within the United States of notes, bonds, and other securities of foreign governments." The statute, among others, makes the following things criminal: Sec. 6. Having in possession "any plate, or any part thereof, from which has been printed or may be printed any counterfeit note, bond, obligation, or other security, in whole or in part, of any foreign government, bank, or corporation, except by lawful authority," etc. After holding that the law in question was constitutional, and that the offense is one which the United States government may denounce in the performance of a duty towards other nations, that tribunal observed: "A right secured by the law of nations to a nation or its people is one the United States, as the representative of this nation, are bound to protect. Consequently, a law which is necessary and proper to afford this protection is one that congress may enact, because it is one that is needed to carry into execution a power conferred by the constitution on the government of the United States exclusively. There is no authority in the United States to require the passage and enforcement of such a law by the states. Therefore the United States must have the power to pass it and enforce it themselves, or be unable to perform a duty which they may owe to another nation, and which the law of nations has imposed on them as part of their international obligations. This, however, does not prevent a state from providing for the punishment of the same thing; for here, as in the case of counterfeiting the coin of the United States, the act may be an offense against the authority of a state as well as that of the United States." Although the point did not arise, and was not made in that case, that the federal jurisdiction was supreme and exclusive, and a state could not provide for the punishment of the same thing as did the United States, yet the language of that court is directly decisive of and against the objection made here; and we should respect it as the opinion of the tribunal of last resort as to such matters, which must be the final and supreme arbiter as to the jurisdiction of federal courts. The language of the chief justice was evidently used for a purpose, to the end that a principle relative to the police powers of a state, which had been settled by the supreme court of the United States, over which he then most ably presided, in prior adjudications, should be still more firmly established,—that is, that for violation of the federal laws the federal courts alone have jurisdiction; but that such acts, although denounced by federal laws, and punishable under such laws in federal courts alone, may nevertheless be punished by state laws in state courts, where the punishment of such acts pertain to the police power of a state; that for such an act as here alleged to have been committed the federal law may punish, for the protection of foreign nations and their people, and the state law for the act as one which may result in a fraud upon its citizens, by passing upon them counterfeit bills of a foreign bank or corporation.

In Prigg v. Pennsylvania, 16 Pet. 625, in asserting the exclusive power of congress over the subject of fugitive slaves, Justice Story observes: "To guard, however, against any possible misconstruction of our views, it is proper to state, that we are by no means to be understood in any manner whatsoever to doubt or to interfere with the police power belonging to the states in virtue of their general sovereignty. That police power extends over all subjects within the territorial limits of the states, and has never been conceded to the United States."

In Eells v. People, 4 Scam. 512, Eells had been indicted under a statute of Illinois making it an offense to harbor and secrete a negro slave. The court said, by Mr. Justice Shields: "This (the state law) prescribes a rule of conduct for our own citizens. If the state can do this, and I hardly think the power questionable, it can punish those who violate the rule. If a state has power to regulate its own affairs, it has the power to define offenses and punish offenders." "It is also said that this law may punish a man twice for the same offense. There is no force whatsoever in this objection. The offenses are separate and distinct,—violations of distinct and different laws,—and the punishment inflicted by different sovereignties." Id. 514. This case was afterwards affirmed in Moore v. People, 14 How. 19, by the supreme court of the United States, where it was said: "But, admitting that the plaintiff in error may be liable to an action under the act of congress for the same acts of harboring and preventing the owner from retaking his slave, it does not follow that he would be twice punished for the same offense. * * * The same act may be an offense or transgression of the laws of both," (state and United States,) for which, as afterwards said, the offender may be justly punishable. It was there, in addition, said: "The power to make municipal regulations for the restraint and punishment of crime, for the preservation of the health and morals of her citizens and of the public peace, has never been surrendered by the states or restrained by the constitution of the United States." Page 18.

In the case of U. S. v. Marigold, 9 How. 569, Mr. Justice Daniel, speaking for the court, says: "This court, in the case of Fox v. Ohio, 5 How. 432, have taken care to point out that the same act might, as to its character and tendencies, and the consequences it involved, constitute an offense against both the state and federal governments, and might draw to its commission the penalties denounced by either, as appropriate to its character in reference to each."

In the case of U. S. v. Cruikshank, 92 U. S. 542, Mr. Chief Justice Waite, in discussing the subject of citizenship of the state and of the United States, disposes of the question in a statement, as we think, clear to demonstration: "The people of the United States resident within any state are subject to two governments, one state and the other national; but there need be no conflict between the two. The powers which one possesses the other does not. They are established for different purposes, and have separate jurisdictions. Together they make one whole, and furnish the people of the United States with a complete government, ample for the protection of all their rights, at home and abroad. True, it may sometimes happen that a person is amenable to both jurisdictions for one and the same act. Thus, if a marshal of the United States is unlawfully resisted while executing the process of the courts within a state, and the resistance is accompanied by an assault on the officer, the sovereignty of the United States is violated by the resistance, and that of the state by the breach of peace, in the assault. So, too, if one passes counterfeited coin of the United States within a state, it may be an offense against the United States and the state; the United States, because it discredits the coin, and the state, because of the fraud upon him to whom it is passed. This does not, however, necessarily imply that the two governments possess powers in common, or bring them into conflict with each other. It is the natural consequence of a citizenship which owes allegiance to two sovereignties, and claims protection from both. The citizen cannot complain, because he has voluntarily submitted himself to such a form of government. He owes allegiance to the two departments, so to speak, and within their respective spheres must pay the penalties which each exacts for disobedience to its laws. In return he can demand protection from each within its own jurisdiction."

The defendant here is not sought to be punished under any federal statute, as such. He has been tried and convicted in a state court, under a state law, having for its object the prevention of the passing to her citizens fraudulently, and to their damage, of counterfeit bank-notes of a foreign bank. The state is not inhibited from passing laws to punish an act which may result in fraudulent imposition upon its citizens, because the federal government has the exclusive right to punish for an infraction of its laws made in consequence of a duty it owes under the law of nations. The act is the same for which the person is punished, but the laws are different and for a different purpose. The state could not punish for an infraction of the federal statute, but can do so as to its own statutes, when the object is to exercise the police power which appertains to it under the constitution of the United States. This is not an attempted nullification of a federal statute, or an effort to enforce it in a state court; it is a law to prevent frauds upon the citizens of the state, and has nothing to do with the purpose or enforcement of the federal law.

It is also pressed upon our consideration that the charge of the court in reference to what constituted possession of the plate or block, in order to bring the defendant's act within the denunciation of the statute, was erroneous. It is claimed that the decision of the appellate court in the Case of Ah Sam, supra, which was given to the jury by the court as part of its charge upon the question of possession, was not applicable to the case in hand; that it went only to the point of declaring that an intention to use such a block was enough without a potential intention, and that it was not a decision on the meaning of the word "possession," as used in section 480 of the Penal Code. There is no clearer or better way that occurs to us by which this argument may be successfully refuted than to quote here the language of Justice TEMPLE in that case, (41 Cal. 654,) in which the facts relating to the guilty possession were in all essential features similar to those in the case at bar, all italicized words being our own: "There is but one other question in this case which we think it worth while to notice. That arises upon this state of facts, as appears from the bill of exceptions: The blanks, the possession of which is charged in the indictment, were printed by one Baker, who, before printing them, revealed the matter to the city police, and had an arrangement with them by which the police should be in ambush, ready to seize the defendants and the blanks immediately after they had been handed to them by Baker. Baker had from the police assurances that the blanks would be paid for, and without such assurances he would not have printed them. The ambush was laid according to the arrangement, and upon a signal being given by Baker, according to an understanding between him and the police, the latter appeared and seized Ah Sam and Ah Tuck, and took from them the impressions soon after they had come into their hands. It is claimed that the defendants never had such a possession of the blanks as is contemplated by the statute; that they were printed for the police, under a contract with them, and were really delivered to them according to contract, and were the property of the police; that the mere handing of them to the defendants, to be immediately taken away by the real owners, was no more than laying them upon a counter for them to take; they were given to the defendants at the request of the police, and remained, during all the time they were in defendants' hands, completely under the control of the police; that the defendants did not have them as their property, and, during the time they held them, could not have intended to pass them; that they must have had the ability to commit the offense, as well as the intention, and that ability they never had any more than they would have when immured in a dungeon; that the intention meant by the statute is potential, and not a mere desire which there are no means to effectuate, and which does not, and cannot, result in any act; that Baker and the police never parted with the possession of the blanks, but determined not to do so, and all the time supervised the handling of them by the defendants. The police laws cannot be tested by any such metaphysical niceties as these. The problem proposed is similar, if not the same, as that which has baffled the best intellects of the world of all ages, in attempting to reconcile the fore-knowledge and providence of divinity with the freedom and the moral responsibility of man. The law adopts the theory of responsibility of man, notwithstanding the controlling supervision of Providence. The defendants were not under duress, nor compelled by the police, prior to the arrest, to do anything whatever. They contracted with Baker for the blanks as freely and as completely as though the authorities had not permitted him to do so. They had absolute control of their own actions when they received the blanks, and up to the very time they were arrested. The knowledge or intention of the police did not interfere with their freedom prior to that time. They had the ability to commit the crime as fully as they would have had if the police had arrested them at the same time, without any understanding with Baker, and upon mere suspicion. * * * To constitute the crime, the law only requires the guilty possession. * * * Although Ah Sam was a mere messenger, he was properly convicted if he knew the purposes for which the blanks were designed."

We conclude that the possession of the defendant, under the facts of this case, was a guilty possession, and the instructions of the court were in accordance with law. Perceiving no prejudicial error in the record, we advise that the judgment and orders be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and orders are affirmed.

NEW TRIAL—SURPRISE.

Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 473, provides that a party may be relieved from a "judgment taken against him through his mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect." Held, that where it appears that there was a misunderstanding between the attorneys for the respective parties regarding the day set for trial, which caused one of the attorneys to omit making preparations for trial on that day, a new trial should be granted. MCFARLAND, J., dissenting.

In bank. On rehearing. For former report, see 20 Pac. Rep. 859.

Ejectment by William Symons against E. F. Bunnell and Joseph Clark. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants' motion for new trial denied, and they appeal. Section 473, Code Civil Proc. Cal., cited in the opinion, provides, inter alia, that a party may be relieved from a "judgment taken against him through his mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect."

I. M. Kalloch and Warren Olney, (M. G. Cobb and Theodore Bradley, of counsel,) for appellants. F. D. & G. W. Nicol, (P. W. Bennett, of counsel,) for respondent.

THORNTON, J. Action of ejectment to recover possession of two mining claims, situate in the county of Tuolumne. Judgment for plaintiff. Motion for new trial by defendants, which was denied. Appeal by defendants from the judgment and order denying a new trial. The affidavits, used on the hearing of the motion for a new trial, are identified by the certificate of the judge as having been so used. The notice of intention to move for a new trial was served and filed in time. There was no notice of the decision of the court given defendants. As they had a right to wait until such notice was given before commencing proceedings to procure a new trial, the notice of intention given before such motion was in time. We think it evident that there was a misunderstanding between Gardiner, the attorney for defendants, and F. D. Nicol, one of the attorneys for plaintiff, in regard to the day when the cause would be tried, which caused Gardiner to omit making preparations for the trial of this cause on the 15th of July, 1887. That misunderstanding arose in this way: On the 1st day of July, 1887, the cause was set down to be heard on the 15th of the same month. On the same day Gardiner wrote from Tuolumne county to defendant Clark, who resided in San Francisco, informing him that the cause was set for trial on the day above named. On the 4th of July following, Clark, in the city of San Francisco, wrote Gardiner in regard to the case as follows: "In respect to Symons' case, Mr. Nicol and myself agreed that it should not be taken up for trial until the last week in July or first week in August. He said that he could not get ready to try it until then. I saw him here last week." The Nicol mentioned in the letter was and is one of the attorneys of plaintiff herein. The above letter from Clark was received by Gardiner in Tuolumne county on the 6th of July, 1887. Soon after Gardiner received this letter from Clark he met Mr. Nicol and said to him: "I have just received a letter from Clark,"—to which Nicol replied: "Yes; I have just seen him in San Francisco; that is all right." From this Gardiner concluded, and was justified in concluding, that Nicol had seen Clark, and that the agreement mentioned in Clark's letter that the trial should take place during the last week in July or the first week in August had been made between them. Clark deposes that such an agreement had been made, between him and Nicol, while Nicol denies it; but Nicol does not deny that the conversation above detailed did occur between him and Gardiner. Nothing stated by Nicol in his affidavit is inconsistent with or contradictory of what Gardiner deposed as regards this conversation. We are convinced from the foregoing that Gardiner was misled by the conversation had with Nicol into the belief that the trial would not take place until the last week in July, or first week in August, and therefore did not make preparation to try the cause. It seems that his co-defendant had left to Clark the preparation of the cause for trial, and, as Clark heard nothing to the contrary of what he had written to Gardiner in regard to his agreement with Nicol, he supposed that the agreement would be carried out, and therefore he (Clark) took no steps to get ready for trial on the 15th of July, 1887. When the cause was called for trial on the 15th of July, Gardiner asked for a continuance, and subsequently moved to set aside the judgment, and for a new trial; all of which were refused. The above-stated facts came out on the motion for a new trial. The defendants, on the motion to vacate the judgment and for a new trial, presented the affidavit of merits required by law.

The judgment in this case was procured against defendants under circumstances which entitled them to be relieved from it. The evidence shows that the neglect of defendants, on account of which the judgment lien went against them, was excusable. The court below should therefore have granted them a new trial, and it erred in refusing it. Code Civil Proc. § 473. The judgment and order are therefore reversed, and the cause remanded, that it may be again tried. So ordered.

PERKINS v. BROCK et al. (No. 12,625.)

ASSIGNMENT FOR BENEFIT OF CREDITORS—ACTIONS BY ASSIGNEE.

1. In an action by the assignee of an insolvent partnership to recover property alleged to have been transferred in fraud of creditors, allegations in the same count—that the firm transferred the property, and that it was made by one partner without the knowledge or consent of the other—are inconsistent under Civil Code Cal. § 2430, which provides that one partner has no authority as such to assign partnership property.

2. An answer which affirmatively avers the transfer by the firm, without denying the allegation of want of authority, is inconsistent with such allegation, and raises an issue.

Rearden & Freer, for appellant. Gray & Sexton, for respondents.

HAYNE, C. Action by the assignee of an insolvent partnership to recover certain personal property alleged to have been transferred in fraud of creditors. Judgment passed for the defendants, and the plaintiff appeals. The findings negative the charges of fraud; and as the evidence is not brought up, the findings must be taken to be true.

The main contention of the appellant is that the transfer was void for want of authority in the person who made it. The only difficulty arises from inattention to a few simple rules of pleading. The plaintiff began by placing inconsistent allegations in the same count of his complaint. He alleged, first, that the firm transferred the property; and then that the transfer was made by one partner without the consent or knowledge of the other, and was of the whole property of the firm. These allegations are inconsistent, because one partner has no power or authority to make such a transfer, except in certain contingencies, which do not arise here. Civil Code, § 2430. The first allegation cannot, in favor of the plaintiff, be construed as a mere conclusion; because the rule is that pleadings are to be construed most strongly against the pleader; nor, for the same reason, will the complaint be construed as alleging that the transfer was in the name of the firm, and purported to be by its authority, but was void for want of authority; though, even if this latter construction were adopted, it would not change the conclusion which we have reached. The two allegations are inconsistent. If the person making the transfer had no authority to bind the firm, it follows that the firm did not make the transfer.

The defendants did not deny the allegation showing a want of authority, but averred affirmatively that the firm transferred the property; and it is now contended for the plaintiff that the pleadings admitted the want of authority to transfer, and that the finding to the contrary is against such admission, and must, therefore, be disregarded. It seems plain that if a complaint first alleges a fact, and then, in the same count, alleges the contrary, (the latter allegation not being of mere evidence,) and the defendant does not choose to demur specially for uncertainty, (see Blasingame v. Insurance Co., 75 Cal. 636, 17 Pac. Rep. 925,) it is sufficient to deny the statement which he wishes to controvert, leaving the other unnoticed. In such cases the denial of one statement would be construed as an affirmation of the other. If, therefore, the defendants had denied the allegation showing a want of authority, there would have been no difficulty. They did not deny it, but averred affirmatively the truth of the inconsistent allegation; and the question is whether this raised an issue. It is not essential that a traverse should be expressed in negative words. An averment in the answer of the contrary of what is alleged in the complaint, has been held to be equivalent to a denial. Miller v. Brigham, 50 Cal. 615; McDonald v. Davidson, 30 Cal. 174; Thompson v. Lynch, 29 Cal. 189. If, therefore, the averment had been of the direct contrary of the allegation, showing the want of power, the averment would have raised an issue. It was not of the direct contrary, but was inconsistent with the truth of said allegation. This mode of pleading is not to be commended, because it savors of argument; but, under the circumstances, we think that it may be held to raise an issue. The alternative is to say that the answer admits that the transfer was invalid,—or, in other words, that it admits that the firm did not transfer the property, when it expressly averred that the firm did transfer it. And, in view of the fact that the first fault was committed by the plaintiff, and that, so far as appears, he took no proceeding in the trial court to test the sufficiency of the answer, this seems to be too great a degree of strictness. The finding negatived the allegation showing the invalidity of the transfer; and we think that this finding must be held to be within the issues. We therefore advise that the judgment be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons expressed in the foregoing opinion the judgment is affirmed.

MILLER et al. v. LUCO. (No. 12,921.)

QUIETING TITLE—PLEADING—EVIDENCE—NONSUIT—FINDINGS.

1. It is not ground for demurrer that plaintiff's legal capacity to sue does not appear in the complaint.

2. In a complaint alleging a certain person's death, and that he left a will which was duly probated in a court of competent jurisdiction, an allegation of the due execution of such will is unnecessary.

3. In an action to quiet title, it is sufficient to describe the land as a certain lot, part of a larger tract containing a certain number of acres, where the tract has been partitioned by commissioners, and the said lot described in their report and awarded to the estate of plaintiffs' testator.

4. Where defendant relies upon title in himself, his cross-complaint may be stricken out.

5. A motion for nonsuit on the ground that "plaintiffs had failed to prove a sufficient case," is properly denied as not stating the grounds relied on sufficiently.

6. It appeared that defendant conveyed all his interest in a certain tract of land to plaintiffs' decedent; that thereafter the land in suit was set apart to plaintiffs' decedent in a suit for partition brought by defendant; that decedent left a will, whereby his whole estate was to be divided between his two sisters; that one of the sisters died after the testator; that plaintiffs are the special administrator, the surviving sister and her husband, and the children of the deceased sister, and the husband of one of them; and that the will was duly probated in another state, and the special administrator appointed in California. Held, that a judgment for plaintiffs was warranted, and it was unnecessary for plaintiffs to prove that the deceased sister's children succeeded to her interest, or that defendant held adversely, or that plaintiffs were in possession.

7. The facts that the land was sold for taxes, and that defendant obtained a tax-deed therefor after the trial and before judgment, do not constitute newly-discovered evidence warranting a new trial.

8. Under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 385, providing that in case of transfer of interest an action may be continued in the name of the original party, a conveyance by plaintiffs pendente lite of the land in suit is no ground for new trial, though not known to defendants until after the trial.

9. In such action, a sheriff's deed, reciting a judgment and execution against the administrator of plaintiffs' decedent, and the sale of his interest in the land, is inadmissible.

10. Findings of probative facts are sufficient, where the material, ultimate facts result necessarily therefrom.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county; HENRY M. WILLIS, Judge.

Action by John H. Miller, special administrator of the estate of Thomas T. Bouldin, jointly with the heirs and legatees of said decedent, against Juan M. Luco, to quiet title to lands. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals.

H. S. Mulford, for appellant. Hunsaker, Britt & Lamme and Patterson, Sprigg & Cassius Carter, for respondents.

BELCHER, C. C. This is an action to quiet the plaintiffs' title to land in San Diego county. The land is alleged to belong to the estate of Thomas T. Bouldin, deceased, and the plaintiff Miller sues as special administrator of the estate, and the other plaintiffs as legatees and heirs of deceased. Defendant demurred to the complaint on the ground that Miller had not legal capacity to sue; that the alleged heirs were improperly joined with the special administrator; that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action; and that the complaint was uncertain and ambiguous in that it did not show the respective interests of the plaintiffs, nor sufficiently describe the property, their title to which they sought to have quieted. The demurrer was overruled, and the defendant answered. By his answer he denied, among other things, that Bouldin, at the time of his death, or at any time during his life, owned or possessed the land in controversy, or any part thereof, in fee-simple absolute, but admitted that he held an equitable title to the same. It was then, for further answer, and by way of cross-complaint, alleged that defendant was the owner, seised in fee, in the possession, and entitled to the possession, of all the lands described in the complaint, and that the plaintiffs had not, nor had any of them, any estate, right, title, or interest therein; and the prayer was that defendant's title to the lands be quieted as against the plaintiffs. On motion of plaintiffs the cross-complaint was stricken out. The case was then tried, and judgment given for plaintiffs, from which, and from an order denying him a new trial, defendant appealed.

1. It is claimed for appellant that the court erred in not sustaining his demurrer, but we think the ruling proper. The averment relating to the appointment of Miller as special administrator is as follows: "That by an order of the superior court in and for the city and county of San Francisco, state of California, (department 9,) John H. Miller, one of the plaintiffs herein, was duly appointed and constituted special administrator of the estate of Thomas T. Bouldin, deceased, on the 15th day of June, 1887, and by such order he was especially authorized and empowered to institute and defend all proceedings, actions at law, and suits in equity as shall be necessary and proper to recover possession of any of said estate claimed or held adversely by others; that on the 15th day of June, 1887, he took the oath and filed the bond required by law as special administrator of said estate, and his said letters to him issued as aforesaid are in full force and effect, and have not been revoked." It certainly does not appear from this averment, or on the face of the complaint, that Miller had not the legal capacity to sue. The most that can be said is that it does not sufficiently appear that he had such capacity. But "it is not a good ground for demurrer that it does not appear in the complaint that the plaintiff has the legal capacity to sue. That omission can only be taken advantage of by answer." District No. 110 v. Feck, 60 Cal. 405.

The objection that there was a misjoinder of parties plaintiff is met by section 1452 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which expressly provides that "the heirs or devisees may themselves, or jointly with the executor or administrator, maintain an action for the possession of the real estate, or for the purpose of quieting title to the same," etc.

It is alleged in the complaint that Bouldin died in the city of San Francisco in the month of April, 1873, and "that he left a will, which was duly admitted to probate in the county of Charlotte, in the state of Virginia, by the county court of said county, (the same having jurisdiction to probate said will,) in the month of May, 1873." The objection is that the complaint is insufficient "because it does not allege a due execution of the said will of the said Thomas T. Bouldin, deceased; also, because it does not allege that said will has been duly proved or admitted to probate in the county of Charlotte, in the state of Virginia; also that it did not allege that said court has jurisdiction to approve and admit said will to probate." We see nothing in this point. The complaint seems to us to state the facts referred to as fully as was necessary for the purposes of the case.

The objection that the complaint is ambiguous and uncertain because the land is not sufficiently described is also untenable. The complaint, as finally amended, describes the land as that part of the Mission rancho of San Diego, known as Lot 23, containing 516 acres. The rancho had been partitioned, and lot 23, as described on a map accompanying the report of the commissioners making the partition, was awarded to the estate of Bouldin. The description was, therefore, sufficient for identification of the property.

2. There was no error in striking out the defendant's cross-complaint. In an action to quiet title, where defendant relies upon title in himself, a cross-complaint is unnecessary. Wilson v. Madison, 55 Cal. 5; Association v. Wagner, 61 Cal. 349. Besides, as judgment was given for plaintiffs, the error, if any, was harmless.

3. At the conclusion of plaintiff's testimony the defendant moved for a nonsuit on the ground "that the plaintiffs had failed to prove a sufficient case." The motion was denied, and it is claimed that the ruling was erroneous. "It is settled law in this state that a party moving for a nonsuit should state in his motion precisely the grounds on which he relied, so that the attention of the court and the opposite counsel may be particularly directed to the supposed defects in the plaintiff's case." Coffey v. Greenfield, 62 Cal. 608. The motion made here did not comply with this rule, and it was therefore properly denied.

4. It is urged that the court erred in denying defendant's motion for new trial. The motion was based upon the alleged insufficiency of the evidence to justify the decision upon newly-discovered evidence and upon errors in law occurring at the trial. We think the evidence sufficient to justify the decision. It was proved by plaintiffs that on the 9th day of September, 1871, the defendant, Luco, executed to Bouldin a quitclaim deed, by which he conveyed to the party of the second part "all the right, title, and interest of the party of the first part in and to the undivided interest of five hundred (500) acres of that certain tract of land situate in the county of San Diego, state of California, and known as 'the lands of the ex-Mission of San Diego,' granted by the Mexican government to Santiago Arguello, and finally confirmed by the courts of the United States to the grantee; the said undivided interest hereby conveyed being a portion of the interest in said ex-Mission lands derived by said party of the first part from Isaac Hartman, by deed dated the 23d day of March, A. D. 1869, and by said Hartman derived from Augustin Olvera by an instrument in writing dated the 5th of February, A. D. 1869, and theretofore conveyed to said Olvera by the widow and heirs of said Santiago Arguello, which said deed, instrument, and conveyance are of record in the county recorder's office of San Diego county." And it was proved by defendant that an action was commenced in his name, as plaintiff, for the partition of the Mission rancho, and that on the 19th day of April, 1886, final judgment was rendered in the action, by which there was awarded and set apart to the estate of Bouldin, in severalty, a portion of the rancho, described by metes and bounds, containing 516 acres, and designated as lot 23. It was also proved by plaintiffs that Bouldin died in April, 1873, leaving a will, which was executed in March, 1849, and by which he provided that "the dividends and interests" arising from his estate should be collected by his executors and paid to his father annually during his natural life, and that after his father's death the whole of his estate should be equally divided between his two sisters, Joanna T. Spencer and Alice S. Bouldin; that the father died in 1854, and the sister Alice in 1885; that the plaintiffs other than Miller, the special administrator, were the sister Joanna and her husband, and the children of the sister Alice, and the husband of one of them; and that the will was admitted to probate in the state of Virginia, and that Miller was appointed special administrator of the estate in California. This, we think, constituted sufficient proof that the plaintiffs had an interest in the property in question, and that all of them except Miller and the husbands were the legatees or heirs of the decedent. It was not necessary to prove that the children of Alice had succeeded to her interest, nor that she did not in her life-time devise her interest to strangers. This, if true, was matter of defense. Nor was it necessary to prove that the defendant held the premises adversely to the plaintiffs, or that the plaintiffs were in possession thereof.

The newly-discovered evidence upon which defendant relied for a new trial was set forth in an affidavit made by his attorney as follows: (1) The property described in the complaint was assessed for the year 1886 to the administrator of the estate of Bouldin, and the state and county taxes levied thereon amounted to $8.60. These taxes were not paid, and on the 7th day of March, 1887, the property was sold therefor, and defendant became the purchaser. There was no redemption, and on the 26th day of March, 1888, (between the time of the trial of this action and the entry of judgment therein,) defendant obtained a tax collector's deed for the property. (2) While this action was pending, and before the trial thereof, the plaintiffs conveyed all the property described in the complaint to one William R. Wells, who thereafter conveyed the same to other parties. Neither the defendant nor his attorney had any knowledge of these conveyances until two days after the judge of the court below made and filed his findings and decision in the case.

We do not think the tax-deed or the matters leading up to it constituted newly-discovered evidence. At most the deed, if valid, showed a title acquired pendente lite, and, under a well-settled rule, such a title cannot be availed of unless set up by supplemental answer. The conveyance by plaintiffs was not good ground for a new trial. If proof of it had been made at the trial, the result would not thereby have been changed. The Code provides that in case of a transfer of interest the action or proceeding may be continued in the name of the original party, or the person to whom the transfer is made may be substituted. Code Civil Proc. § 385; Hestres v. Brennan, 37 Cal. 385; Camarillo v. Fenlon, 49 Cal. 202.

There are several alleged errors in law for which it is claimed a new trial should have been granted, but none of them are discussed by counsel for appellant. In his points and authorities he has simply copied the specifications of error found in the statement of the case, without any attempt to show how or why the rulings complained of were erroneous. Only two of these specifications need be noticed. Defendant offered in evidence a sheriff's deed, dated February 21, 1887, purporting to convey to him the land in controversy. The deed recited that, whereas, by virtue of an execution issued out of the superior court of San Diego county, upon a jugment recovered therein, on the 19th day of April, 1886, in favor of Juan M. Luco, plaintiff, and against John W. Carter, administrator of the estate of Thomas T. Bouldin, deceased, defendant, the sheriff was commanded to make certain moneys out of the personal property of the judgment debtor, and, if sufficient personal property could not be found, then out of the real property belonging to the judgment debtor at the date of the judgment; and whereas, sufficient personal property could not be found, the sheriff did levy on, take, and seize all the right, title, interest, and claim which the said judgment debtor had to the lands, tenements, and real estate thereafter described, and did, on the 19th day of August, 1886, sell all the right, title, interest, and claim of the said judgment debtor in and to said premises at public auction to the party of the second part (defendant Luco) for the sum of $84.67; and whereas, six months after the sale had elapsed, and no redemption had been made therefor, the sheriff, in consideration of the premises, granted, sold, and conveyed unto the party of the second part all the right, title, interest, and claim which the said judgment debtor had, on the 16th day of July, 1886, or at any time afterwards, in and to the land described.

The plaintiffs objected to the deed being received in evidence, and the court sustained the objection. We see no error in this ruling. The deed recites a judgment and execution against Carter, and a sale of his interest in the land.

The defendant offered in evidence a deed made by the tax collector of San Diego county under date of February 25, 1887, purporting to convey to defendant "the whole of the undivided 305 acres of land in the ex-Mission rancho," situate in the county of San Diego, in pursuance of a sale for $6.55, state and county taxes levied against the property for the year 1885.

The plaintiffs objected to the deed being received in evidence on the ground that it appeared on the face thereof to have been altered in a material respect after its execution, and the court sustained the objection. We see no error in this ruling. It was fully justified by section 1982 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

5. Finally, it is claimed for appellant that the findings do not cover all of the issues raised by the pleadings, and that the decision was therefore against law. There is no necessity for findings upon immaterial issues, or as to facts which are alleged in the complaint and not denied by the answer. Findings should be of the ultimate, not the probative, facts; still a finding of probative facts is sufficient, if the court is enabled to say that the ultimate facts necessarily result therefrom. Coveny v. Hale, 49 Cal. 552; Coglan v. Beard, 65 Cal. 58, 2 Pac. Rep. 737. The findings under review here are almost wholly of probative facts, and are not to be commended. We think, however, that the ultimate facts, so far as they are material and in issue, result from the facts found, and the findings should therefore be held sufficient.

It results that we find in the record no error prejudicial to appellant, and therefore advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNE, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

DE NECOCHEA v. CURTIS. (No. 12,742.)

IRRIGATION—NOTICE.

Civil Code Cal. § 1415, provides "that a person desiring to appropriate water must post a notice * * * at the point of intended diversion." Section 1419 provides "that a failure to comply with such rules deprives the claimant of the right to the use of the water as against a subsequent claimant who complies therewith." Held, that a diversion of water without compliance with the statute gives a right to continue the diversion as against a subsequent pre-emptioner of the land through which the water flows who has also not complied with the statute. Affirming 20 Pac. Rep. 563.

On rehearing. For former report, see 20 Pac. Rep. 563.

Hunsaker, Britt & Lamme, for appellant. Collier & Haines, for respondent.

BEATTY, C. J. A sufficient statement of this case will be found in our former opinion, filed February 23, 1889, and reported in 20 Pac. Rep. 563. After filing that opinion we concluded, on account of the novelty and importance of the question decided, to order a rehearing, and the case, after full and exhaustive reargument, has been again submitted for decision. In their printed brief filed upon the rehearing, counsel for appellant have urged several assignments of error in addition to that upon which we held that the judgment of the superior court must be reversed; but since, after the most attentive consideration of the very able and ingenious argument of counsel for respondent, we are still satisfied of the correctness of that decision, and of the validity of the reasons upon which it was based, we do not deem it necessary to consider any other questions affecting the right of appellant to a reversal of the judgment. We held in our former opinion that De Necochea, having, by means of an artificial ditch, completed the diversion of the waters of a spring rising on public lands of the United States from their natural channel to lands occupied and owned by him, where they were used for irrigation and other purposes, thereby acquired a right to continue such diversion and use, as against Mrs. Curtis, a subsequent pre-emptioner of the land upon which the spring rises, and this notwithstanding De Necochea's diversion and use of the water was not completed or even commenced prior to the enactment of the Civil Code, and notwithstanding he failed and neglected to post or record the notice prescribed by section 1415 of the said Code. This conclusion counsel for respondent vigorously combat in an argument which we are sure leaves nothing further to be said on their side of the question. If the time at our disposal permitted, it would not be unprofitable to take up the points of this argument and consider them seriatim, and perhaps it is only fair to counsel that we should do so, but, as it is, we can only repeat with a little more fullness what we have before said, noticing incidentally some of the more important of the objections to the grounds of our decision. There is no difference between counsel and the court as to the meaning and effect of the acts of congress cited in our former opinion. It is conceded on all sides that rights to the use of water on the public lands of the United States for mining, manufacturing, agricultural, and other purposes (and to the ditches and reservoirs used in connection with such water-rights) which have vested and accrued, and are recognized by local customs, laws, and decisions of the courts, are confirmed and assured to the owners; and that all purchasers of public lands affected by the diversion of streams from their natural courses for the purposes named take such lands subject, and subject only, to such vested and accrued water rights. When, therefore, a contest like this arises between a pre-emptioner of public land claiming riparian rights in a spring rising upon, or a stream flowing through, his land, as against one who asserts a right to divert the spring or stream to other lands for agricultural or other beneficial purposes, the sole question is whether a right so to divert and use the water had vested and accrued before the right to purchase the land became a vested right. In this case it is clear from the findings that the respondent's right to purchase did not become a vested right prior to the year 1885, and that as early as the year 1880 the appellant had completed the diversion, and was in full enjoyment of the use of the water of the spring for the irrigation of his land.

But the respondent contends that he was nevertheless not an appropriator and had no vested right to the use of the water recognized or acknowledged by the laws of this state, because having commenced and completed his diversion of the waters of the spring after the enactment of the Civil Code he failed and neglected to post or record the notice prescribed by section 1415. As this is the point upon which our decision must turn we will endeavor to state our views with respect to it somewhat more fully and explicitly than we have hitherto done.

Sections 1415 and 1416 of the Civil Code read as follows:

"Sec. 1415. A person desiring to appropriate water must post a notice in writing in a conspicuous place at the point of intended diversion stating therein (1) that he claims the water there flowing to the extent of (giving the number) inches measured under a 4-inch pressure; (2) the purposes for which he claims it, and the place of intended use; (3) the means by which he intends to divert it, and the size of the flume, ditch, pipe, or aqueduct in which he intends to divert it.

"A copy of the notice must, within ten days after it is posted, be recorded in the office of the recorder of the county in which it is posted.

"Sec. 1416. Within sixty days after the notice is posted, the claimant must commence the excavation or construction of the works in which he intends to divert the water, and must prosecute the work diligently and uninterruptedly to completion, unless temporarily interrupted by snow or rain."

It may be conceded that if these provisions of the law stood alone and unqualified, strict, or at least substantial, compliance with their requirements would be, as counsel claim, a sine qua non to the acquisition of any right to divert running water from its natural channel.

But these provisions do not stand alone. Section 1418 reads as follows:

"Sec. 1418. By a compliance with the above rules the claimant's right to the use of the water relates back to the time the notice was posted."

In this provision we begin to see the purpose and object of the legislature, which, in our opinion, was merely to define with precision the conditions upon which the appropriator of water could have the advantage of the familiar doctrine of relation upon which it had always been held before the statute that one who gave sufficient notice of his intention to appropriate, and followed up his notice by diligent prosecution of the work, was, upon its completion, to be deemed an appropriator from the date of his notice, and was, therefore, prior in time and stronger in right than an intervening appropriator, notwithstanding his diversion of the water might be first completed. We are not, however, left to any doubtful implication to be drawn from section 1418.

Section 1419 reads as follows:

"Sec. 1419. A failure to comply with such rules deprives the claimants of the right to the use of the water as against a subsequent claimant who complies therewith."

This language clearly and necessarily implies that there is a right to the use of running water acknowledged by the legislature and cognizable by the courts which is good against all the world, except a claimant who has complied with the rules prescribed in sections 1415 and 1416. Now what is this right,—what can it be except the right of one who has fully completed the diversion of running water and applied it to a beneficial use before the initiation of an adverse right of appropriation under the law, or the acquisition of an adverse right in the land to be affected by the diversion? And why should not such a right be recognized and enforced? The case supposed is that of a man who has gone upon the public unoccupied lands of the United States, diverted water from its natural course, conveyed it through ditches and flumes to a distant point, and used it for irrigation, mining, or manufacturing purposes. Is the pre-emptioner, who sees him in actual possession of his dams and ditches, diverting the water and using it, when he first sets foot upon the land, in anywise injured by the circumstance that such actual diversion was not preceded by the posting and recording of a notice of intention, followed by work commenced within sixty days and diligently prosecuted? We cannot perceive that he is. If he wishes to locate and purchase the land he can see precisely what the nature and extent of the servitude is to which it has been subjected, far more precisely, at least, than he could have known from a mere notice of intention such as the Code prescribes. But, irrespective of any considerations of convenience, the sole question is, has the appropriator in the case supposed a right to the water which our laws recognize and enforce? If he has, he is within the terms and entitled to the benefit of the congressional legislation above referred to. And there can be no doubt that since the Code, as before, he has a perfect right, deducible from common-law principles, to the water actually appropriated as against all the world except the owner of the soil and those claiming adversely who have complied with the law. In the absence of such adverse claim his right is perfect, for the owner of the soil—the United States—has recognized and confirmed it, and has declared that all subsequent purchasers must take subject to it.

Counsel for respondent seem to understand the last sentence of our former opinion as holding or intimating that while she, as a riparian owner, can claim no advantage from the failure of appellant to post and record a notice of his intended appropriation, another appropriator could at any time, by compliance with the provisions of the Code, take the water which he has diverted and is using. We must not be understood as holding or intimating any such opinion. The case presents no such question for decision, even incidentally, and we express no opinion about it. Since, therefore, we have not made this supposed peculiar and invidious discrimination against purchasers of public land, we need not stop to defend it. If there is any such discrimination, which we do not admit, it is made by the terms of the statute, and not by any construction put upon it by us. We concede the force, the conclusiveness even, of the argument that if the pre-emptioner cannot, in view of section 1419 of the Civil Code, take advantage of the failure of an appropriator to post a notice, he cannot, for the same reason, take advantage of his failure to commence and prosecute the work of diversion with diligence, as provided in section 1416. But of what consequence is this? We decide nothing except that a diversion of water, without compliance with the statute, gives a right to continue the diversion against a pre-emptioner whose right of purchase vests after the diversion is fully completed, and then only to the extent and in the manner of such actual and completed diversion. We do not hold that an uncompleted diversion without compliance with the statute gives any right to complete or continue the diversion as against an intervening right of pre-emption.

The question under discussion was not involved in the case of Lux v. Haggin, 69 Cal. 255, 10 Pac. Rep. 674, and, of course, was not there decided. There are expressions in the opinion which seem to imply that an appropriation can only be made by strictly pursuing the rules prescribed by the Code, but it is evident they were not used for the purpose of establishing the proposition, and nothing which was decided depends on such a proposition for its support. The same may be said of Osgood v. Mining Co., 56 Cal. 571.

For these reasons and those assigned in our former opinion, we think the judgment of the superior court should be reversed, and as both parties agree that a new trial is not required, it is ordered that the judgment appealed from be reversed and the cause remanded, with directions to the superior court to enter a judgment for the plaintiff in accordance with the views herein expressed.

We concur: PATERSON, J.; THORNTON, J.; MCFARLAND, J.; SHARPSTEIN, J.

HALL v. ARNOTT et al. (No. 13,174.)

MORTGAGES—ABSOLUTE DEED—FORECLOSURE—REDEMPTION.

1. Where an indebtedness existing at the time of the execution of a deed, the purpose of the deed as a security therefor, and the continuance of the relation of debtor and creditor, are admitted, such deed operates as a mortgage, though it be in form absolute, under Civil Code Cal. § 2924, providing that "every transfer of an interest in property, other than in trust, made only as a security for the performance of another act, is to be deemed a mortgage;" and a defeasance executed subsequently, and reciting that the legal title conveyed by the deed would be reconveyed upon payment of the indebtedness secured therein, does not change the effect of the deed.

2. Under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 726, providing that there can be but one action for any debt secured by mortgage upon real estate, where two deeds are for the benefit of the same parties and to secure the same debt, though on different property, they must be included in the same action for foreclosure, and failure to include one of such deeds in such an action extinguishes the lien given by it.

3. Though the lien is thus extinguished, the deed remains a cloud upon the grantor's title to the property therein described, which he is entitled to have removed upon payment of any balance due on decree of foreclosure of the other deed.

4. Failure of the mortgagee to take a personal judgment for the balance does not affect the mortgagor's remedy, since judgment cannot be taken after exhausting the security by waiver, under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 726, allowing such judgment in case proceeds of sale of mortgaged property are insufficient.

5. Under Civil Code Cal. § 2903, providing that "every person having an interest in property subject to lien has a right to redeem it from the lien at any time after the claim is due and before his right of redemption is foreclosed," the right to redeem is unaffected by the running of the statute of limitations against the principal debt.

6. The mortgagor, or those claiming under him, can require no more than a reconveyance of the interest originally conveyed by the mortgage.

7. Under Rev. St. U. S. § 2319, providing that a valid location or relocation of a mining claim can be made only when the ground is open to exploration and relocation, allegations by plaintiff that while the ground was not open to appropriation it was relocated for the sole purpose of facilitating the procurement of a patent therefor are contradictory, and averments by the defendant that the ground was vacant public land, and that a notice of location was posted thereon, do not raise an issue as to ownership by relocation.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Sierra county; F. D. SOWARD, Judge.

Action by Robert Hall, grantee of Charles Waterhouse, against James Arnott, Isabella Baird, and —— Henderson, to redeem from a mortgage in form of a deed absolute executed by said Waterhouse. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Before the appeal was perfected he died, and Delia Hall, as administratrix, was substituted in his stead. Civil Code Cal. § 2924, provides: "Every transfer of an interest in property, other than in trust, made only as a security for the performance of another act, is to be deemed a mortgage." Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 726, allows a personal judgment for the balance due a mortgagee when the proceeds of a sale of the mortgaged property are insufficient.

Gray & Sexton and Smith & Ford, for appellant. P. Vanclief, for respondents.

GIBSON, C. Action to redeem from a mortgage in form of a deed absolute. On the 7th day of August, 1882, one Charles Waterhouse became the owner of an undivided one-tenth interest in the Pacific mining claim, situated in the Port Wine district, in Sierra county, and in conjunction with N. B. Abbott and S. M. Boyce on the same date executed and delivered to James Arnott and Thomas Baird, who were mining partners at the time, a deed absolute in form, conveying said one-tenth interest in the Pacific mining claim to secure the payment of money due from Waterhouse to the grantees, the amount of which was then unascertained. At the time of the conveyance, and prior thereto, Boyce, as a mortgagee of Waterhouse, had a mortgage lien upon the latter's interest in the claim, and Abbott claimed adversely to Waterhouse, which lien and adverse claim were satisfied and extinguished by Waterhouse on the date mentioned, and thereupon Boyce and Abbott joined with Waterhouse for his benefit in the conveyance to Arnott and Baird. Baird died on September 29, 1882, leaving Arnott the sole survivor of the mining partnership. Thereafter, on December 20, 1882, Waterhouse executed another deed absolute in form, conveying to Arnott certain additional mining claims and water-rights in the same county as additional security for the payment of the indebtedness secured by the first deed, and of any additional present or future indebtedness of Waterhouse to the defendants Arnott, Baird, and Van Clief. Defendant Arnott at the same time executed and delivered back to Waterhouse an agreement, reciting among other things, "that both of said conveyances [deeds of August 7, 1882, and December 20, 1882] were executed, and the legal title thereby conveyed is held in trust to secure the payment of the indebtedness of said Waterhouse to the following persons:

* * * On the payment of all the abovementioned indebtedness I hereby agree to reconvey, or cause to be reconveyed, to said Waterhouse all the described property." In the same court in which the action was tried, on the 31st day of July, 1884, in an action for that purpose, prosecuted by James Arnott and all the defendants herein except Henderson, as plaintiffs, against Charles Waterhouse, as defendant, a decree was entered foreclosing as a mortgage the deed of December 20, 1882, and ordering the premises therein described to be sold to satisfy all the indebtedness of Waterhouse to Arnott individually, and as the surviving partner of Thomas Baird, deceased, Isabella Baird, and P. Van Clief, adjudicated to be the sum of $13,684 and costs. Thereafter, upon an order of sale duly issued, the sheriff returned that he had sold the property to Arnott, the highest bidder, for $12,571, and that $1,505, together with $325.32 for fees, remained unsatisfied. No personal judgment was docketed for this deficiency, or any part thereof. In that foreclosure suit an attempt was made in the original complaint to foreclose, as a mortgage, the deed of August 7, 1882, but, upon a demurrer to such complaint for a misjoinder of causes of action being sustained, it was abandoned by omitting it from the amended complaint upon which the suit was tried. On the 21st day of December, 1885, Arnott, still holding whatever interest he may have acquired by the deed of August 7, 1882, with others, to the exclusion of Waterhouse, relocated the Pacific mining claim, under the name of the "Manzanita Placer Company Claim." Waterhouse, by deed dated May 31, 1887, conveyed all his interest in the Pacific mining claim to Robert Hall, who, on the 25th day of October, 1887, tendered to defendant Arnott the sum of $1,854 as the full amount of the remainder due on the decree of foreclosure in Arnott et al. v. Waterhouse, and demanded a reconveyance of the mining property conveyed by the deed of August 7, 1882. The tender and a demand for reconveyance were refused, and thereupon Hall brought this action to obtain a reconveyance of the one-tenth interest in the Pacific mining claim. Defendants resisted, on the grounds that the deed of August 7, 1882, was not a trust-deed conveying the legal title, but merely a mortgage, and that a release could not be had until $2,500, the remainder of all the indebtedness, secured by both deeds and determined by the proceedings in Arnott et al. v. Waterhouse, was fully paid; that, as no trust relation existed between Waterhouse, the grantor to plaintiff herein, and defendants Arnott and Baird, but merely that of mortgagor and mortgagee, the relocation of the Pacific mining claim by Arnott and others, to the exclusion of Waterhouse, did not inure to the benefit of Waterhouse, and as the indebtedness secured by the deed of August 7, 1882, was barred by the statute of limitations, the right of redemption, evidenced by the instrument dated December 20, 1882, executed and delivered by Arnott to Waterhouse, was also barred. These defenses prevailed, and judgment that plaintiff has no cause of action against defendants, and that defendants be discharged from all things alleged against them, passed for the defendants, from which, and an order denying a new trial, this appeal is taken. Before the appeal was perfected Robert Hall died, and his wife, as administratrix, was substituted in his stead.

From the view we take of the cause the judgment and order must be reversed. The deed of August 7, 1882, although a deed absolute in form, having, as admitted by the pleadings, been given to secure an existing indebtedness of the grantor to all of the defendants except Henderson as between the parties thereto, did not pass the legal title, but merely operated as a mortgage between them, (Civil Code, § 2924; Montgomery v. Spect, 55 Cal. 352; Taylor v. McLain, 64 Cal. 513, 2 Pac. Rep. 399; Healy v. O'Brien, 66 Cal. 519, 6 Pac. Rep. 386; Raynor v. Drew, 72 Cal. 307, 13 Pac. Rep. 866; Booth v. Hoskins, 75 Cal. 271, 17 Pac. Rep. 225,) and gave a mortgage lien only upon the property that would have passed if the deed had been intended as an absolute grant of the property instead of as a mortgage, (Civil Code, § 2926.) The defeasance executed by Arnott to Waterhouse on December 20, 1882, and reciting that the legal titles conveyed by both deeds would be reconveyed upon the payment of the indebtedness secured by both deeds therein mentioned, did not change the effect of the deed of August 7, 1882, in view of the purpose for which the said deed was given. The fact of an existing indebtedness between the parties thereto at the time of the execution of the deed, and the object for which it was executed, and the continuation of the relation of debtor and creditor being admitted, the court properly found that the deed was not intended as a trust-deed conveying the legal title to the property, but merely a security for the payment by Waterhouse of the indebtedness existing at the time it was executed, and afterwards incurred by him, in accordance with the terms of the defeasance of December 20, 1882, executed and delivered by Arnott to Waterhouse. Montgomery v. Spect, supra.

A mortgagee is not entitled to the possession of the mortgaged property unless expressly provided for by the terms of the mortgage. Civil Code, § 2927. The deed in controversy, being a mortgage, which did not pass the legal title, did not give the right of possession, and as there is no evidence of an agreement, written or verbal, between Waterhouse and Arnott and Baird, or either of them, relating to the possession of the mortgaged property, the finding of the court that there was no such agreement is impregnable.

The other portion of the same finding, to the effect that none of the defendants ever entered into and retained the actual possession of the ground, unless Arnott and Henderson acquired a constructive possession thereof under their notice of relocation of the ground, comes within the rule that when there is a substantial conflict in the evidence this court will not disturb a finding based thereon. The contention of plaintiff regarding the alleged possession of the ground by defendants is upon the theory that if the deed in controversy is a mortgage only, and defendants, Arnott and Henderson—the latter representing the interest of his sister, the defendant Isabella Baird, relict of Thomas Baird, deceased—were in possession of the property as mortgagees, there was no breach or violation of the mortgage upon which they could hold adversely to the mortgagor and his successors until the relocation of the claim by Arnott and Henderson and their co-locators, on December 21, 1885, and, five years not having elapsed from that time until the suit was commenced, plaintiff is entitled to redeem, under section 346 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and Raynor v. Drew, supra. We are, however, of the opinion that on the facts in this case plaintiff can redeem, regardless of whether the actual possession was held by defendants or not.

The Code of Civil Procedure (section 726) provides that there can be but one action for the recovery of any debt secured by mortgage upon real estate. In applying this section in Ould v. Stoddard, 54 Cal. 613, it was held that a mortgagee who commenced and prosecuted a suit to final judgment in the state of Ohio, upon a promissory note secured by a mortgage upon land in this state, exhausted his remedy upon both the note and security, and could not thereafter maintain a suit to foreclose the mortgage. It is therefore apparent that as the deed in controversy was for the benefit of the same parties as those to the deed of December 20, 1882, and to secure the same indebtedness, although upon different property, it should, by appropriate allegations in the amended complaint in Arnott et al. v. Waterhouse, in which the last-mentioned deed was foreclosed, have been included and foreclosed. It is no excuse to say that the court sustained a demurrer to the complaint in which an effort was made to include it, as we are bound to presume that the ruling of the court was correct and the complaint insufficient to make evident the necessary connection between the two deeds. The plaintiffs in that suit exhausted their remedy upon their security, and by failing to include the deed in controversy waived any security afforded by it, and the lien thereby given was nullified. See Mascarel v. Raffour, 51 Cal. 242.

The lien created by the instrument being thus nullified and extinguished, and the legal title and right of possession remaining in the mortgagor, it may be said that there is nothing to redeem. But the instrument, being a deed absolute in form, constitutes a cloud upon whatever interest the grantor may have had in the property therein described at the time it was executed, or that he or his successors in interest may have subsequently acquired. The plaintiff is in equity entitled to have such cloud removed upon doing equity in paying the remainder due upon the decree of foreclosure in Arnott et al. v. Waterhouse. Raynor v. Drew, supra, and Booth v. Hoskins, supra; Rodriguez de Cazara v. Orena, ante, 74, (12,933, filed August 1, 1889.)

The court found such remainder to be $1,854, and the amount proper to be paid in the event of the plaintiff being entitled to redeem, and also found that no personal judgment for such deficiency had been docketed. This latter fact does not affect plaintiff's remedy, because the mortgagees, having waived their first mortgage, which was to secure the same indebtedness, but upon different property exhausted their security, and could not obtain a personal judgment for any deficiency until they exhausted their security, not by waiver, but by sale on foreclosure. Code Civil Proc. § 726; Biddel v. Brizzolara, 64 Cal. 354.

It is urged by the defendants that the indebtedness secured by the instrument of August 7, 1882, being barred as found by the court, the right to redeem is also barred. "Such," said this court in Raynor v. Drew, supra, "was undoubtedly the rule before the Code. Cunningham v. Hawkins, 24 Cal. 406; Arrington v. Liscom, 34 Cal. 369; Espinosa v. Gregory, 40 Cal. 58. But perhaps it may be doubted whether the reason of the old equity rule applies under a system where no title passes to the mortgagee." By the Civil Code (section 2903) "every person having an interest in property subject to lien has a right to redeem it from the lien at any time after the claim is due, and before his right of redemption is foreclosed." It is evident that this section changed the rule laid down in the cases cited in Raynor v. Drew, and is intended to give the mortgagor or other persons interested the privilege, at any time after the principal obligation becomes due, to have the lien extinguished that would otherwise cloud their title, upon paying the debt, regardless of the running of the statute of limitations against the principal obligation. This conclusion renders it unnecessary to consider whether the indebtedness secured by the instrument in question was barred or not at the commencement of this action.

The only limitation upon this right to redeem is when the mortgagee, or any one claiming under him, has continuously maintained an adverse possession of the premises mortgaged for five years after the breach of some condition of the mortgage. Code Civil Proc. § 346. It is apparent that such adverse possession would not operate upon the lien alone, but would attack and overcome the legal title, and, in effect, would be the same as if a stranger to the title should obtain actual possession by a trespass and succeed in holding adversely for the statutory period. Assuming that Waterhouse, after he executed the deed of August 7, 1882, forfeited or abandoned his interest in the mortgaged property, and the defendants, while the ground was open to appropriation, relocated the ground, as found by the court, and thereby acquired the highest title obtainable thereto against Waterhouse and all others, except the United States, plaintiff would still be entitled to redeem. Lorenzana v. Camarillo, 45 Cal. 125. This last case was an action to redeem from a mortgage in form of a deed absolute. The plaintiffs were husband and wife, the mortgaged property being the separate property of the latter. Both joined in the instrument, but it was found that the acknowledgment by the wife was not properly taken, her husband having been present at the time. Defendant urged that as the mortgaged property belonged to the wife separately, and as she did not join in the deed, her husband had no right to convey, and consequently no right to redeem. On this the court said: "There is nothing in the point that it appears in the amended complaint that Manuel Lorenzana, who seeks to redeem from the mortgage he gave to Camarillo, had no title to the mortgaged premises. His right to redeem springs from the fact of the execution and delivery of the mortgage, and in such a case it is no concern of the mortgagee whether or not the mortgagor, in point of fact, has a valid title to the mortgaged premises, or any part thereof." All that the plaintiff can receive by the reconveyance demanded by him is whatever passed by the mortgage deed of August 7, 1882. He certainly cannot obtain by nor require in such a reconveyance any adverse or superior title subsequently and in good faith acquired by the mortgagees, and a reconveyance from the mortgagees should be limited to the interest conveyed by the deed referred to.

In Miller v. Thayer, 74 Cal. 351, 16 Pac. Rep. 187, an action to redeem from the mortgage in the form of a deed absolute, with a defeasance in which a reconveyance was demanded, it was held: "This was certainly a proper, perhaps the only, mode of entering upon the record evidence of the satisfaction of such a mortgage." Regarding the relocation of the mortgaged mining ground by the defendants, this relocation was set up in defendants' answer to meet the allegation in plaintiff's complaint, to the effect that while the ground was not open or subject to appropriation, it was relocated for the sole purpose of facilitating the procurement of a patent therefor from the United States. A valid location or relocation of a mining claim can be made only when the ground is open to exploration and appropriation, (Rev. St. U. S. § 2319; Taylor v. Middleton, 67 Cal. 656, 8 Pac. Rep. 594, and numerous other decisions of this court;) and a relocation for the sole purpose of correcting an error in the original location can only be made when the rights of the others have not intervened between the acts, and cannot change or affect the title to the same ground acquired by the original location. Therefore these allegations in plaintiff's complaint were contradictory, and superfluous, and should have been disregarded.

Defendants' answer does not contain a positive averment of ownership of the mining property in question, nor of facts sufficient to show the ownership of the ground by the defendants. The averment that the ground was vacant public land, and that a notice of location was thereon posted, is insufficient. Jones v. Jackson, 9 Cal. 238. When a general statement of ownership of a mining claim is not made in a pleading, the pleading must show all the facts necessary to constitute such ownership. Hence, as there was no issue as to ownership tendered by the pleadings, the finding of the fact relative to the relocation of the ground must be disregarded.

We therefore advise that the judgment and order be reversed, and the cause remanded, with the direction that judgment for plaintiff be entered in accordance with this opinion.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; HAYNE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are reversed and the cause remanded, with the direction that judgment for plaintiff be entered in accordance with the above opinion.

STONE v. HAMMELL. (No. 13,024.)

PRINCIPAL AND SURETY—CONTRIBUTION—PARTIES—INSOLVENCY—EVIDENCE.

1. Where the maker of a note gives his sureties a mortgage to secure its payment, and the property is sold and the proceeds applied on the note, the maker cannot dispute the satisfaction of such mortgage in an action against him by a surety who has paid part of the note.

2. Under Civil Code Cal. § 2848, providing that a surety, upon paying the principal's debt, is entitled to enforce all the creditor's rights of action against the principal for the amount so expended, and to require his co-sureties to contribute thereto, a co-surety, having so contributed by giving his own note to the paying surety, is entitled to reimbursement from the principal precisely as if he had paid the money to the creditor.

3. Where a surety on a note holds security for the payment thereof the creditor is not bound to require the application of such security to the payment before he can sue the sureties.

4. A surety who has paid a note and received contribution from a co-surety is not a necessary party to a suit by the latter against the principal for the amount contributed.

5. Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 339, provides that an action on a contract not in writing must be brought within two years. Section 351 provides that when the right of action against a party accrues during his absence from the state, the action may be brought within the time limited after his return. Held, that the surety's right of action for contribution against a co-surety who was absent from the state when the note was paid, accrued on his return, and the co-surety's right of action against the principal accrued on his giving his note for the amount of such contribution within two years after returning.

6. The rights of a creditor are not affected by the discharge in insolvency of his debtor, where neither the creditor himself nor his debt were within the jurisdiction of the court in which the proceedings in insolvency were had.

7. The discharge in insolvency of a debtor does not affect the rights of his surety on a note who subsequently contributes to the payment thereof.

8. The records of a probate court, showing the insolvency of a deceased surety who had not contributed to the payment of the note, are admissible in evidence in an action by a co-surety against the principal.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Santa Barbara county; R. M. DILLARD, Judge.

Action by H. P. Stone against James Hammell, to recover $1,000 and interest. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Code Civil Proc. Cal. §§ 337, 339, provide that an action founded upon a writing executed in said state must be brought within four years after the right of action accrues, and an action upon a contract, etc., not founded upon a writing, within two years thereafter. Section 351 provides that, when the right of action against a person accrues during his absence from the state, such action may be brought within the time limited after his return thereto. Civil Code Cal. §§ 2847, 2848, provide that a surety, upon satisfying the obligation of his principal, is entitled to enforce every remedy which the creditor has against the principal, to the extent of reimbursing what he has expended, and also to require all his co-sureties to contribute thereto.

Wells, Guthrie & Lee and S. W. Bouton, for appellant. B. F. Thomas, for respondent.

FOOTE, C. This action was brought by the plaintiff to recover from the defendant the sum of $1,000 and interest. It is alleged in the complaint that the plaintiff, with three other persons, became the sureties of the defendant upon a promissory note, payable to one Byron Stevens, for the sum of $3,000, the money borrowed, for which the note was given, being for the use and benefit of the defendant, and received and used by him alone; that the defendant neglected to pay the note, or any part of it; that Newell, one of the sureties, paid upon the note, as principal and interest, the sum of $3,855, of which sum the defendant repaid him the sum of $1075 only; that the plaintiff, Stone, about the 1st of August, 1878, changed his residence from the state of California to the state of New York, and the said 1st of August left the state of California, and was absent therefrom until December, 1883; that about the 1st of March, 1884, Newell, the surety who had paid the promissory note to Stevens, demanded of Stone, the plaintiff, that he should pay the sum of $1,000, as plaintiff's pro rata share of the money which Newell had paid on account of their suretyship on the promissory note; that the plaintiff, on the 1st of March, 1884, made, executed, and delivered to Newell his promissory note in the sum of $1,000 in full satisfaction of the amount of money which the plaintiff should contribute to Newell for his payments for and on account of the promissory note to Stevens, and Newell gave to the plaintiff a receipt in full satisfaction for the plaintiff's liability to contribute to him for the payments he made as heretofore stated; that the defendant has not paid the plaintiff anything, either principal or interest, for the sum of $1,000 thus paid out for the defendant to Newell; that one of the four sureties, Hamilton, paid nothing on the note to Stevens, and contributed nothing to Newell; and that Hamilton died insolvent. The complaint was demurred to on the grounds (1) that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action; (2) that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action in this, "that it appears from said complaint that the plaintiff has not legal capacity to sue; second, that it appears upon the face of said complaint that the last payment made upon the note, set out in the first paragraph thereof, was made on the 10th day of January, 1881, by P. N. Newell, and that the cause of action, if any, accrued on said 10th day of January, 1881, in favor of said P. N. Newell, and that the cause of action in favor of said P. N. Newell, if any, is barred by the statute of limitations, and that the cause of action, if any, was barred by the statute of limitations, at the time of the pretended demand and the making of the note for $1,000 by plaintiff to P. N. Newell, on the 1st day of March, 1884, alleged in said complaint; that said complaint is ambiguous, unintelligible, and uncertain in this, that it does not sufficiently appear from said complaint whether or not the note referred to in the eighth paragraph thereof was ever paid by plaintiff; that it does not sufficiently appear from said complaint that the plaintiff ever paid any money whatever for, or on account of, defendant; that it does not sufficiently appear from said complaint that the plaintiff's cause of action alleged in said complaint is not barred by the statute of limitations; that there is a defect in parties plaintiff to said action, in this, that it appears from said complaint that P. N. Newell should be made plaintiff to said action, instead of the plaintiff herein; that said complaint does not, nor does any paragraph thereof, severally state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action." The demurrer was overruled, and the defendant answered, objecting to the complaint that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action; that the plaintiff had no legal capacity to sue; that the cause of action, if any, accrued on the 10th of January, 1881, in favor of Newell, and that it is barred by the statute of limitations under the provisions of sections 337 and 339 of the Code of Civil Procedure; denying that the time of payment of the note to Stevens was extended to the 1st of July, 1880, or that he neglected to pay the note, or any part of it; and alleging that before the note became due he had mortgaged certain real property to the sureties on his note to Stevens, sufficient in value for the payment and satisfaction of the note, and that subsequently he conveyed to Newell, one of the sureties, a portion of the premises thus mortgaged of the value of $1,400, which the sureties afterwards sold and applied the proceeds to the payment of the Stevens note. He further claimed that the payments alleged to have been made by Newell were from the proceeds of the property mortgaged and conveyed to the sureties. He denied that he had only paid $1,075 of the amounts paid by Newell on the Stevens note, and alleged that he paid the whole of what Newell paid, and that nothing is due from him to Newell. All the other allegations of the complaint are denied. For further defense the answer set up that if Stone contributed anything towards the repayment of Newell for what he had paid out for and on account of the defendant, such payment was entirely voluntary, and without any consideration good in law, and that the plaintiff ought not to recover against him because of his discharge in insolvency on the 24th day of December, 1879, by the county court of Santa Barbara county, Cal. The answer was afterwards, upon leave of the court, amended so as to defend the action on the ground that, so far from neglecting or refusing to pay the Stevens note, the defendant, before the note became due, on the 5th day of August, 1878, executed and delivered to the plaintiff and Newell a deed absolute in form, but by way of a mortgage, conveying to Stone and Newell certain real estate in Santa Barbara county, fully described in said deed in trust, to sell and dispose of the property conveyed, and to apply the proceeds in satisfaction of the Byron Stevens note, on which Stone and Newell were the defendant's sureties; that the conveyance thus made was accepted by Stone and Newell in trust for the purposes above specified, and was, at Stone's request, recorded on the 13th of August, 1878, in the proper office. It is further alleged that the property so conveyed was more than sufficient in value for the payment and satisfaction of the note to Stevens, and interest; that it was worth $5,000, and that plaintiff and Newell, after its conveyance to them, and before the 1st day of March, 1884, disposed of a large portion of it for the sum of $3,500, and that at the time of the commencement of this action there remained a portion of the property thus conveyed undisposed of and held by the sureties of the value of $500. A demurrer was filed to this amendment, on the grounds—First, that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action; second, that, in so far as it refers to any mortgage or deed of trust, it does not state any fact constituting any defense. "Said instrument, if a mortgage, has become extinguished by lapse of time, and could not have been enforced when this action was commenced, nor could it be now enforced." This demurrer was overruled, and the cause was tried without a jury, upon the issues made by the complaint and answer as amended. The plaintiff had judgment as prayed for. From that and an order refusing a new trial this appeal is prosecuted.

One of the reasons urged by the defendant why the judgment cannot stand is, to use his own language, "that the plaintiff could not sue the defendant on his implied promise on the note, because his remedy on the note was merged in a superior remedy, i. e., the mortgage given by defendant to his sureties." In support of this proposition he argues that the remedy in assumpsit on an implied contract originally vested in the sureties against their principal, became merged on their accepting a mortgage security therefor, and their only remedy was an action for foreclosure. The fact which he relies on to uphold his legal proposition is that the mortgage given to all four of the sureties was never legally satisfied, because Byron Stevens, the payee of the note which the defendant and sureties had executed, was not a party to the satisfaction of the mortgage, and that, as the mortgage was not satisfied, the deed in form, which the court found to be in trust, but not a mortgage, was a mortgage, and was supplementary to the first mortgage, and the remedy of foreclosure of it could only be pursued. But Stevens has been paid from the proceeds of the property deeded to the sureties, so far as it was sold, whether it was a mortgage, or, as the court found, a deed in trust only for a specific purpose which was carried out, and he is not here complaining of the satisfaction of the mortgage. The person who does complain, and who seeks to have the mortgage declared unsatisfied, was a party to its satisfaction, and is excluded by his action in the premises from disputing its proper and legal satisfaction.

The further contention is made that the finding of the court, that the action is not barred by the statute of limitations, is against law. To support this claim the appellant seems to argue that when Stone executed and delivered his promissory notes, which were agreed to be taken as an absolute payment and reimbursement to Newell of Stone's share of the money paid out to Stevens by Newell, he (Stone) was under no legal obligation to do so; that he could have invoked the statute of limitations against Newell for this contribution. This seems to be based upon the proposition that although Stone was absent from the state during most of the time that Newell was making payments to Stevens, who was also a non-resident, yet that the statute began to run in favor of Stone as soon as Newell paid the first installment of interest, $360, on the note, when Stone was in the state, and continued to run, notwithstanding his absence from the state after that time. Code Civil Proc. § 351. The court found, upon sufficient evidence, that Stone, about the 1st of August, 1878, removed from the state of California to the state of New York, where he remained until December, 1883. Up to the time of Stone's removal Newell had not paid more than his share as surety, and all that he paid after that time, for which Stone was liable for contribution, was paid during Stone's absence from the state. Unless, therefore, this action was not brought until after the time had elapsed, prescribed by sections 337 and 339 of the Code of Civil Procedure, for the barring of the action after Stone's return, he (Newell) was not precluded from recovery by those statutes. Section 351, Code Civil Proc. Stone's right of action accrued on the 1st of March, 1884, when he reimbursed Newell for his expenditures by executing the promissory notes, which were taken as absolute payment for the liability of Stone to Newell for Stone's share of the money paid to Stevens, the payee of the note. Brandt, Sur. § 199. The statute did not begin to run against Stone until the 1st of March, 1884. He filed his complaint on the 17th day of September, 1885, less than two years after the statute began to operate, and was not barred. Newell's right of action against Stone was not barred, because the latter did not return to California until Dceember, 1883, and Stone paid Newell by notes on the 1st of March, 1884.

In this connection the appellant claims that the payment by Stone's notes to Newell of Stone's pro rata of the money which Newell had paid to Stevens for the defendant was no payment or reimbursement affecting defendant on account of his liability on the Stevens note. But it seems to have been held in this and in most of the other states that the acceptance of a promissory note in satisfaction and payment of a debt due from one individual to another is payment of the first debt. Griffith v. Grogan, 12 Cal. 323, and cases cited. When Newell paid the money for the defendant as his surety in satisfaction of the Stevens note he had the right to be reimbursed by the defendant for what he expended in that behalf. Sections 2847, 2848, Civil Code; Estate of Hill, 67 Cal. 244, 7 Pac. Rep. 664. He had also the right to be reimbursed by Stone for whatever amount Stone, as co-surety, was liable to pay Stevens as his proportion, and which had been paid by Newell to Stevens. When Stone paid Newell his liability to him, by the execution of the promissory notes taken in absolute payment and satisfaction of the debt, then Stone had the right, as a surety for Hammell, to look to him for reimbursement, because then Stone occupied towards him pro tanto the same relation that Newell did in paying Stevens such amount, for Stone had paid to Newell, not only what he was bound to contribute to reimburse him, but also so much of what Newell had paid for the defendant, and to that extent Stone then stood towards the defendant as if he had originally paid so much of the debt to Stevens. Newell had the right, in the first instance, to give his note to the creditor, Stevens, in full satisfaction for the debt of the defendant, and could then have sued him without having paid the note. Brandt, Sur. § 181. Stone, having paid to Newell, to his satisfaction, by note, his pro rata contribution of what Newell had paid for the defendant to the creditor, had a right to be reimbursed to that extent by Hammell for the actual payment in money of that sum by Newell to Stevens. The matter stood just as if Stone, instead of Newell, had paid Stone's proportion in money to the creditor for Hammell, and Stone has the same right as Newell had when he paid the debt in money.

But it is claimed that Newell, at the time Stone executed the notes, had no right of action against Stone for contribution, because he had not exhausted the securities in his hands, had not sold all the land included in the deed in trust, and applied the proceeds to the payment of the Stevens note; that his failure to do this exonerated Stone from any liability to reimburse Newell for what he had paid Stevens. The authorities cited in support of this proposition are not in point. There is no evidence in the record but what Newell realized, as far as he could reasonably do so, all that could fairly be obtained from the sale of the property held in trust, and that, after applying it all to the payment of the Stevens note, he was out of pocket as much money as would have made Stone's share in contribution amount to what his notes called for. There is no negligence, laches, or fraud shown in the matter, and Stone was liable to contribution when he gave his notes.

We perceive nothing of merit in the point made that Newell paid the debt voluntarily to Stevens without any liability to do so. The principal creditor, as it seems to us, could have sued the sureties whenever the note became due and remained unpaid. There was no necessity for him before doing so to have had the land held by the surety, Newell, as trustee, sold and the proceeds applied to the payment of his debt, even if it could have been done under the trust deed, for, as the record shows, this was done in good faith, and without any delay, by Newell, and the proceeds applied to the payment of the Stevens note.

The further point is made that the discharge of Hammell in insolvency discharged him of all indebtedness to Byron Stevens, the holder of the promissory note which the sureties executed with the defendant, and that the finding or decision of the trial court, that the insolvency court had no jurisdiction over Stevens, is against law, and that the discharge of the defendant in insolvency is a bar to the recovery of the plaintiff in this action. In its twelfth finding of fact, which is, we think, warranted by the evidence, the trial court found "that Byron Stevens, the payee of the said note mentioned in the first finding hereof, was not a resident of the state of California, and was absent therefrom during all the proceedings in the Matter of the Insolvency of James Hammell, and did not in any way submit either himself or said promissory note to the jurisdiction of the court in which such proceedings were had." This being so, Stevens was not affected in his rights by the discharge in insolvency as pleaded. Rhodes v. Borden, 67 Cal. 7, 6 Pac. Rep. 850, and cases cited. This discharge in insolvency left Newell and Stone still responsible to Stevens.

At the time of the insolvency proceedings Stone could not have brought suit against Hammell, because then Stone had paid out nothing as surety, and until he satisfied and paid Newell there was no breach of the implied promise of Hammell to reimburse him. Brandt, Sur. § 199. If Stone had no debt against Hammell which was provable in insolvency, it cannot be that he is barred of recovery by the proceedings and discharge in insolvency which took place prior to the time when his debt and right to sue Hammell accrued. In a case involving the same principle which is invoked here, it was said: "The debt was not made certain until after the defendant's discharge. It is like the case of a surety paying a debt after the discharge of the principal. The debt must be certain and fixed at the time of the insolvent's assignment." Buel v. Gordon, 6 Johns. 126.

We perceive nothing in the point that Newell should have been made a party. He had paid the note and been paid by Stone his contribution. Stone then had the right of action upon an implied contract against the principal, Hammell, for reimbursement. The court found, upon evidence which is not challenged by any specifications of particulars of its sufficiency, that Hamilton, one of the sureties, died insolvent in 1878, and contributed nothing towards the payment of the note in the first instance by Newell, or repayment to him as a co-surety. But the objection is made that a certain record of the probate court proceeding offered and admitted in evidence was not competent, relevant, or material. We think that the evidence tended to show the financial standing and insolvency of Hamilton, and was properly admitted. The evidence was sufficient to support the findings attacked, and, perceiving no prejudicial error, we advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; GIBSON, C.

80 Cal. 229

PEOPLE v. GOGGINS. (No. 20,527.)

LARCENY—INDICTMENT.

Under Pen. Code Cal. § 959, providing that the indictment or information is sufficient if it can be understood therefrom that the act or omission charged is clearly and distinctly set forth in such a manner as to enable a person of common understanding to know what is intended, an indictment charging the felonious stealing of "fifty sheep, the property of Townsend & Carey," is not fatally defective as not designating any owner of the property alleged to have been stolen, especially where defendant pleads guilty.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Mendocino county; ROBERT MCGARVEY, Judge.

J. A. Cooper, for appellant. George A. Johnson, Atty. Gen., for the People.

FOOTE, C. The defendant was indicted for the crime of grand larceny, and pleaded guilty to the charge. From the judgment rendered, he appeals. His argument is that the judgment should be reversed because the indictment failed to charge him with any crime whatsoever. It alleges, among other things, that the defendant "did willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously steal, take, and drive away fifty sheep, the property of Townsend & Carey," etc. The defendant claims that it does not appear therefrom that Townsend & Carey were partners in business, or a corporation; that there is no specific allegation to whom the sheep belonged; that in pleading guilty to the charge contained in the indictment he did not confess himself to have committed any offense.

The sufficiency of indictments or informations in California are to be tested by statutory enactments. Section 959 of the Penal Code provides that "the indictment or information is sufficient if it can be understood therefrom * * * Subsec. 6. That the act or omission charged as the offense is clearly and distinctly set forth in ordinary and concise language, without repetition, and in such a manner as to enable a person of common understanding to know what is intended." It must be presumed that the defendant was a person of common understanding. Would not such an individual have known from the language of the indictment that he was charged with the larceny of fifty sheep, the personal property of two individuals comprising a partnership of Townsend & Carey? And when he pleaded guilty, was he not intending to confess that he stole fifty sheep from the partnership composed of the two individuals just mentioned?

The case of People v. Henry, 19 Pac. Rep. 831, was one where the defendant was charged with the "felonious entry of some building of the San Diego and Coronado Water Company, with the intent then and there to commit larceny." It was contended in that case "that as the information does not state whether the San Diego and Coronado Water Company is a corporation or a partnership, and does not give the names of any persons composing the corporation or partnership, there is, in a legal sense, an entire absence of any allegation as to the party intended to be injured." There, as here, the cases of People v. Schwartz, 32 Cal. 160, and People v. Bogart, 36 Cal. 245, were cited "as conclusive of the question." The appellate court held in that case that the information sufficiently designated the owner of the building burglarized.

In People v. Barnes, 65 Cal. 16, 2 Pac. Rep. 493, which was an action upon a bail bond, "one Wilson was arrested on a complaint charging him with grand larceny in stealing 'two head of cattle, of the value of $25 each,' the cattle being the property of Page Bros." The defendants claimed that the bond was void; that no offense was alleged in the complaint; that "Page Bros." was not a statement of the name of the owners of the property alleged to have been stolen. The appellate court held that the point was not well taken; that the bond was not void; and that the offense of larceny was sufficiently charged in the complaint.

By parity of reasoning it may be said here that the indictment was not fatally defective and void as designating no owners of the property alleged to have been stolen. There was, perhaps, a somewhat obscure statement of the names of the owners, in the sense that they were not designated as a partnership or a corporation, but it is plain that, to a person of common understanding, it would appear that the property stolen was owned by two persons, Townsend and Carey, who did business in that name, for such is the common manner upon signs, letter-heads, signatures to documents, etc., in which firms of individuals are commonly designated. Especially should this be held to be the case where one charged with the larceny of fifty sheep admits by his plea of guilty that he has feloniously carried away such sheep, and that they were the personal property of persons who were known by the name of Townsend & Carey, the ordinary way of designating a partnership. It is hardly possible that the defendant was not fully aware of the nature of the crime charged against him in the indictment, and the persons who were the owners of the property he was alleged to have stolen. But while this is so, it is to be regretted that an indictment so easy to frame properly, should have been drawn, as was the one in hand, liable to be assailed most sharply. We advise that the judgment be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; GIBSON, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. ELLIOTT. (No. 20,495.)

CRIMINAL LAW—CHANGE OF VENUE—MURDER—EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. Under Pen. Code Cal. §§ 1033, 1035, allowing change of venue in a criminal case on application of defendant, on the ground that a fair and impartial trial cannot be had in the county in which the action is pending, and providing that, if the court is satisfied of the truth of defendant's representation, an order must be entered for the removal of the action to a county free from a like objection, the application is addressed to the discretion of the court, and, when supported by defendant's affidavit alone, a denial of the change will not be reversed on appeal.

2. An application for the issuance of subpœnas for witnesses to prove a ground for a change of venue is properly denied, where such application is supported only by the statement of defendant's attorney not made under oath, especially where it does not appear that the clerk had, on application, refused to issue the subpœnas, or that defendant could not procure the attendance of such witnesses.

3. Where it appears that accused was brought before the committing magistrate on the 28th day of April, and that by his consent the examination was set for and held on the 7th day of May, and it does not appear that he expressed a desire to have counsel appointed, the information will not be set aside on the ground that he was not given time to procure counsel and none was furnished him by the court at the preliminary hearing.

4. Where defendant, on trial for murder, was divorced from his wife, who lived upon a ranch belonging to her, and was allowed to visit his child in the custody of its mother, evidence of the wife that deceased, who was her uncle, at the time of his death was upon said ranch for the protection of herself and child from defendant, is irrelevant and prejudicial to defendant.

5. Where it is attempted upon cross-examination of a witness to show a discrepancy between her testimony and that given by her at the preliminary examination, and there is no such discrepancy, a statement by the court to that effect is not prejudicial error.

6. Under Pen. Code Cal. § 1105, providing that "upon a trial for murder, the commission of the homicide by the defendant being proved, the burden of proving circumstances of mitigation * * * devolves upon him, unless the proof on the part of the prosecution tends to show that the crime committed only amounts to manslaughter, or that the defendant was justifiable or excusable," where the proof for the prosecution tends to show a killing in self-defense, an unqualified instruction that after proof of the homicide the burden of proving mitigating circumstances is upon the defendant, is erroneous. THORNTON, J., dissenting.

7. An instruction that defendant must show such mitigating circumstances by "a preponderance of evidence" is erroneous. THORNTON, J., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Inyo county; JOHN A. HANNAH, Judge.

Information against W. T. C. Elliott for murder. Conviction and sentence; motion for new trial denied, and defendant appeals. Pen. Code Cal. §§ 1033, 1035, provides that a criminal action may be removed from the court in which it is pending on motion of the defendant, on the ground that a fair and impartial trial cannot be had in the county in which the cause is pending, and if the court is satisfied that the representation of the defendant is true, an order must be made for the removal of the action to the proper court of a county free from a like objection.

John R. Kittrell and Thos. E. Hayden, for appellant. George A. Johnson, Atty. Gen., for the People.

WORKS, J. The defendant was charged with the murder of one John B. White, convicted, and sentenced to death. His motion for a new trial was denied and he appeals. The following points are made in support of this appeal: (1) That the court below erred in overuling the demurrer to the information; (2) that the court erred in denying the defendant's motion for a change of venue; (3) that the court erred in not allowing the defendant subpœnas for witnesses to prove the grounds of his motion to change the venue; (4) that the defendant was not duly committed by a magistrate; (5) erroneous rulings of the court in the admission and exclusion of evidence; (6) improper statements made by the court in the presence of the jury with respect to the testimony of certain witnesses; (7) that the court erred in certain of its instructions given to the jury; (8) that the verdict was against and contrary to the evidence.

1. Counsel for appellant have not called our attention, in their brief, to any defect in the information, and we have discovered none. The information must therefore be held to have been sufficient.

2. The motion for a change of venue was properly denied for the reason that it was based upon the ground of bias and prejudice existing against the defendant in the county in which he was charged, and was supported by the affidavit of the defendant alone. Such an application is addressed to the discretion of the court below, and a denial of the change will not be reversed unless it clearly appears to this court that such discretion has been abused. Pen. Code, §§ 1033, 1035; People v. Fisher, 6 Cal. 154; People v. Mahoney, 18 Cal. 180; People v. Graham, 21 Cal. 261; People v. Congleton, 44 Cal. 92; People v. Goldenson, 76 Cal. 328, 19 Pac. Rep. 161. No such abuse of discretion is shown by the record.

3. The application to the court for the issuance of subpœnas for witnesses to prove the grounds of the application for change of venue was not supported by any legal showing, and was for that reason properly denied. It was based upon the mere statement of one of the attorneys for the defendant. The record states: "Counsel for defendant stated to the court, then in session, that he had talked with a number of persons in business of public official character, which brought them in daily or frequent contact with persons from all parts or sections of Inyo county, who had stated that everywhere in said county there was a widespread conviction that the defendant had, in cold blood and without justification or provocation, killed and murdered John B. White, an old, universally acquainted and esteemed citizen of Inyo county; that great excitement and bitterness existed against defendant, W. T. C. Elliott, and that a widespread disposition to execute him by lynch law prevailed throughout Inyo county, and that an impartial trial of defendant could not be reasonably anticipated; but that such persons refused to give their affidavits voluntarily to that effect, but that if brought before the court under process of subpœna would candidly state such facts as they knew and their unbiased opinions, and prayed the court to order subpœnas to be issued and served upon a number of credible persons occupying responsible offices or public places of business that defendant's counsel would name to the court."

These facts were not supported by the affidavit of the defendant, or any one else, in support of the application, and although the statement of counsel may have been entirely worthy of credit, the showing was not such as the court was bound to act upon. Besides, it does not appear that any such order was necessary. Subpœnas are not usually issued on the order of the court, but as a matter of course, on application to the clerk. There was no showing that a subpœna had been applied for and refused, or that the defendant was unable to procure the attendance of witnesses. While great care should be exercised by the lower courts, especially in capital cases, to see that the defendant has a fair and impartial trial, and that every facility to that end is afforded him, he has no right to ask the court to act, except upon a legal showing, under oath, of the facts necessary to call for such action.

4. It is contended that the defendant's motion to set aside the information should have been granted. The motion was based upon two grounds, viz., that the warrant issued by the examining magistrate was insufficient, and that the defendant was not given time to procure counsel and none was furnished him by the court at the preliminary hearing.

The last of these only is urged here. Conceding that the constitutional provision which makes it the duty of the court to appoint counsel for a defendant who is unable to employ one applies to preliminary examinations, it is shown by the affidavit of the district attorney that the defendant was brought before the committing magistrate on the 28th day of April, 1888, and was then and there informed by said magistrate of his right to counsel at all stages of the proceedings, and of the nature of the charge against him; that by consent of the defendant the examination of the case was set for Monday, the 7th day of May, 1888, at 10 o'clock A. M., and that on said day said examination was had. This certainly showed that the defendant was given ample time to procure counsel, and there is nothing in the record tending to show that he expressed any desire to have one appointed. We do not think the ground stated was one on which the information could properly have been set aside, but, if so, it was not sufficiently shown that any such ground existed.

5. The evidence was to the effect that the defendant killed the deceased by stabbing him with a butcher-knife. It also appears that the defendant's wife had lately procured a divorce from him; that she and her children by a former marriage were the owners of a ranch, upon which there was a dwelling-house and a small cabin; that, by the decree of divorce, the wife was given the custody of their child, with the privilege to the defendant of visiting it three times a week, which he did, and he was given the right to occupy the cabin on his wife's ranch for two months; that the deceased was an uncle of the defendant's wife and had, since the divorce, been staying with his niece a part of the time; that a few days before the death of the deceased he, without sufficient provocation, brutally attacked and beat the defendant with a club, inflicting a painful wound on the head; that at that time, while the defendant was smarting from the effect of the blow, he threatened to kill the deceased, and afterwards endeavored to borrow a revolver, saying that the deceased had beaten him once, and he wanted to be prepared for him; that the time for which the defendant was allowed by the decree of the court to occupy the cabin was about to expire, and the deceased showed great anxiety for him to get out, and announced his purpose of removing him therefrom at once; that the defendant came to a man who was working on the ranch and said to him, "I have stabbed White in the cellar; go up and look and see how he is getting along. I think he is badly hurt;" that the man went to the cabin in a few minutes and found the deceased lying a few feet from the cabin, on the road, dead, with a knife wound in his chest; that the defendant passed on and notified others of the occurrence in substantially the same words, and requested that an officer be sent for to take him in charge.

The claim of the defendant at the trial was that the deceased attacked him in the cellar of his cabin while he was in the act of cutting some meat that was hanging there, for his dinner, and that he stabbed him with the knife he was using, while it was claimed on the other side that the defendant had laid in wait and killed the deceased while he was passing along the road. There was no witness to the killing except the defendant. He testified, "I ran from the cellar door." "Question. What occurred there? Answer. I was in the act of taking the meat down and I heard a step on the cellar steps. I turned to look and I saw the last foot of some one stepping off the lower step. I saw the side of the man approaching and Mr. White shoved the door open. Q. How did he shove the door open? A. I can't say whether with his hand or with a stick. Q. What was then said or done? A. He said, 'What are you doing here? Get out of this cabin or I will beat you to death, you son of a bitch.' Q. What did he do then? A. I said, 'Let me out,' and sprang for the door. Q. What did he do or say? A. He threw up his cane, and as I made the spring I drew my left arm in guard and struck with my right. Q. What did you strike with? A. With the knife that I had picked up. Q. What then occurred? A. Mr. White then ran out of the cellar, and I too. Q. Where did he go? A. He ran out and turned down north the road or lane. Q. What did you do? A. I ran from the cellar door. Q. Show where you ran? A. From the cellar door east down this way to where I saw Kinney plowing. Q. What did you say then? A. I told Kinney that White had attacked me in the old cellar and that I had cut him, and for him to go and see him, as I was afraid that I had cut him badly." There was contradictory testimony of physicians on the question whether White could have traveled from where the defendant claimed to have stabbed him to the place where his body was found, after having received the wound from which he died. With this brief summary of the evidence we pass to a consideration of the questions presented as to the rulings in the admission and exclusion of evidence.

The divorced wife was a witness for the prosecution. She had testified to the striking of the defendant by White and the threats then made by the former, and in explanation of the presence of White at the house, during his stay there, she was asked, "What was the business of John B. White, the deceased, on the Baker ranch when he made his last visit there, at the time he was killed?" This was objected to, on the ground that it was immaterial and irrelevant, and that it was hearsay, as she could only know it from declarations of White. Counsel announced that they desired to show that White was not a trespasser on the ranch, but was there for a lawful purpose and a legitimate and chivalric one. The objection was overruled, and the witness answered, "He was there for the protection of me and my child against W. T. C. Elliott," the defendant. The defendant moved to strike out the answer for the same reasons, and the motion was denied. These rulings were erroneous. The evidence was entirely irrelevant. The case presented no question as to the right of the deceased to be on the ranch of Mrs. Elliott, and it could hardly be contended that it was necessary for him to attack the defendant in his cellar in order to protect Mrs. Elliott and her child. Nor can it be said that the testimony was harmless. The fact that it was necessary, or even supposed to be necessary, to protect the former wife and infant child of the defendant, as against him, could not but prejudice the minds of the jury, and as we regard the verdict of the jury, which must result in the severest penalty, as scarcely warranted by the evidence, we cannot say that the substantial rights of the defendant were not affected by this ruling.

It is further contended that the court did not allow the witness Fannie Elliott to be fully and freely cross-examined. We cannot concur in this view with the record before us. We trust that the cases are rare in which so much time is allowed to be taken up with immaterial and useless questions, on cross-examination, many of which were repeated over and over again without apparent reason. If the court erred at all in this respect it was in allowing the witnesses, including Mrs. Elliott, to be too freely cross-examined.

In the cross-examination of this witness it was attempted to show that there was a discrepancy between her testimony at the trial and that given by her at the preliminary examination. In the course of the examination of the witness on this point the court said, "I cannot see any discrepancy in her testimony upon the preliminary examination and her testimony to-day." To this remark the defendant excepted, and contends that it was error. Certainly a statement of this kind by the court was improper, but we, like the court below, cannot see the discrepancy, and for that reason must hold that the statement did the defendant no harm.

There are other points made relating to the evidence. We have given them careful attention, and without extending this opinion by noticing them in detail, we hold that none of such rulings were erroneous.

The court instructed the jury as follows: "The killing being proved, the burden of proving circumstances of mitigation to justify or excuse the homicide will devolve on the accused. Up to the moment when the killing is proved the prosecution must make out its case beyond a reasonable doubt. When the killing is proved it devolves upon the defendant to show any circumstances in mitigation to excuse or justify by a preponderance of evidence on his part. That is, the killing being proved, the defendant must make out his case in mitigation to excuse or justify by some proof stronger in some appreciable degree than the proof of the prosecution. It must be in some degree, no matter how small, stronger than the proof of the prosecution on the other side. You are not bound to decide in conformity with the declarations of any number of witnesses, which do not produce conviction in your minds, against a less number, or against a presumption or other evidence satisfying your minds." This instruction was erroneous The Penal Code provides: "Sec. 1105. Upon a trial for murder, the commission of the homicide by the defendant being proved, the burden of proving circumstances of mitigation, or that justify or excuse it, devolves upon him, unless the proof on the part of the prosecution tends to show that the crime committed only amounts to manslaughter, or that the defendant was justifiable or excusable." The latter clause of the section was entirely omitted from the instruction. The most important testimony of the prosecution was that of the admissions of the defendant that he had killed the deceased, and such admissions tended strongly to show "that the crime committed only amounted to manslaughter, or that the defendant was justifiable or excusable." Therefore it was important that the instruction, which cast the burden of proof on him, should be qualified in accordance with the section of the Code on which it was based. People v. Arnold, 15 Cal. 476, 482; People v. Ah Kong, 49 Cal. 7; People v. West, Id. 611; People v. Smith, 59 Cal. 607; People v. Langton, 67 Cal. 428, 7 Pac. Rep. 843. The instruction was erroneous, for the further reason that it cast upon the defendant the burden of proving circumstances of mitigation or that justified or excused the commission of the homicide by a preponderance of the evidence, when it was only necessary that he should introduce evidence sufficient to raise a reasonable doubt as to his guilt or the mitigating circumstances. People v. Bushton, ante, 127.

It is contended that the verdict was contrary to the evidence. We have read the evidence carefully, and must confess to some surprise that a verdict of murder in the first degree, with the death penalty, should have been returned, but we are not prepared to say that the jury were absolutely wrong in their conclusion. It has a tendency, however, to convince us that the motion of the defendant to remove the cause to another county for trial was well founded, and should have been granted.

Judgment and order reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: Beatty, C. J.; McFarland, J.; Sharpstein, J.; Paterson, J.; Fox, J.

Thornton, J. I concur in the judgment on the ground that the court below erred in allowing the question quoted in the foregoing opinion to be put to the witness Fannie Elliott and in admitting her answer thereto. In my opinion, the instructions held to be erroneous in the foregoing are not erroneous. People v. Hong Ah Duck, 61 Cal. 387, People v. Raten, 63 Cal. 421.

Banning et al. v. Banning. (No. 12,932.)

Deeds—Acknowledgment—Married Woman.

Evidence that a party to a deed is a married woman, and was not present before the notary who took her acknowledgment through a telephone when she was three miles distant, is not admissible to dispute the official certificate of the notary in due form, in the absence of any allegations of fraud, duress, or mistake.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; H. K. S. O'MELVENEY, Judge.

Action by H. Banning, William Banning, and J. B. Banning against Mary H. Banning for partition of land. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals.

Houghton, Silent & Campbell and J. S. Chapman, for appellant. Smith & Patton and F. H. Howard, for respondents.

VANCLIEF, C. Action for partition of land. The complaint is in the most general form, alleging that the parties own the land as tenants in common, and specifying the undivided portion to which each party is entitled. The answer denies that either of the plaintiffs has any estate in the land, and alleges that the defendant is the sole and exclusive owner and in the exclusive possession thereof. In addition to her answer the defendant filed what she denominated a cross-complaint, which, in substance, was only a repetition of her answer. The plaintiffs unnecessarily answered this so-called cross-complaint by repeating the substance of their complaint, and further alleging, among other things, that they derived title to the undivided portion of the land claimed by each of them directly from the defendant. Upon these pleadings a trial was had, and, on August 2, 1888, the court made and signed written findings upon all the issues in favor of the plaintiffs, and especially found that "the aforesaid interests of the plaintiffs are all and each of them deraigned from the defendant by conveyances from the defendant to the plaintiffs respectively, by her duly signed, acknowledged, and delivered to the plaintiffs respectively." After the aforesaid findings were written and signed, the court, at the request of the defendant, made and signed additional findings on a separate paper, which was filed August 3, 1888; and the original findings of August 2d were also filed on August 3d, on which day the interlocutory decree in favor of plaintiffs, from which this appeal is taken, was filed.

The appeal rests upon the judgment-roll alone, including the additional findings; and appellant's counsel contend that the findings do not support the judgment, for the reason that they do not show that defendant executed the deeds to the plaintiffs by which plaintiffs claim title. The special and only ground of objection to the sufficiency of the execution of those deeds is that at the time the deeds were acknowledged the defendant was a married woman, and was not visibly, and therefore not personally, present before the notary at the time he took her acknowledgment through a telephone, she then being three miles distant from him, as appears by the additional findings. The answer to this objection is that, in the absence of fraud, duress, accident, and mistake, the certificate of the notary in due form of law is conclusive of the material facts therein stated. The facts stated in the additional findings were not admissible as evidence to dispute the official certificate of the notary; and, if admitted, should have been disregarded, as they evidently were, by the trial court. It is admitted that the certificate of the notary is in due form; and it is not alleged or pretended by the defendant that she did not voluntarily sign and deliver the deeds; nor that she did not voluntarily, and without the hearing of her husband, acknowledge the execution of them through the telephone, after having been informed by the notary of their contents; nor that any deception or fraud was practiced to induce her to execute the deeds; nor even that the plaintiffs had notice of the manner in which it is alleged that she acknowledged the execution through the telephone. These particulars are not stated for the purpose of maintaining that, under any circumstances, an acknowledgment of a deed may be taken through a telephone, but for the sole purpose of showing that there is no pretense of fraud, duress, or mistake.

In De Arnaz v. Escandon, 59 Cal. 489, the court below had found that the defendant, a married woman, had acknowledged a deed through an interpreter, who did not correctly interpret the contents of the deed, but misrepresented the deed as being a mortgage to secure the payment of $3,000, when in fact it was an absolute deed. This court said: "But it is not alleged, found, or claimed that the plaintiff had any notice of those facts. It is clear, therefore, that the notary's certificate is conclusive as to the facts stated in it." Citing Jones, Mortg. § 538; Grant v. White, 57 Cal. 141; Baldwin v. Snowden, 11 Ohio St. 203.

In Grant v. White, supra, this court said "We do not see that fraud or imposition was practiced upon her at the time of the execution of the mortgage. * * * We think the rule, regarding the execution of instruments by married women, is correctly stated by Mr. Jones, in his work on Mortgages, § 538." In the section referred to, Mr. Jones says: "As to statements of fact contained in a certificate of acknowledgment which is regular in form, such, for instance, as the fact that the grantor appeared and acknowledged the execution of the instrument, they can only be impeached for fraud. Evidence which is merely in contradiction of the facts certified to will not be received." To the same effect is the decided weight of authority in other states. I think the judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; HAYNE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is affirmed.

DALY v. SOROCCO et al. (No. 13,119.)

QUIETING TITLE—FINDINGS.

1. In an action to quiet title a finding that plaintiff was not the owner of the property in controversy, and was not entitled to possession thereof, is a finding of the fact in issue, and is sufficient without a finding of the facts respecting such ownership.

2. As the right to maintain the action is based wholly on the ownership and right to possession, a failure to find on certain other issues is not cause for reversal.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Plumas county; F. D. SOWARD, Judge.

John Gale and F. B. Whiting, for appellant. Goodwin & Goodwin, for respondents.

WORKS, J. Action to quiet title, and for an injunction. The complaint contained the usual allegations of ownership and right to possession in the plaintiff, and certain other facts, the only object or purpose of which must have been to obtain the injunction prayed for. The answers of the defendants put in issue the allegations of the complaint, and certain affirmative matters were pleaded. The court found that the plaintiff was not the owner of the property in controversy at the time the action was commenced, and was not entitled to the possession thereof. There were certain other special findings immaterial to the question presented on this appeal.

The appellant contends that the finding that the plaintiff was not the owner of the property was a finding of a conclusion, and that the facts showing that he was not the owner should have been found. If so, the plaintiff's complaint was bad also. It alleged the ownership as a fact, and the finding was as broad and as specific as the allegation of the appellant's pleading. But the finding was sufficient. Where a party alleges his ownership of real estate in an action of this kind, a finding that he was or was not such owner is a finding of a fact,—the fact in issue,—and the evidence going to prove such ownership need not, and should not, be pleaded or found. Payne v. Treadwell, 16 Cal. 247; Smith v. Acker, 52 Cal. 217; Frazier v. Crowell, Id. 399; Murphy v. Bennett, 68 Cal. 528, 9 Pac. Rep. 738.

The appellant further contends that the cause should be reversed because the court failed to find upon certain other issues presented. But his right to maintain the action was based wholly on his ownership and right to possession, and these being found against him, it was immaterial to him whether the court found as to the other facts or not, as the judgment must have been against him whatever the other findings might have been. Under such circumstances the failure to find on certain issues is not cause for reversal. McCourtney v. Fortune, 57 Cal. 617; Murphy v. Bennett, supra.

We concur: BEATTY, C. J.; MCFARLAND, J.; SHARPSTEIN, J.; PATERSON, J.; THORNTON, J.

SANSOME v. SUPERIOR COURT. (No. 20,452.)

BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—SETTLEMENT AND SIGNING.

A trial judge is not justified in refusing to "settle" a bill of exceptions on the ground that it is inaccurate, untrue in many respects, deficient in statement, and contains a mere skeleton of the testimony, where he does not direct petitioner to make amendments, and the adverse party offers none.

In bank. On petition for mandamus.

John Sansome sues for a writ of mandate to compel B. F. Myres, Judge, superior court, Placer county, to settle a bill of exceptions.

L. L. Chamberlain and A. L. Hart, for petitioner. F. P. Tuttle, Dist. Atty., and John M. Fulweiler, for respondent.

WORKS, J. A statement of this case will be found in 77 Cal. 353, (Sansome v. Myres, 19 Pac. Rep. 577,) where the allegations of the respondent's answer are stated. We there held that the answer was sufficient. Subsequently the issues arising upon the petition and answer were referred for trial and determination to Hon. W. C. VAN FLEET, judge of the superior court of Sacramento county, with directions to report his findings to this court, which he has done. The findings are as follows: "(1) That said proposed bill was noticed for settlement on the 17th day of April, 1888, and was on said day called up by petitioner's counsel before said respondent, judge, for settlement, but was at the request of the district attorney continued to the 24th day of April, without at that time any examination or discussion of its contents. On said 24th day of April, petitioner's counsel again called said proposed bill to the attention of respondent, at which time the district attorney, through his assistant, objected to the settlement of said bill, on the ground that it was not a fair and truthful statement of the proceedings at the trial, and was a mere skeleton thereof. These objections were verbally made during the argument by counsel in which he went over said proposed bill, and pointed out what he conceived to be the defects and objectionable features thereof. During a reply to this argument, by the petitioner's counsel, the proceedings were interrupted by other business of the court, and the further hearing of said matter was continued by respondent to the 1st day of May. On that date, counsel for the prosecution being absent, the matter was again postponed, and no further consideration thereof had until the 8th day of May. At this last date the prosecution renewed their objection to the settlement of said bill, and after some argument by both parties, the respondent refused to settle said bill, and made his indorsement thereon, wherein he set forth his reasons for said refusal. Said indorsement will be found attached to said original proposed bill, which is hereafter referred to, and made part of these findings. The prosecution did not at any time present amendments to said proposed bill, but contended that it was a mere skeleton, and that neither they nor the respondent were called upon to amend the same, or make it truly present the facts; and that it was petitioner's duty to present to respondent a fair and truthful bill for settlement. The petitioner, contending that said bill was good and sufficient in substance, did not at any time ask permission to correct or amend the same; nor did the respondent at any time make any direction or suggestion to the petitioner's counsel to take said proposed bill and amend or change it in any respect; and the statement in the answer of respondent herein that continuances of the settlement were had to enable petitioner to present a full and fair bill is not sustained by the evidence, but is repudiated by the respondent. (2) That the document marked 'Exhibit B,' hereunto attached and made part of these findings, is the original proposed bill of exceptions as the same was presented by petitioner herein to the respondent for settlement, together with the respondent's indorsement at the end thereof showing his refusal to settle said bill; and that the document marked 'Exhibit C,' hereunto attached and made part hereof, is a transcript of the reporter's notes of the testimony of the proceedings had and taken at the trial of the case of People v. Sansome, and upon which said proposed bill of exceptions is based. (3) NOTE—Petitioner desired a finding upon the questions raised by respondent's answer as to whether the proposed bill is a fair one or merely a skeleton. This I refused for the reasons stated on page 16 of Exhibit A, and because I conceived that question can only be answered by an inspection of the record which is before this honorable court, and involved, to my mind, if not a question of law purely, at least a mixed question of law and fact, upon which it was not my province to pass." The reasons of the respondent for refusing to settle the proposed statement were stated in his indorsement on the same, which was as follows: "The within bill of exceptions being this day finally submitted to me for settlement, I hereby refuse to settle the same upon the ground that it is inaccurate, and, in many respects, untrue, and contains but a meagre and partial statement of the facts and proceedings leading up to, and connected with, and upon which the rulings of the court therein were had that are complained of, and, also, a mere defective skeleton of the testimony and evidence submitted to the jury, and upon which they rendered their verdict of guilty."

We do not regard these as sufficient grounds for refusing to settle a statement. If anything was omitted from the statement, or any matter was incorrectly stated, it was the duty of the district attorney to propose such amendments as would correct the omissions or errors. His failure to do his duty in this respect did not justify the respondent in arbitrarily refusing to act in the matter. As was said in the former decision in this case, it was not the duty of the judge to prepare a statement, but it was his duty to see that one was properly prepared, and then sign it. If the attorney for the petitioner had omitted anything material the judge should have directed and required him to insert it; or if matter was incorrectly stated he should have required him to correct it, if the district attorney had neglected his duty by failing to propose the necessary amendments, which he seems to have done. If the petitioner had refused or neglected to so correct the proposed statement as directed, the judge would, no doubt, have been justified in refusing to settle the same, but not otherwise. This the findings show was not done. The respondent refused in the first instance to settle the statement, not to sign it. This we think he had no right to do. To so hold would place it in the power of the trial judge to deprive a litigant of his right of appeal by simply refusing to perform a plain duty. We must not be understood as intending to justify the too prevalent habit on the part of some attorneys of presenting an imperfect statement, thereby casting upon opposing counsel and the court the labor of piecing out, and making complete, a statement that should have been made perfect by the appealing party in the first instance. Such a course, whether it results from a design to gain an undue advantage, or from indolence, should be severely condemned, and the party practicing it should be required by the judge to make and present a proper statement.

It is evident that the proposed statement in this case was prepared by a novice. It is unskillfully drawn, but we cannot say that it was prepared with a view to obtain an undue advantage in this court. It may be, as is contended, that the evidence was not set out as fully as it should have been, but as the evidence was all taken down in short-hand, the defect can be remedied without serious inconvenience to the respondent. In the preparation of a statement, the evidence should be condensed and put in narrative form. To set out the questions and answers in full is unnecessary, and only increases the labor of this court, and the expense of the appeal.

We think the petitioner is entitled to have his statement settled as prayed for, and that the peremptory writ should issue. It is so ordered.

We concur: SHARPSTEIN, J.; FOX, J.

MCFARLAND, J. I concur in the judgment upon the grounds—First, that if the document presented was not in reality a bill of exceptions that fact should have been called to the attention of the attorney presenting it; the judge should have informed him that for such reason the document would not be considered as a bill of exceptions, and that he must prepare a real bill within a reasonable time; and, second, that the document presented in the present instance was not so entirely defective as to justify the treatment which it received. But I do not subscribe to the doctrine (apparently stated in the majority opinion) that no matter how fraudulent and worthless a document may be that is presented and called a "bill" or "statement," still the judge, or opposing counsel, must either prepare a bill himself, or suggest in detail what the bill should be. In such a case the judge has a right to say to the attorney for appellant: "This thing which you give me is a fraud; I will not consider it; I will give you a reasonable time within which to prepare something that will be, not a mere name, but a real bill within the meaning of the Code; and, if you do not do so, I will take no further action in the matter."

BEATTY, C. J., (concurring.) In addition to what has been said by Mr. Justice WORKS, in whose conclusion and views I concur, I wish to say that in my opinion the fault imputed to the proposed bill of exceptions in question here, viz., that it is too meager, is one that is entitled to some indulgence. The great and crying evil is not that such drafts are too short, but that they are generally too long, and that being allowed substantially on the scale and in the form in which they are presented, the counties are burdened with the expense of transcribing or printing masses of rubbish which serve merely to cumber the records, and waste the time of this court. We have decided that the judges of the superior courts are justified in refusing to settle a bill of exceptions, where the draft proposed contains a full transcript of the short-hand notes of the trial, (People v. Sprague, 53 Cal. 423,) and over and over again we have called attention to section 1175 of the Penal Code, which provides: "A bill of exceptions must contain so much of the evidence only as is necessary to present the questions of law upon which the exceptions were taken; and the judge must, upon the settlement of the bill, whether agreed to by the parties or not, strike out all other matters contained therein." Possibly some good has been accomplished by these admonitions, but the evil referred to, if ameliorated, is by no means cured. For this reason, I repeat that if counsel in a particular case happens to commit the unusual error of making his draft too brief, the fault is one that merits some indulgence, especially as it cannot result in any very serious inconvenience to the judge who is called upon to settle the bill of exceptions. In our practice the motion for a new trial is always made before judgment (Pen. Code, § 1182) and without any preliminary statement of the evidence or specifications of error. People v. Fisher, 51 Cal. 319. If one of the grounds of the motion is that the verdict is contrary to the evidence, that ground will generally be abandoned after the motion is overruled in all cases where there is a substantial conflict of evidence upon the material issues, and there will be no exception to the order on the ground that the evidence is insufficient. If, however, the defendant insists upon presenting the question of the sufficiency of the evidence to this court upon appeal, he is forbidden to make a complete transcript of the reporter's notes into his proposed bill of exceptions, and must put the testimony of the witnesses in narrative form with as little repetition as possible. In attempting to do this every lawyer, even the most experienced, is liable to err on one side or the other, and usually, as we have seen, his error is in the direction of unnecessary prolixity. In such case it is made the duty of the judge who settles the bill of exceptions to strike out all redundant and superfluous matter, as well as to see that what remains conforms to the truth. This necessarily involves a careful reading and comparison of the draft with the reporter's notes or other record of the proceedings, and it follows, of course, that the longer the draft the greater is the amount of labor imposed upon the judge. If on the other hand it happens, as in this case, that the draft of the bill contains no adequate statement of the evidence, it is a very simple matter, involving a trifling amount of labor, to remedy the defect. If the omissions are comparatively slight the judge, with the assistance of the district attorney, may suggest the necessary amendments. If the omissions are serious and extensive counsel may be required to present a full statement of the evidence for the people, or to abandon his exception on the ground of insufficiency of the evidence. If he refuses or neglects to do either then the judge would be justified in adding to his statement of the evidence a general statement that other evidence was introduced on the part of the people tending to prove all the allegations of the indictment or information, which is all that would be necessary to render the exception harmless.

As to other grounds of exception, the statement of evidence necessary to present them fairly is usually short, and even when it is unfairly set out in the draft no great amount of labor is ordinarily required to amend it. It is better in my opinion that the judge, with the advice and assistance of the district attorney, should perform such labor than refuse to settle the bill of exceptions upon the ground that counsel preparing the draft has attempted to practice a fraud upon the court, unless the evidence of such design is far more gross and manifest than it can be said to be in this case.

Boundaries—Evidence.

1. Upon an issue as to the location of a line of the government survey, evidence of the location of monuments is not overcome by field-notes of the original survey, taken at the time of the erection of said monuments or subsequent thereto.

2. As between complicated descriptions of a line dividing two sections or quarter sections, that one is to be adopted which is most in conformity with the monument established by the government survey.

3. As between different monuments, those best identified should prevail, independent of anything in the field-notes of the original or any subsequent survey.

4. Where it is doubtful which of two lines of monuments is the true government line, other things being equal, that one is to be so considered which most nearly conforms to the field-notes.

McFarland, J., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; M. K. Harris, Judge.

Ejectment by H. Hubbard against Frank Dusy and William M. Cooledge. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal.

Wharton & Short, for appellants. S. J. Hinds, for respondent.

Per Curiam. Action of ejectment tried by a jury. Verdict and judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal from the judgment, and from an order denying their motion for a new trial.

The determination of the issue depended solely upon the true location of a line of the government survey between townships 14 and 15 S., M. D. B. and M., it being admitted that the plaintiff owned the demanded premises described in his complaint as "the S. ½ of the S. E. ¼ of section 31, township 14 S., range 22 E., M. D. B. and M., lying immediately north of and adjoining the N. E. ¼ of section 6, township 15 S.," but denied that it included the land in dispute, it being claimed by defendants that the land in dispute is a part of N. E. ¼ of section 6, township 15.

The statement on motion for new trial shows that evidence was introduced and witnesses examined tending to prove the allegations of the complaint, and that the land in dispute was within the south half of the quarter section owned by plaintiff; but does not state the evidence or testimony thus tending to prove plaintiff's case. The statement also shows that evidence was introduced on the part of the defendants tending to prove the denials and allegations of their answer, and that the land in dispute was in the N. E. ¼ of section 6, township 15, "including a duly certified copy of the original field-notes of the United States government survey of the south boundary line of township 14 S., range 22 E., M. D. M.;" but contains no other statement of the evidence tending to prove the defense. The only questions presented for decision relate to the propriety of the instructions given to the jury, as to the effect of the field-notes of the government survey as evidence of the true location of the township line.

At request of plaintiff's counsel the court gave to the jury, among others, the following instructions: First. "Evidence has been introduced by plaintiff tending to prove the existence of a monument fixed by the United States survey at the S. E. corner of section 31; and, also, evidence tending to prove a like monument at the S. W. corner of the land claimed by Mr. Hubbard on the middle south line of said section 31. Now the court instructs you that if you believe from the evidence that these two monuments have been established by plaintiff, and the disputed land is north of said monument, as claimed by plaintiff, then said evidence is not overcome by any field-notes of the original survey taken at the time said monuments were found to have been erected; nor will such evidence be overcome by the field-notes or courses or distance of any subsequent survey. When there are complicated descriptions of a line dividing two sections or two quarter sections of land, that one must be adopted which is most stable and certain, and which is more in conformity with the monument established by the United States government survey, and which would be least likely to mistake or be affected by error. Second. Monuments left by the United States survey on the grounds are the best evidence as to where the land should be, and any monument so established can only be antagonized by evidence of other monuments. As between different monuments, the jury should look to the evidence identifying them, and those monuments best identified should prevail, independent of anything even in the field-notes of the original or any subsequent survey." At the request of the defendants' counsel, the court gave among others the following, except that the third, as requested, did not contain the words "other things being equal," which were inserted by the court as an amendment to the instruction, as requested. "First. The court instructs you that you are to find where the true corners are located on the line in dispute, not from any isolated part of the testimony, but from a full and careful consideration of all of the testimony relative thereto. Second. I further instruct you that in the absence of monuments the field-notes would govern and determine the true line. Third. I further instruct you, in case there are two lines of monuments, or supposed monuments, so located as to render it doubtful which is the true line of government monuments, then, other things being equal, the monuments, or line of monuments, most nearly conforming to the field-notes would be most likely to be, and would be considered to be, the true government corner or corners."

Counsel for appellants contend that the court erred in giving the first and second instructions reqested by plaintiff, and in refusing the third instruction as requested by defendants, and in giving it as amended by the court, for the reason that each of these instructions denied to the field-notes of the government survey proper and lawful effect as evidence tending to prove the location of said township line as actually surveyed by the government of the United States.

We have examined the instructions complained of, and are of opinion that they fairly and correctly directed the jury as to the law bearing on the case. Judgment and order affirmed.

People v. Fitzpatrick. (No. 20,551.)

Receiving Stolen Goods—View—Objections Waived—Instructions.

1. Though an order on a trial for receiving stolen property, that the jury be taken to view an animal alleged to be one of the cattle stolen, is not within Pen. Code Cal. § 1119, authorizing similar orders whenever, in the opinion of the court, it is proper that the jury should view the "place" in which a material fact occurred, and though such inspection was not conducted as a part of the regular trial, those objections cannot be raised for the first time on appeal.

2. An instruction under which the jury might have found defendant guilty, though he had not received all the cattle mentioned in the indictment, is not erroneous, as the value of the property is not a material element of the offense.

G. G. Goucher and L. J. Maddux, for appellant. George A. Johnson, Atty. Gen., for the People.

McFarland, J. The defendant was convicted of the crime of receiving personal property (several head of cattle) knowing the same to have been stolen; and he appeals from the judgment and from an order denying a new trial.

1. What, at first glance, seems to be the most important contention made by appellant is that the court erred in ordering the jury to be conducted to a corral, to view a certain steer alleged to have been one of the cattle stolen. The court seems to have thought that the order was permissible under section 1119 of the Penal Code. But that section only provides that a similar order may be made "when, in the opinion of the court, it is proper that the jury should view the place in which the offense is charged to have been committed, or in which any other material fact occurred;" and as a steer is not a "place," it is quite evident that the order made in the case at bar is not within the provision of that section of the Code. If, therefore, the proper objection to the proceeding had been made by appellant, a very serious question would have arisen. It is true that the order of the court recites that "the reporter, clerk, deputy sheriff, judge of the court, and the defendant, will accompany the jury in this view, and the defendant's counsel;" but it does not appear that they did so, or that the court assembled at the place where the steer was, as an organized court, and conducted the examination in the usual way, as a part of the regular trial. The order appointed Samuel Miller, one of the witnesses, "to show and point out said animal to the jury." There does not appear to have been any opportunity for counsel to examine or cross-examine Miller, or to call the attention of the jury to the particular features of the brands and marks on the animal about which there was a conflict of evidence. The record merely states that "the jury inspected the steer." It is difficult to see, therefore, how the proceeding can be taken out of the rule that a jury must base its verdict upon evidence regularly introduced before it during the trial, and must not receive evidence out of court; although it seems to have been countenanced in People v. Bonney, 19 Cal. 446.

But the appellant did not object upon the ground that the proceeding itself was irregular, illegal, or unauthorized, and the attention of the court was not called in any way to that view of the subject. The ground of the objection to the order was that "the animal in question has not been shown to be in the same condition it was when the animal is alleged to have been received by the defendant." To which counsel for the prosecution responded: "We don't claim the brand is the same; but that the ear-marks and dewlap is the same." The order for the view having then been made, counsel for defendant said: "To which order the defendant excepts on grounds heretofore stated in objecting to the motion." He then asked the court as to the scope of the investigation, and the court replied that the order was that "the jury inspect this steer, and they can examine all parts of him. That is the extent of the order of the court." Whereupon counsel for the defendant said: "To which we will except, and I will ask the court to instruct the jury not to inspect the brand, as it has been shown to have been changed." The court denied the motion, and defendant excepted. These are all the objections and exceptions upon the point. If the attention of the court below had been called to what is now claimed to have been the vice of the proceeding, the ruling might have been different; but the objections which were then made were untenable, and we do not think that, under the circumstances, the appellant should be heard to make here for the first time the point which he now urges. It may be remarked that sending a jury out to view premises, even when clearly within section 1119, Pen. Code, is a hazardous proceeding, and frequently leads to difficulties; and it would be well for trial courts not to make use of the power therein given except in cases which seem to imperatively call for it.

2. There was no error in the instructions given to the jury; and they were quite favorable to defendant. The contention of appellant on this point is that, under the instructions, the jury might have found the defendant guilty, although it had not been proved that he had received all the cattle mentioned in the indictment. But that was not error. The character or grade of the statutory crime with which appellant was charged did not depend upon the value of the property received by him; and it was not necessary to prove either that he had received all the property stated in the indictment or that the part which he did receive was of a particular value. Bish. Crim. Proc. § 723.

3. Appellant objected to testimony of witness Miller as to defendant's manner at the time of his arrest. But all that Miller said was that when defendant was arrested "he got very mad;" "he got boisterous;" and "stamped, and said it was a disgrace to be arrested, and he had a very creditable people, much more so than I had." It is unnecessary to inquire into the admissibility of this testimony, for we do not see how it could possibly have been injurious to appellant.

4. There are no other points necessary to be noticed in detail. Miller showed sufficient knowledge about the brands and cattle marks to testify upon the subject, although not familiar with particular brands used in certain counties. The testimony to impeach the witness Fagan was properly admitted. The testimony of Miller as to William Carter was admissible, as it tended to prove that the cattle had been stolen. The evidence was sufficient to support the verdict, and we see no material error in the record.

The judgment and order affirmed.

McDANIEL v. CUMMINGS. (No. 13,173.)

SURFACE WATER—UNOBSTRUCTED FLOW.

Under Civil Code Cal. § 801, providing that the right of receiving water from or discharging it upon land, and "the right of having water flow without diminution or disturbance of any kind," may be attached as easements to other lands, the owner of upper land is entitled to the natural and unobstructed flow of the surface water on and across adjoining land, and if the common-law rule is otherwise it is abrogated by Pol. Code Cal. § 4468, providing that the common law is the rule of decision "so far as it is not repugnant to or inconsistent with the constitution of the United States, or the constitution or laws of this state."

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Colusa county; E. A. BRIDGFORD, Judge.

H. M. Albery, for appellant. Edwin Swinford and John T. Harrington, for respondent.

WORKS, J. The appellant being the owner of lands above and adjoining the lands of the respondent, the surface water from the lands flowed, naturally, on and across the lands of the latter. To prevent such flow the respondent constructed a dam on the line of his lands, thereby obstructing the waters and backing them onto the appellant's lands to his damage. This action was brought to enjoin the respondent from thus obstructing the flow of the water as stated. A temporary injunction was issued, but was subsequently dissolved by the court below on the ground that, by the law of this state, the respondent had the right to obstruct and prevent the flow of the waters across his lands, although, by so doing, he overflowed and injured the lands of appellant. This court has held directly to the contrary in a well-considered case. Ogburn v. Connor, 46 Cal. 347.

We are informed by the opinion of the learned judge of the court below, set out in the transcript, that he proceeded on the theory that by section 4468 of the Political Code the common law is made the rule of decision in this state, and that by the common law this action could not be maintained. But, conceding that such is the common-law rule, the section of the Code referred to only makes the common law the rule of decision "so far as it is not repugnant to or inconsistent with the constitution of the United States, or the constitution or laws of this state."

Section 801 of our Civil Code provides: "The following land burdens, or servitudes upon land, may be attached to other lands as incidents or appurtenances, and are then called 'easements.' * * * 9. The right of receiving water from or discharging the same upon land. * * * 11. The right of having water flow without diminution or disturbance of any kind." The appellant had the right, as an incident to his lands, to have the surface waters that might accumulate thereon flow on and across the respondent's lands, as they were accustomed to flow naturally; and the common law, conceding it to be as contended by the respondent, is clearly in conflict with this plain provision of the Code, and can have no application to the question presented.

We are of the opinion that the rule laid down in Ogburn v. Connor, supra, is eminently just and right, and that it should not be disturbed. Order reversed.

STATE COURTS—JURISDICTION—MISDEMEANORS.

The superior court of the city and county of San Francisco has no jurisdiction to try a conspiracy with intent to murder, as that is a misdemeanor. Following Green v. Superior Court, 21 Pac. Rep. 307.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. F. SULLIVAN, Judge.

Davis Louderback and Alex Campbell, for appellants. George A. Johnson, Atty. Gen., for the People.

FOOTE, C. The defendants were charged by indictment with the commission of a misdemeanor, in that they conspired, combined, and agreed together, feloniously to kill and murder a certain W. B. Drew. The defendants demurred to the indictment upon the ground, among others, that the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, in which they stood indicted, and by which they were to be tried, was without jurisdiction to consider and determine their cause. The demurrer was overruled, and a trial had before a jury. The defendants were convicted as charged. From the judgment therein rendered, and an order denying them a new trial, they have appealed.

The principles of law involved in this case, as affecting the jurisdiction of the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco to try an offense such as the one in hand, were fully discussed and plainly declared in the case of Green v. Superior Court, 21 Pac. Rep. 307, and the conclusion reached in favor of the defendants' contention that the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco had no jurisdiction to try a misdemeanor. It follows, therefore, that the judgment and order should be reversed, and we so advise.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; HAYNE, C.

SILVESTER et al. v. COE QUARTZ MINE Co. (No. 13,109.)

MINES—MECHANICS' LIENS—EVIDENCE.

1. Under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1183, giving to material-men a lien on property for the construction, repair, or alteration of which they have furnished materials, those who have furnished materials for the construction of a hoisting and pumping works building, pipes, gallows frame, and track, under a single contract with a mining company, have a lien on the whole mine, and not on the several structures merely, since they form a part of the mine itself.

2. In order to secure the lien, notice of it need not be given within 30 days after the completion of each of the several structures, but after the completion of the entire work.

3. A statement in the certificate of a recorder that a lien was duly sworn to is conclusive evidence of that fact.

4. An indorsement by a recorder upon a notice of lien is at least prima facie evidence of its filing and the date of its recording.

5. In an action against an owner of property for materials furnished to a contractor it is not sufficient to prove that the materials were sold to be used on the property, but it must be shown that they were actually used thereon.

6. A notice that a property owner will not be responsible for materials furnished contractors is not posted conspicuously enough to relieve from liability when placed in a closed building which is locked up for a greater part of the time.

Action by Henry Silvester, George W. Whiteside, and P. Johnson against the Coe Quartz Mine Company. One of the findings of fact was that a notice by the mine company that it would not be responsible for materials furnished contractors was posted in a closed building, the door of which was for a large portion of the time kept locked. Judgment was rendered for plaintiffs, and defendant appealed.

Charles W. Kitts, for appellant. A. & E. J. Burrows, for respondents.

WORKS, J. This action was brought by three plaintiffs, jointly, to foreclose their separate material-men's liens on the mining claim of the defendant for materials furnished for repairs on said claim. The work on the mining property was done by a contractor, who was to erect hydraulic power hoisting works and pumping works building, gallows frame and track, lay down a water-pipe to supply water to the mine and to pump out the mine to the third level. There was but one contract to do all of the work named for a certain number of the shares of stock of the company, and the contract was not recorded. The evidence shows that the materials sold by the plaintiffs were sold to be used in the repairs of said mine, and, with the exception hereinafter mentioned, were used therein, some being used in one of the improvements mentioned and some in another. The court finds, generally, that the materials "were used in and on said premises in the alteration thereof." The appellant contends that the statute does not give to material-men liens upon mining claims, but only "upon each separate structure, and convenient space around the same, and not for materials supplied, and used generally for the alteration and repair of a mining claim," and upon this basis it is argued that, the notices of the liens being against the mine, and not the structures erected in repairing the same, they were invalid; and, further, that, as some of the structures were completed more than 30 days before the notices were filed for record, they were inoperative. We cannot concur in this view. The lien given by the statute is upon the mining claim, as a whole, and not upon the separate pieces of work done in its repair. Code Civil Proc. § 1183. The mine is a structure within the meaning of the statute. Helm v. Chapman, 66 Cal. 291, 5 Pac. Rep. 352. The work done in this case became and was a part of the mining claim, and the whole claim, including the added improvements, was subject to the lien. Civil Code, § 661. Therefore the notice of lien, as against the mining claim, was valid, and the contract for the several items of improvement being entire, the notice given within 30 days after the completion of the whole work was in time. It is objected that the findings were not sufficiently full on some of the issues, but we regard them as sufficient.

It is claimed that the court erred in admitting the several notices of liens in evidence, for the reason, as stated above, that no such lien was given by statute, and for the reasons that they were not shown to have been filed in the recorder's office, recorded, or verified. The first of these objections we have answered. As to the others, the record contains the notices of the several liens, with the names of the claimants in each attached, and substantially the following, immediately after the signature as it appears in the transcript: "Duly sworn to. Indorsed: Recorded at request of Peter Johnston, September 5, 1887, in book 4 of Liens, pages 443, 444, records Nevada county, Cal. John A. Rapp, Recorder." We are bound by the recital in the statement that the notices of liens were duly sworn to, and the recorder's indorsement on the paper is prima facie evidence at least of their filing and the date of their recording, which fully answers the other objections made to their introduction in evidence.

Objections are made to some of the rulings of the court on questions of evidence, and the findings are criticised, but these objections are unfounded. The findings were sustained by the evidence, except as to a part of the claim of the plaintiff Johnston. It appears that certain track iron furnished by Johnston to the contractor, to be used in repairing the mine, was not used in such repairs. It is not enough, in an action against the owner of the property, for material furnished a contractor, to show that such material was sold to be used in the structure to be erected. It must appear that it was used therein. As to this item of material, therefore, Johnston was not entitled to recover. The amount of this material is stated in the briefs to have been $62.27. If this be the correct amount, and no further evidence is offered on the point, the court below will modify its findings and judgment accordingly, but if the amount is not certainly fixed by the evidence the court may take further evidence if it be necessary to ascertain the exact value of the material not used and make the necessary modification.

It is claimed by the appellant that it was relieved from liability by the posting of a notice that it would not be responsible for materials furnished the contractors; but, conceding that such a notice, properly posted, would prevent the attachment of the lien, the court below found, upon sufficient evidence, that the plaintiffs had no actual knowledge that such a notice had been posted, and that it was not posted in a conspicuous place, as required by the statute which meets this point. There is no error appearing in the record except the one stated above. The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed as to all of the respondents except Johnston, and as to him the court below is instructed to modify the judgment as above indicated unless the parties, or either of them, desire to offer additional evidence on the one question whether the material named was actually used in the repairs of the mining claim, or, if not used, as to its value, and modify the judgment in accordance with the facts proved.

De Costa v. Comfort. (No. 13,048.)

Allowance of Attorney's Fees.

In an action by a mortgagee against a third person to recover the amount of a note secured by a chattel mortgage, on the ground that defendant tortiously converted the mortgaged property, the mortgagee can recover attorney's fees and interest on the whole, though it appears that part of the property was sold by mortgagor to defendant with an agreement that he would satisfy the mortgage out of the proceeds of sale.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county; J. G. Swinnerton, Judge.

Action by A. De Costa against A. M. Comfort. Judgment was rendered for plaintiff and defendant appeals.

Baldwin & Campbell, (Edward I. Jones, of counsel,) for appellant. Carter & Smith, for respondent.

WORKS, J. This action was brought by the respondent against the appellant to recover the amount due him on a note given by one Hughes, and secured by a chattel mortgage, on the ground that the appellant had converted the mortgaged property to his own use. The court found for the respondent, and rendered judgment in his favor for the amount due under the mortgage, including interest and attorney's fees, as provided for therein. The appeal is from the judgment, and comes to us on the judgment roll.

The appellant contends that, the action being for a tort, the plaintiff could not recover the attorney's fee, nor the interest from the time of the alleged conversion. We think otherwise. The property taken by the appellant was subject to the payment of the full amount due on the mortgage, and he having converted the same to his own use must be held personally liable for the same amount. It would be a strange doctrine that would allow the mortgagor to relieve his property of a part of the debt for which he has pledged it by smuggling it into the hands of a third party, and that such third party could escape liability for the full amount by saying that his taking of the property was in the nature of a tort.

It is further contended that the taking by the appellant was not tortious. The court finds that the appellant, learning that an attachment was about to be issued against the property, which consisted of a lot of grain, informed Hughes of the fact, and requested him to transfer the same to him; that he did thereupon transfer to him 800 sacks of the wheat at $1.30 per 100 pounds; that the appellant paid Hughes $5 on the wheat, and at the time agreed that the price of the wheat, after paying plaintiff's mortgage, should be applied to a certain note due by one of Hughes' creditors to the appellant, and that he took into his possession 373 sacks of the wheat not sold to him, making in all 1,173 sacks, weighing 157,493 pounds; that the appellant sold the whole of the wheat to a certain corporation, and, with the consent of Hughes, paid the purchaser an amount due it, presumably from Hughes, and himself received the balance, amounting to $1,113.46. As to the 373 sacks, this was a tortious taking of the property, as there was no purchase of it from Hughes. As to the wheat actually transferred by Hughes to the appellant the court finds that it was under an express agreement that the respondent's mortgage should be first satisfied out of the proceeds to be derived from its sale, and the money due the respondent was converted to the appellant's use, if not the wheat. If it were not a tortious taking, the appellant, by his promise, bound himself to pay the respondent his money when the wheat was sold, and should be held to this promise. Whether the taking be regarded as a tort or not, the findings clearly show a liability on the part of the appellant to the respondent in the full amount of the judgment. There is no merit in this appeal. Judgment affirmed, with 20 per cent. damages.

ASSIGNMENT FOR BENEFIT OF CREDITORS.

When an assignee fails to give bond as required by Civil Code Cal. § 3467, the assignor cannot annul the assignment, but may have the assignee removed.

Action by M. E. Bryant against B. F. Langford, R. E. Wilhoit, and Charles Bamert. Judgment was rendered for defendants and plaintiff appeals.

Joseph H. Budd, (James H. Budd, of counsel,) for appellant. J. C. Campbell, for respondents.

WORKS, J. This is an action by the appellant to set aside a deed of assignment of certain real estate, made by him to the respondents for the benefit of his creditors. The sole ground alleged in the complaint for setting aside the deed is that the assignees failed to give the bond required by section 3467 of the Civil Code, the amount of such bond having been fixed by the judge of the superior court. The court below correctly sustained a demurrer to the complaint. The failure to give the bond did not affect the validity of the deed. The execution and delivery of the deed vested the title to the property in the assignee. A failure on the part of the assignor to file an inventory, or a failure to record the deed, renders the assignment void as "against creditors of the assignor and against purchasers and incumbrancers in good faith and for value," and until the inventory and affidavit have been filed, and the assignee has given the required bond, such assignee has no authority to dispose of the estate or convert it to the purposes of the trust. Civil Code, §§ 3461-3468. But the title passes as between the assignor and assignee, and the assignment is irrevocable. Forbes v. Scannell, 13 Cal. 288; Warner v. Jaffray, 96 N. Y. 256. If the assignor has any remedy, it is to have the assignees removed, and he certainly has this remedy, as he, as well as his creditors, is interested in the giving of the bond and the due performance of the trust by the assignees. Judgment affirmed.

JOHNSON v. MCCONNELL. (No. 13,120.)

ANIMALS—SHEEP-KILLING DOGS.

1. Under Civil Code Cal. § 3341, subsec. 2, providing that any one finding a dog, not on the premises of its owner, worrying, wounding, or killing any sheep, may at the time kill the dog without liability for damages, it is necessary, in order to justify the killing of a dog, to prove that it was actually worrying, wounding, or killing, and a finding that the sheep were running about the field in a greatly agitated and frightened manner, pursued by the dog, which was apparently worrying and injuring them, and that the effect of chasing was to greatly worry and injure them, is not sufficient. BEATTY, C. J., and MCFARLAND and THORNTON, JJ., dissenting.

2. In said section the words "at the time" do not import that the killing of the dog must be in the very act of worrying, etc., but it may be done after an extended pursuit of the dog.

Action by T. W. Johnson against Thaddeus McConnell. Judgment was rendered for defendant, and plaintiff appeals.

Taylor & Holl, for appellant. Grove L. Johnson, for respondent.

WORKS, J. This action was brought by the appellant against the respondent to recover the value of three dogs alleged to have been maliciously killed by the latter. The respondent admitted the killing, but justified it on the ground that the dogs were at the time in the act of worrying sheep belonging to his mother, and in his charge. As to the fact tending to show such justification the court found as follows: "On the 1st day of February, 1887, the defendant was in the employment of his mother, Mrs. Ellen M. Wilson, and engaged in attending to and caring for the sheep upon the ranch in Sacramento county. A portion of said sheep consisted of a band of ewes, about three hundred in number, which were at the time heavy with lamb, and had been segregated from the rest of the sheep and put in a field by themselves, for the purpose of giving them more careful attention and protection during the lambing season. This field was at the time a part of Mrs. Wilson's land, and in her possession, and it was some three miles from the residence of the plaintiff. On the date named, defendant, while at some distance from said field, discovered said ewes running about the field, followed by three or four dogs, which seemed to be chasing them. Thinking said sheep in danger, the defendant immediately went to his house, a quarter of a mile distant, and, procuring a repeating rifle, returned to said field. He found the ewes still running about the field in a greatly agitated and frightened manner, pursued by four dogs, which were apparently worrying and injuring them; and the defendant, thinking that said ewes were being so worried and injured, and in danger of being killed by said dogs, at once proceeded to and did shoot and kill three of said dogs; that is to say, defendant immediately started after said dogs, when the latter, perceiving him enter the field, turned and ran, when defendant pursued and shot three of them in quick succession and as soon as he could get in range of them, but not until they had gotten something like a quarter to a half mile from where defendant first started after them. None of the dogs were on the land or premises of the plaintiff when killed." The court further found that the defendant had never seen the dogs, and did not know to whom they belonged; that he killed them because he believed that it was the only effectual method of preventing them from returning and injuring the sheep, and not with any malicious or wrongful intent or feeling; that the effect of the chasing of the sheep was to greatly worry and injure them, which was known to defendant when he pursued and killed the dogs; that they were in fact injured and worried thereby; that the plaintiff was the owner of the dogs; that they were never known to molest sheep before this; that they were valuable hunting dogs, trained and educated, and were worth $225. On these findings the court concluded in favor of the defendant, and rendered judgment accordingly. The plaintiff moved for a new trial, which was denied, and he appeals.

It is extremely doubtful from the evidence whether the dogs were in fact chasing or worrying the sheep at all, or whether they were not hunting in the field where the sheep were, and thereby frightened them, and the court below does not find that they were, but that they seemed to be chasing them, and were apparently worrying and injuring them, and that the defendant believed that they were so doing, and believed at the time of killing them that it was the only effectual method of preventing them from returning and injuring the sheep. There is no finding that the dogs were in fact worrying the sheep, or that the defendant had reasonable cause to believe they were, except so far as this may be inferred from the finding that they were apparently doing so. Our Code provides: "Any person, on finding any dog or dogs, not on the premises of its owner or possessor, worrying, wounding, or killing any sheep, Angora or Cashmere goats, may, at the time of so finding said dog or dogs, kill the same, and the owner or owners thereof shall sustain no action for damages against any person so killing such dog or dogs." Subsection 2, § 3341, Civil Code. Dogs are property, for the malicious destruction or injury of which an action for damages will lie. 1 Suth. Dam. 802; State v. McDuffie, 34 N. H. 523; Dodson v. Mock, 32 Amer. Dec. 677; Wheatley v. Harris, 70 Amer. Dec. 258, and note. At common law, and in some of the states, they are not the subject of larceny. State v. Doe, 79 Ind. 9; Ward v. State, 48 Ala. 161. But even in those states it is held that they are the subject of a criminal prosecution for malicious trespass. State v. Doe, supra; Kinsman v. State, 77 Ind. 132; Parker v. Mise, 27 Ala. 480; Ward v. State, supra. In this state they are declared to be property, and made the subjects of larceny, (Pen. Code, § 491;) and, while it has been said that they have nearly always been held "to be entitled to less regard and protection than more harmless domestic animals," it is equally true that there are no other domestic animals to which the owner or his family can become more strongly attached, or the loss of which will be more keenly felt. As to these dogs the plaintiff testified: "These dogs were trained animals. The setter was trained by a regular dog-trainer, Mr. Schultius. The setter dog was a good retriever. If I dropped anything, I could send him back for it any ordinary distance, —half a mile or so. If I left my coat on the other side of the field when I went to dinner, he would bring it to me. He encouraged my greyhounds to go out and hunt rabbits, and would start the rabbits for the greyhound. He was a good deer dog, just as well-trained as a deer dog, and would drive deer in the direction of the hunter. He would go around them and bring them up to where I was, when I was out hunting with him. The St. Bernard was a good watch dog. He went with my children and took care of them almost like a human being. He would go with the other dogs, and if they caught a rabbit close he would bring it to the house. I have known him to bring as high as two or three in one day to the house. My boys could pack anything on him if they were out. If they killed more game than they could pack, they would pack it onto his back. The greyhound was a fast dog. We had him trained. We had trained him to go with the other dogs and catch the rabbits and protect our vineyards. In the country where I live there are a great many rabbits,—'Jackass rabbits' they are called. These animals are very destructive to vineyards. They would eat the young vines and entirely destroy vineyards. Before I got my dogs my vines were almost entirely destroyed in a single year. I replanted my vineyard, and I got these dogs, and they run and destroyed rabbits to such an extent that I could hardly find a rabbit within half a mile of my place." While it should be the policy of the law to protect the flocks of the sheep-owner, such dogs as these should not be killed without good cause. Do the findings show that good cause existed in this case? The Code provision relied upon allows a dog to be killed by any person at the time of finding him, not on the premises of his owner, worrying, wounding, or killing any sheep. The terms of this statute cannot well be misunderstood. It is not sufficient that the party killing the dog shall believe he is worrying, wounding, or killing sheep. He must be actually doing the wrongful act to authorize the taking of his life. If the defendant acted on appearances, and believed the dogs were worrying the sheep, he acted at his peril, and was bound to prove that they were doing so in fact. The court having failed to so find, the judgment is not supported by the findings.

It is contended by the appellant that in order to justify the killing it was necessary to show that they were killed in the very act of worrying the sheep. The Code provides that it must be at the time; but we are inclined to give the statute the strict construction contended for. If it had been shown that the dogs were found by the defendant worrying the sheep, and that he had immediately followed them up and killed them, without allowing them to escape or get out of his sight, we think the killing would have been justifiable. But the court below seems to have laid stress upon the fact that the killing was done to prevent the dogs returning and injuring the sheep as a justification of the act. We do not so regard it. The only ground upon which the act is made justifiable by the statute is that the dogs were caught in the act of worrying the sheep, and then and there killed. Carpenter v. Lippitt, 77 Mo. 242, and Marshall v. Blackshire, 44 Iowa, 475, are relied upon by the respondent. The Missouri statute, under which the decision referred to was rendered, was entirely different from ours. It made it lawful for any person to kill a dog which had killed or maimed a sheep, at any time, and without restriction of any kind. The act rendered the dog forever after an outlaw, and made him the lawful prey of any and all persons. The Iowa statute provides: "It shall be lawful for any person to kill any dog caught in the act of worrying, maiming, or killing any sheep or lambs or other domestic animals." Code 1886, § 1485. In Marshall v. Blackshire, supra, the court below charged the jury: "Sixth. If he caught the dog in the act of killing or worrying his chickens, he was justified in killing him. The fact that his chickens were afraid of the dog, and ran from it, would not authorize the killing unless the dog was worrying or killing them. To 'worry' means to run after, to chase, to bark at. Seventh. It was not necessary that the dog should have been, at the very instant of the shooting, in the act of worrying or killing the defendant's chickens, in order to justify the shooting of it, but if the dog had been worrying or killing the defendant's chickens upon his premises, and at the time he was killed his conduct was such as to create in the mind of the defendant a reasonable apprehension of continued or renewed worrying or killing, and while under such apprehension, exercising the care and prudence which reasonable men usually exercise under like circumstances, he shot the dog, the shooting was rightful, and the plaintiff cannot recover." The court, in passing upon this instruction, said: "It is claimed the fifth and sixth instructions given by the court are clearly erroneous, because the principle is recognized that the dog can only be killed if caught in the act of worrying the chickens. The conclusive answer to this is that such is the statute, and when these instructions are read in connection with the seventh, we are of the opinion quite as favorable a rule was laid down as defendant was entitled to. It is true, the dog was a trespasser; but this fact alone would not justify the killing of him any more than a horse or cow." We think this case fully sustains the views we have expressed. The findings fail to show any justification for the act of the defendant in destroying the plaintiff's property, and for that reason the judgment and order appealed from are reversed and the cause remanded.

We concur: SHARPSTEIN, J.; PATERSON, J.; FOX, J.

McFARLAND, J., (dissenting.) The court finds that the defendant, in the first instance, "discovered the ewes running about the field followed by three or four dogs, which seemed to be chasing them." He went to the house, a quarter of a mile distant, for his gun. When he returned, having consumed time enough to walk half a mile, "he found the ewes still running about the field in a greatly agitated and frightened manner, pursued by four dogs, which were apparently worrying and injuring them." It is further found that "the effect of the chasing of the sheep was to greatly worry and injure them, which was known to defendant when he pursued and killed the dogs; that they were in fact injured and worried by said chasing and running." It was also found that defendant did not kill the dogs from any malicious feeling, but to protect the sheep. I think that this plainly brings the defendant within the protection of the statute. He was not compelled to wait until the dogs had actually seized the sheep to see if they were only in the playful exercise of an "educated" trait of character, or if the taste of blood would have aroused a barbaric instinct, derived from their wolfish ancestors, which would have overcome the discipline of their semi-civilization. The rule that a man's intentions must be gathered from his conduct applies still more forcibly to dogs, and if a dog be found chasing sheep in a field of his owner's neighbor, the common judgment of mankind is that his intent is bad. In Marshall v. Blackshire, 44 Iowa, 475, the court, in a case very similar to the case at bar, defines "worry" as follows: "To worry means to run after, to chase, to bark at;" and what the court finds in the case before us constitutes, in my opinion, "worrying" within the meaning of our statute. I think that the judgment should be affirmed.

THORNTON, J. I concur in the foregoing opinion.

SOUTH YUBA WATER & MIN. CO. v. ROSA.
(No. 12,914.)

CORPORATIONS—ACTIONS BY—RIPARIAN RIGHTS.

1. In an action by a corporation, failure of the complaint to allege compliance with Civil Code Cal. § 299, which provides that no corporation now in existence, or hereafter formed, shall maintain or defend any action in relation to its property until it has filed a copy of the copy of its articles of incorporation with the clerk of the county in which such property is situate, does not render it demurrable where it contains no averment on the subject; and such defense must be specially pleaded.

2. Such section does not apply to foreign corporations.

3. Under act Cong. July 26, 1866, § 9, (14 St. at Large, c. 262,) providing that whenever, by priority of possession, rights to the use of water have vested, and are recognized by local customs and laws, the owners of such rights shall be protected therein; and act Cong. July 9, 1870, § 17, (16 St. at Large, c. 235,) providing that "all patents granted, or preemption or homesteads allowed, shall be subject to any vested and accrued water-rights,"—defendant's riparian rights, as a homestead claimant of public lands, in the waters of a creek flowing partly through his land, are subject to an appropriation thereof by plaintiff, made long before defendant's homestead right accrued.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Nevada county; J. M. WALLING, Judge.

Action by South Yuba Water & Mining Company, a corporation organized under the laws of New York, and doing business in Nevada county, against Delovico G. Rosa, to restrain defendant from diverting the waters of a certain creek, and for damages. Civil Code Cal. § 299, provides that no corporation now in existence, or hereafter formed, shall maintain or defend any action in relation to its property until it has filed a certified copy of the copy of its articles of incorporation with the clerk of the county in which such property is situate. Act Cong. July 26, 1866, § 9, (14 St. at Large, c. 262,) provides "that whenever, by priority of possession, rights to the use of water * * * have vested and accrued, and the same are recognized and acknowledged by the local customs, laws, and the decisions of the courts, the possessors and owners of such vested rights shall be maintained and protected in the same." An amendatory statute (act Cong. July 9, 1870, 16 St. at Large, c. 235, § 17) provides that "all patents granted, or pre-emption or homesteads allowed, shall be subject to any vested and accrued water-rights, or rights to ditches and reservoirs used in connection with such water-rights," as may have been acquired under the original act. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

J. I. Caldwell, for appellant. T. S. Ford, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. The plaintiff is a foreign corporation, organized under the laws of the state of New York, and sues as the owner of a water ditch situated in Nevada county, in this state, extending from Rock creek to plaintiff's reservoir near Blue Tent, a distance of about four miles, to recover damages for diverting therefrom the waters of the North branch of Rock creek, which discharges its waters into the main channel of Rock creek above the head of plaintiff's ditch; and also to enjoin the defendant perpetually from diverting any water from Little Rock creek. The plaintiff had judgment for $30 damages, and a perpetual injunction as prayed for; and the appeal is from the judgment, and from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial.

The findings show that the plaintiff and its grantors have owned the ditch for more than 25 years prior to the commencement of this action, and that Little Rock creek has contributed to its supply of water continuously during all that time, except when interrupted by the defendant. It appears that Little Rock creek flows in a natural channel a distance of about 1,000 feet through land possessed and claimed by defendant as a homestead, under a settlement thereon, made in 1883, and for which he holds the receipt of the register of the United States land-office, for the fees and compensation of register and receiver for the entry of the land as a homestead, under section 2290, Rev. St. U. S., but has received no patent therefor. Under this title, and his possession, he claims the rights of a riparian owner to the waters of Little Rock creek.

The defendant filed a general demurrer to the complaint, which was overruled, but which he contends should have been sustained because it was not alleged that plaintiff had complied with section 299 of the Civil Code concerning the filing of a copy of the copy of its articles of incorporation in the office of the county clerk of Nevada county, in which county plaintiff's ditch is situated; and on the trial the defendant objected to any evidence until a compliance with section 299, Civil Code, should be proved; and also, at the close of evidence on the part of the plaintiff, moved for a nonsuit upon the same ground, which was denied. Where the complaint contains no averment upon the subject, it is not a valid ground of demurrer that it does not affirmatively allege a compliance with the provisions of section 299 of the Civil Code; and, in such case, the failure to comply with that section can be made available as a defense only by specially pleading it in the answer. Phillips v. Goldtree, 74 Cal. 151, 13 Pac. Rep. 313; Railroad Co. v. Pursell, 18 Pac. Rep. 886. As a defense it is only matter in abatement of the action, and if not specially pleaded it is waived. In this case it is not pleaded at all.

Moreover, we are of opinion that section 299 of the Civil Code does not apply to foreign corporations. If a foreign corporation were incorporated by special act of a foreign legislature, or under a general act not requiring a copy of its articles to be filed with a secretary of state, it is manifest that it would be impossible for it to comply with section 299 of our Civil Code, in the absence of any law of this state requiring or even authorizing a foreign corporation to file a copy of its articles, or of its legislative act of incorporation, in the office of the secretary of this state. "The secretary of state," mentioned in section 299 of the Civil Code, means the secretary of this state, and not the secretary of a foreign state; and the phrase "every corporation now in existence" was intended to embrace only corporations formed in this state, whether formed under the provisions of the Civil Code, or under the provisions of statutes existing prior to the Civil Code; and to exclude any doubt that the section was intended to be applicable to all corporations organized in this state before the enactment of the Civil Code. Whether or not it is expedient that foreign corporations should be required to deposit record evidence of their incorporation in every county of this state where they have property, in like manner as domestic corporations are required to do, is matter for consideration of the legislature alone.

The findings of fact by the trial court are amply sustained by the evidence and stipulations of counsel; and upon these findings it is clear that under the acts of congress of July 26, 1866, and July 9, 1870, the riparian rights of the defendant, as a homestead claimant, are subject and subordinate to the prior appropriation of the waters of Little Rock creek by the plaintiff, since it appears that the land upon which plaintiff's ditch is situated, and over which said creek runs, are public lands of the United States, except such right or title as the defendant acquired by his homestead settlement and proceedings in the United States land-office above stated, long subsequent to the appropriation of the waters in question by the plaintiff. Cave v. Crafts, 53 Cal. 135; Osgood v. Water & M. Co., 56 Cal. 571; Farley v. Irrigating Co., 58 Cal. 142; Himes v. Johnson, 61 Cal. 259; Ware v. Walker, 70 Cal. 591, 12 Pac. Rep. 475.

I think the judgment and order denying the motion for new trial should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; GIBSON, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order denying the motion for a new trial are affirmed.

RAPE—ASSAULT—EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. On trial for assault with intent to commit rape, an instruction that, if defendant assaulted and laid violent hands on prosecutrix, with intent not to actually ravish, but by force to overcome and seduce her, he would be guilty of simple assault, is proper.

2. Such instruction, and a verdict thereon, is warranted by evidence that defendant induced prosecutix to meet him at an appointed place, where he seized her, threw her down, and performed certain indecent and violent acts upon her person, which she resisted, and then screamed, whereupon he released her.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Luis Obispo county; V. A. GREGG, Judge.

W. B. Dillard, for appellant. George A. Johnson, Atty. Gen., for the People.

FOOTE, C. The defendant was charged with an assault with intent to commit rape. He was convicted of simple assault. From the judgment and an order refusing a new trial he has appealed. The points made for the reversal of the judgment are: First. That the court erred in its last instruction to the jury. Second. That there was no evidence to support the instruction complained of, or the verdict of the jury. The instruction is: "I charge you, gentlemen, that, if the defendant assaulted the prosecutrix here, and laid violent hands upon her, although his intent may not have been to ravish or rape her, yet, if his intent was by this force to overcome and seduce her, he may be guilty of an assault; and if you find that he did lay hands upon her violently, with the purpose, not of actually and by force ravishing her, but by force to overcome her to some extent, you will be justified, if you find those facts, to find him guilty of simple assault. Simple assault is an unlawful attempt, coupled with a present ability, to commit a violent injury on the person of another."

It was said in the case of Com. v. Merrill, 14 Gray, 417: "The facts in the present case resemble those proved in Rex v. Nichol, Russ. & R. 130, where it was shown that a teacher took very gross and indecent liberties with a female scholar under his control, of tender years, without her consent; and it was held that he was rightfully convicted of an assault." "There was ample proof of gross indecency and lewdness, and of an attempt, by long-continued and urgent solicitations and inducements, to lead the prosecutrix to consent to the wish of the prisoner to have sexual intercourse with him. These facts would have been sufficient to warrant a jury in finding the defendant guilty of an assault." 1 Russ. Crimes, (8th Amer. Ed.) 752. "Obviously, there is a manifest distinction between an assault to commit a rape and an assault with intent to have an improper connection. Any such violent or indecent familiarity with the person of a female against her will, where the latter is the extent of the purpose and intent of the aggressor, is an aggravated assault, and should be punished as such." Pefferling v. State, 40 Tex. 493. The instruction to which exception is taken did not inform the jury that the defendant would be guilty of a simple assault if his intent was merely to seduce the prosecutrix with her consent. It was to the effect that if he violently laid hands on her with the intent by force to overcome and have an improper connection with her, but not of forcibly ravishing her, he would then be guilty of simple assault; and under the authorities it was correct.

The prosecutrix was a girl who was about thirteen and a half years old at the time of the alleged assault, and was an orphan residing with her grandmother. The defendant was married to her step-mother, and she had known him for eight years. The defendant induced her to meet him, by leaving a note for her in a book on a table at her aunt's, where she was then staying. The place of meeting was in a dry creek bottom, where the note directed her to go. There he took hold of her, threw her down, and performed certain indecent and violent acts upon her person, unnecessary to describe, which she resisted, and then screamed, when he let her go, and went away on horseback.

We think the evidence warranted the instruction and the verdict, and advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; HAYNE, C.

WIXSON v. DEVINE. (No. 12,788.)

RES JUDICATA.

1. In an action for the diversion of a stream, a prior judgment restraining defendant from interfering with plaintiff's dam, or with "his turning out any of the waters from Kentucky ravine, after said water shall have reached plaintiff's dam, so long as the quantity shall not exceed 25 inches," does not estop defendant from proving a prior appropriation by him above plaintiff's dam.

2. Where, on appeal from the judgment in such action, the only question involved was the admissibility of evidence to show a prior appropriation by defendant below plaintiff's dam, a statement in the opinion of the court, that such prior judgment precluded defendant from claiming any right to 25 inches of said stream at the point of plaintiff's diversion, "or at any point above," is merely obiter, and not conclusive, as "the law of the case," on rehearing.

In bank. On rehearing. For opinion on appeal, see 20 Pac. Rep. 367. For opinion on former appeal, see 7 Pac. Rep. 776.

Van Clief & Wehe, for appellant. Smith & Ford and S. B. Davidson, for respondent.

BEATTY, C. J. The question in this case is whether the judgment in a prior action is an estoppel in this. In the first action Wixson sued Devine and wife for tearing out his dam, and interfering with his diversion of 25 inches of the stream at his dam. In his answer in that action Devine claimed to have appropriated all the water of the stream prior to any appropriation by Wixson, but he did not show at what point or points he had made a diversion of the water. On the trial he attempted to show a prior appropriation by diversion below the point of plaintiff's dam of all the water flowing in the stream at that point. In this he failed, the court finding that plaintiff's appropriation was prior to and superior to any appropriation of Devine below plaintiff's dam. The defendant then offered to show that he had made a still earlier appropriation above plaintiff's dam. This offer was objected to, and the objection sustained by the court, upon the ground that in that action it was immaterial what appropriation defendant had made, or what right of diversion he had above plaintiff's dam, as such right of diversion was in nowise affected by plaintiff's dam, and could not justify the defendant in tearing out the dam, or interfering with the plaintiff's right to divert so much of the water of the stream as came down to that point. In entire and perfect consistency with this ruling, which, considering the subject of the action, was clearly correct, the only judgment rendered was for one dollar damages, with an injunction restraining defendant from interfering with plaintiff's dam, flume, or ditch, or with his "turning out any of the waters from Kentucky ravine, after said water shall have reached plaintiff's dam, so long as the quantity shall not exceed 25 inches."

There were no express findings of fact, and none can be implied from the judgment, except such as are logically necessary to sustain it. Now, the only facts necessary to sustain the judgment, are that Wixson had constructed a ditch of 25 inches capacity, heading above his dam, which by completion, or by relation to his notice of intention, gave him a prior right, as against Devine, to that quantity of water at that point, whenever so much happened to come down to him, as it frequently might, notwithstanding an earlier appropriation by Devine of the entire low-water flow of the stream above. We must take notice of the fluctuating volume of mountain streams, and of the fact that prior appropriators, when they have no use for the water,—as frequently happens,—allow it to pass down the stream to the advantage of subsequent appropriators, or riparian owners below. We know, therefore, that every demand of this judgment, and every fact which it implies, are consistent with a prior appropriation by Devine above plaintiff's dam and ditch,—an appropriation which at low, or even ordinary, stages of water, might leave a surplus of less than 25 inches to flow down to plaintiff's dam. Now, in this present action, plaintiff claims a first right to 25 inches of the stream, and that the defendant is precluded from proving a prior appropriation above plaintiff's dam, because it is said the judgment in the first action is an estoppel upon that point. But if, as we have endeavored to show, nothing in the judgment implies any fact inconsistent with such prior appropriation, we cannot see upon what principle it can be held an estoppel.

But it is said that on a former appeal in this case we held it an estoppel, and that such has become the law of the case. See 67 Cal. 341, 7 Pac. Rep. 776. We have recently, in Sharon v. Sharon, 22 Pac. Rep. 26, had occasion to consider this doctrine of the law of the case, which means, as we understand it, that the court having erroneously decided some matter of law, will always stand by the error in that case, though it will not allow it to be a precedent in another, and we there determined that the doctrine had nothing to commend it to the favor of the court, and that its application would not be extended beyond the cases in which it had been held to apply. It has never, that we are aware, been held to apply to expressions in an opinion which are merely obiter, and we venture to say that, beyond some expressions of that sort, there is nothing in the former opinion of this court affecting the question presented on this appeal. On the first trial of this case the judgment in the former action was admitted in evidence, and the opinion of the judge who tried the case was excluded. Both of these rulings were in favor of the plaintiff, and they were not the subject of review on his appeal. There was no occasion, therefore, for this court on that appeal to say anything as to the correctness or incorrectness of those rulings. But, aside from this, it is also true that what was said, however binding it may be deemed, does not touch the question involved in this appeal. We are of the opinion that the judgment in the first action was admissible as evidence to prove one of the issues in this case, i. e., the construction of plaintiff's dam and ditch prior to the commencement of the former action. It may be conceded that the judge's opinion delivered in the former case was properly excluded for the reason assigned, viz., that it was not authenticated. But when the court proceeded to say, (67 Cal. 346, 7 Pac. Rep. 779,) "the record of the judgment introduced in evidence precludes the defendant from setting up any right to twenty-five inches of water in Kentucky ravine, at the point of plaintiff's diversion, or at any point above, so as to interfere with his enjoyment thereof at his dam and ditch," we dissent entirely from the correctness of the conclusion, and do not feel bound by it under the doctrine of the "law of the case, for the sufficient reason that the statement was merely obiter; and we say this because the error assigned by plaintiff on that appeal, the only error which brought the effect of the former judgment as evidence under review, and the only error assigned as ground for reversal of the judgment, was the admission of testimony tending to prove a prior appropriation by Devine below plaintiff's dam, a matter as to which we admit that the former judgment was an estoppel. For these reasons we conclude the superior court erred in denying to defendant the right to prove a prior appropriation above plaintiff's dam, and in refusing to allow him to show that his right to such prior appropriation had not been litigated in the former action. We think the judgment should be reversed, and it is so ordered.

GIBSON v. BOARD OF SUPERVISORS OF TRINITY COUNTY. (No. 13,153.)

ELECTIONS — ISSUANCE OF BONDS — CONTESTS — JURISDICTION — EVIDENCE — PARTIES.

1. Pol. Code Cal. §§ 1265, 1266, requiring the county clerk to preserve packages of ballots unopened for 12 months, except where there is a contest in court, includes not only elections for officers, but any election which may be contested in a court.

2. Where the statute provides (Laws Cal. 1883, p. 311) that the ballots, on an election to determine the issuance of bonds, shall be printed "For the issue of bonds, or "Against the issue of bonds," ballots "For the issue of bonds" are sufficient, without adding the word "Yes."

3. Const. Cal. art. 11, § 18, specially providing for an election to determine the policy of creating a bonded indebtedness, prohibiting the issuance of bonds without consent of a certain number of voters, and providing no method of enforcing such provision, by implication confers upon the court of chancery jurisdiction to determine the validity of such election.

4. A tax-payer is a sufficiently interested party to maintain an action to contest the official declaration of the result of an election to determine the issuance of bonds.

5. In such action the ballots are not only competent and material evidence, but evidence of a very high order.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Trinity county; T. E. JONES, Judge.

James W. Bartlett, for appellant. D. G. Reid, for respondent.

MCFARLAND, J. On October 2, 1888, the board of supervisors, appellant herein, made an order in due form submitting to the electors at the general election to be held November 6, 1888, the question of the issuance of county bonds to the amount of $14,000, for the purpose of building certain bridges. At said election more than two-thirds of the qualified electors voting thereat voted in favor of the issuance of said bonds; but at several precincts a large number of ballots cast for the issue of said bonds were not counted by the election officers, so that, at the canvass of the board of supervisors of the votes returned, it appeared that there was not a two-thirds majority in favor of the bonds, as required by the constitution and the statute. Thereupon the board made an order declaring that the proposition to issue the bonds was lost. Plaintiff, who is a citizen and tax-payer in the county, then brought this action against the board, averring the true facts about said election, and praying that said last-named order of said board be annulled, that the true result of said election be declared, and for such other and further relief, etc. The defendant demurred upon the grounds that the court has no jurisdiction of the subject of the action, that plaintiff has no "legal capacity to sue or institute this action," and that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The demurrer was overruled; and, after a denial by the court of a motion to strike out a part of the complaint, the defendant answered, admitting all the averments of the complaint, except only the averment that there had been a two-thirds majority for the bonds, which averment is denied. The court found all the averments of the complaint to be true, and entered judgment decreeing that the issuance of the bonds was carried, that the said order of the board be annulled and set aside, and directing the board to make an order declaring that the issuance of the bonds was adopted. From this judgment the board appeals upon the judgment roll and a bill of exceptions.

1. Appellant contends that two errors were committed by the court during the course of the trial. The court ordered the county clerk to produce the ballots voted at the election; and they were offered and received as evidence, over appellant's objections that they were "irrelevant, immaterial, and incompetent, and on the further ground that the court has no power to recount the ballots in this proceeding." It is clear, however, that, in a contest over the result of an election, the ballots are not only competent and material evidence, but evidence of a very high order. The real objection which appellant makes in the brief, on this point, is that the court had no power to order the clerk to bring in the packages of ballots, or to order them opened, because sections 1265 and 1266 require the clerk to keep them unopened for 12 months, and then destroy them, unless there is a contest in a court about an election; and that the election referred to in said sections means only an election for officers. But the said sections are broad enough, we think, to include any election which may be contested in a court; and, moreover, that question could arise only upon a refusal of the clerk to bring the ballots into court.

The court counted in the affirmative all the ballots which had printed on them the words, "For the issue of the [bridge] bonds;" and appellant contends that this was also error. The election officers, in the precincts above mentioned, had refused to count or return any ballots which had those words on alone,—upon the theory, it seems, that there ought to have been a double affirmative; that is, that the ballots should have been, "For the issue of the bonds. Yes." (We suppose that upon the same theory the negative votes should have been, "Against the issue of the bonds. No.") The statute provides (St. 1883, p. 311) that "the ballots shall be printed, 'For the issue of bonds,' or, 'Against the issue of bonds;'" and human ingenuity cannot invent a plausible pretext for refusing to count ballots so printed. The exception to this action of the court is therefore without merit.

2. But the main defense set up by appellant is that no court, by any form of action or proceeding, legal or equitable, has any jurisdiction or authority to inquire into the result of an election on a question of the issuance of bonds; that the whole matter is beyond the scope of judicial investigation. It is said that there can be a contest in a court over the election to an office simply because the statute provides a procedure for such a contest; but that, as there is no such procedure provided for a contest about any other kind of election, and as the subject is in its nature beyond the cognizance of courts, therefore there is no judicial jurisdiction of any kind to determine any question rising out of such election. If that position be correct, then its consequences are far reaching and alarming. In the present case the errors of the election officers were against the issue of the bonds, and the amount of the bonds was comparatively small. But a case entirely different from the one here presented might easily arise, involving interests of immense magnitude, and to such a case the same rule would have to be applied. Suppose that interested parties should successfully contrive to have presented to the people of a county or city a proposition to issue bonds for an unworthy purpose, and to a ruinous extent, and that, although the people really defeated the project at the polls, certain election officers, either through intentional fraud, or by a gross mistake, refused to return a large number of votes cast in the negative, so that the returns would show the proposition to have been carried, would there be no remedy,—no power to execute the real will of the people? There certainly would be no such remedy in the hands of the supervisors; for they can only estimate the votes returned, and have no power to count the ballots. The will of the people, then, can be carried out by the courts, with their power to compel evidence and thoroughly investigate, or not at all. Without discussing generally the wide subject of what "rights of persons" and "rights of things" may be enforced in courts by means of ordinary or extraordinary actions and proceedings therein, it is sufficient to say here that the constitution of the state (section 18, art. 11) has specifically provided for an election to determine the policy of creating a bonded indebtedness, and prohibited the issuance of bonds without the consent of two-thirds of the voters of the county; and that whenever there is such a constitutional provision, and no machinery provided by law for enforcing it, the constitution, by necessary implication, confers upon the court of chancery jurisdiction to protect and enforce the will of the people by suitable and proper procedure. This principle has been declared and followed in numerous cases where constitutions have provided for the removal of county-seats; and we see no distinction, with respect to the point under discussion, between those cases and the one at bar. In Boren v. Smith, 47 Ill. 482, which involved an election for a county-seat, and where the jurisdiction of the court was attacked, the supreme court of Illinois says: "Our constitution has declared that such a vote shall be taken before a county-seat can be removed; and in making that provision it is manifest that it was designed that the will of the majority of the legal voters of the county should control. It would defeat that object, and render this fundamental provision inoperative, if the sense of the majority of the legal voters, constitutionally expressed, might be overcome by illegal voters or other fraudulent means; and, as the constitution and the law have failed to afford a specific remedy to prevent this provision from being defeated, it is eminently proper that equity should afford the requisite relief in such cases. As there is no law in England similar to this provision of our constitution, and the organic laws of other states are believed to have no such provision, it is not to be expected that precedents may be found upon which to base the jurisdiction of a court of equity. But if our courts of equity were, in the absence of legislative action, to refuse relief, this constitutional provision could, by fraud, be rendered inoperative, and wholly defeated. The decree of the court below is affirmed." In People v. Wiant, 48 Ill. 263, the court also says: "In this case the law has provided no means of contesting the election, or correcting the vote then given; and if frauds were committed, and the returns do not, for that reason, show what was the expressed will of the voters of the county, the design of the law, and the intention and desire of the majority of the county, would be defeated, unless the courts can afford a remedy. This is a case unlike a mere contest of two individuals as to which shall exercise the powers and perform the duties of an office. In that case the individuals are immediately interested, and the public remotely; but in this case it is a matter of public concern to the people of the county. In that the law has afforded an ample remedy, by conforming to the statute authorizing them to contest the election, to determine which is entitled to the office; while in this, no means are provided by the statute for carrying into effect the will of the majority under the law, when apparently thwarted by fraud, accident, or mistake. Hence the necessity of equity to entertain jurisdiction and afford relief." And in Dickey v. Reed, 78 Ill. 262, it is said: "Where courts of equity in this state have taken jurisdiction of contested county-seat election cases, it has been upon the express ground that the constitution had provided that county-seats should not be removed, except upon a vote of a majority in favor of removal, and that the legislature, in providing for such elections, failed to provide any means of contesting them; and, to protect the rights of the majority intended to be secured to them, it was held that the fundamental law, by implication, conferred the power on courts of chancery to hear and determine such cases." Numerous other authorities could be cited from sister states; but the point has been practically decided by this court. Calaveras Co. v. Brockway, 30 Cal. 325, was a contest over an election for a county-seat. The court took jurisdiction of the case, and held that "the determination of the board of supervisors that a place voted for received a majority of the votes cast at a special election for a county-seat is prima facie evidence of the fact so determined, but is not conclusive; and, if the fact was not as determined, it may be attacked for fraud or mistake, and the true result ascertained." As before stated, we see no difference in principle between an election to determine a county-seat and an election to determine whether a bonded indebtedness shall be increased; and in our opinion the court below had jurisdiction of the subject of the action in the case at bar.

3. Counsel for appellant states, although he does not argue, the point that plaintiff, in his capacity of tax-payer, had no right to institute the action. It is clearly the law that if the action of the board had been the other way,—that is, if they had declared the proposition to issue the bonds carried, when in fact it had not been,—plaintiff could have maintained the action. Schumacker v. Toberman, 56 Cal. 508; Andrews v. Pratt, 44 Cal. 309; Maxwell v. Supervisors, 53 Cal. 389; Foster v. Coleman, 10 Cal. 278. That is, a tax-payer can, beyond doubt, restrain any illegal action which would increase the burden of taxation. It is not so clear, however, when he can compel affirmative action; although it was held in Hyatt v. Allen, 54 Cal. 353, that he can by mandamus compel an assessor to assess property subject to assessment. It is not necessary here to determine whether or not plaintiff would be entitled to maintain mandamus against the board of supervisors to compel them to issue the bonds. We think, however, that, as a property owner and tax-payer, he is sufficiently a party interested to prevent an untrue, public, official declaration of the result of an election on a proposition to issue bonds, and to have the true declaration made, whether the real result of the election be for or against the issuance of such bonds. No other proper party plaintiff to such an action has been suggested. Judgment affirmed.

RICHARDSON et al. v. LOUPE. (No. 12,273.)

PARTITION—JURISDICTION—PARTIES—REFEREES.

1. Code Civil Proc. Cal. pt. 2, tit. 10, c. 4, confers upon the district court jurisdiction to partition real estate between tenants in common; section 760 provides that it may determine the interests of the original co-tenants, and partition the property as if they were sole parties to the proceeding; and sections 1675–1686 limit the jurisdiction of probate courts, in partition proceedings, to the settlement of estates of decedents, and their final distribution among heirs and devisees. Held, that the district court has power to partition an estate in common, though the estate of one of the original co-tenants is in course of administration in the probate court.

2. Persons who have purchased lands from the original tenants in common, and hold it in severalty, are not proper or necessary parties to a suit to partition the balance of the estate in common.

3. Under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 411, providing that service of summons against a minor may be by delivering a copy "to such minor personally, and also to his father, mother, or guardian," a return showing personal service upon both minor and guardian is sufficient to confer jurisdiction, especially after appearance of the guardian.

4. Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 797, provides that the court, with the consent of the parties, may appoint a single referee in partition; and section 795 provides that the guardian of an infant may consent to a partition without action. Held that, where the decree recited that the appointment of a single referee was with the consent of the parties, the proceedings were valid.

5. Where the heirs and representatives of a decedent petition that his interest in an estate in common be set off to them as an entirety, and they be left as tenants in common, as authorized by statute, a decree setting apart such interest to "the estate of" decedent is not void for uncertainty.

6. The sole duty of a single referee appointed to make partition after an interlocutory decree, under Code Civil Proc. Cal. §§ 763, 797, is to apportion the lands according to such decree, and make report, and he does not act judicially.

7. An interlocutory decree, reciting that it was made by agreement of parties, and the report of a referee, not filed until April 21st, were, by order of court, filed nunc pro tunc as of March 13th and March 20th, their respective dates. Held, that such proceedings were valid, in the absence of fraud.

J. C. Bates, for appellants. Van Ness & Roche, for respondent.

Fox, J. This is an action to quiet title to the undivided one-half interest in 11 separate blocks and parts of blocks of land in the outside lands of San Francisco, part of that portion of said "Outside Lands," so-called, commonly known as the "Sharp and Sproul Tract." The record shows that John Sproul died in January, 1869, leaving a widow, Mary Ann Sproul, and three daughters, Elizabeth, Mary, and Matilda, his heirs at law. The daughters are the plaintiffs in this cause. At the time of his death John Sproul and George F. Sharp were the owners as tenants in common of the said Sharp and Sproul tract, each owning an undivided half thereof. In due time, and under regular proceedings, the widow, Mary Ann Sproul, was appointed administratrix of the estate of John Sproul, deceased, and by other regular proceedings she was also appointed general guardian of the persons and estates of the said daughters, who were then minors. Prior to his death, Sproul had sold out of the said tract certain lots and blocks or parts of blocks thereof to third persons, Sharp joining in such conveyances, but Sproul receiving to his own use the entire proceeds of such sales; in consideration of which, Sharp and Sproul had entered into an agreement in writing reciting the facts, and providing that, upon final partition of the tract, said Sharp should receive, in addition to the undivided one-half of what remained unsold, an amount which should be equal and sufficient in extent, quantity, and value to the lands which had been so conveyed by Sharp for the benefit of Sproul. After the death of Sproul, Sharp, in writing, renounced all claim under this last-named agreement, except so far as related to certain lands sold and conveyed to one Sampson and one Reynolds. For these latter he was still to receive an equivalent upon final partition. In 1870, all the unsold portions of the Sharp and Sproul tract were deeded by lots and blocks by the city and county of San Francisco to said George F. Sharp, and to Mary Ann Sproul, administratrix of the estate of John Sproul, deceased, saving and excepting, of course, such lots, blocks, and other portions as were reserved for public use under the ordinances and acts authorizing such conveyances. The plaintiffs claim title as heirs of their father and grantees of their mother. The defendant denies that the plaintiffs have any right, title, or interest in the lots and blocks described in the complaint, or any part thereof, and claims to be himself the owner in fee of said lots and blocks so described, and of the whole thereof, and of all interest therein, deraigning his title under said Sharp; and it is conceded that defendant has acquired and holds whatever interest Sharp had in the property described in the complaint herein at the time of his death, which occurred October 17, 1882. Defendant also pleads, as against the claim of plaintiffs, that the same is barred by the provisions of section 318, Code Civil Proc. The court found in favor of defendant upon all the issues, and gave judgment accordingly. Motion for new trial was made on the ground of errors of law, and also that the evidence was insufficient to justify the findings. The motion being denied, plaintiffs appeal, both from the judgment, and from the order denying the motion for new trial.

Upon the trial of the cause, the plaintiffs having rested their case upon proof of the facts as hereinbefore recited, and of conveyance from their mother to them of her interest in the premises, the defendant, for the purpose of making out his defense, offered in evidence a judgment roll in the case entitled "George F. Sharp, Plaintiff, vs. Mary Ann Sproul, Administratrix, et al., Defendants," in the district court of the late nineteenth judicial district of the state of California, in and for the city and county of San Francisco. This was an action brought for the partition of the Sharp and Sproul tract, complaint filed December 10, 1873, while the Sproul estate was in course of administration, and pending in the probate court. The defendants were "Mary Ann Sproul, administratrix of the estate of John Sproul, deceased, Mary Ann Sproul, Elizabeth Sproul, Mary Sproul, and Matilda Sproul, and Mary Ann Sproul, guardian of the persons and estates of Elizabeth Sproul, Mary Sproul, and Matilda Sproul, minors." To the introduction of this judgment roll in evidence the plaintiffs objected, on 26 separately stated grounds, all of which, however, go to the question of the jurisdiction of the court to hear and determine the case, and render any judgment therein, or to the regularity and sufficiency of the proceedings had to render any judgment of partition therein valid or binding. The objection was overruled, and the judgment roll admitted in evidence, to which ruling plaintiffs excepted, and this is now assigned as error of law, and the evidence thus introduced is claimed to be insufficient to justify the findings based thereon. The first point made against the admission of this record is that the district court had no jurisdiction to make partition of the premises described in the complaint in the cause, because the estate of John Sproul, deceased, was then in course of administration, pending and undetermined, in the probate court, and that court alone had jurisdiction to make partition of the estate. This point is not well taken. The probate court never had jurisdiction to make partition of real estate, except in the course of the settlement of the estates of deceased persons, and for the purpose of distribution to the heirs or devisees of such estates. See Code Civil Proc. §§ 1675–1686, as the same stood prior to 1880, and sections 261–273 of the former practice act. It is a mistake to suppose, from anything found in those sections, that the probate court had any power or jurisdiction over the interest of any persons who might be owners as tenants in common with the estate or its distributees, and who did not deraign their title through the estate. Section 1678, to which we are cited, in no manner supports the contention of plaintiffs in that behalf. It is expressly confined to persons who have purchased from heirs, legatees, or devisees their interest in the estate, and then places them simply in the shoes of their grantors in the matter of such partition and distribution. On the contrary, at that time, the district court, only, had jurisdiction to make partition of real estate between tenants in common therein; and this, according to the provisions of part 2, tit. 10, c. 4, Code Civil Proc. And section 760, a part of that chapter, made express provision for exactly such cases as this, and provided that in such a case the court might "first ascertain and determine the shares or interest respectively held by the original co-tenants, and thereupon adjudge and cause partition to be made, as if such original co-tenants were the parties, and sole parties in interest, and the only parties to the action, and thereafter may proceed in like manner to adjudge and make partition separately of each share or portion so ascertained and allotted, as between those claiming under the original tenant to whom the same shall have been so set apart, or may allow them to remain tenants in common thereof, as they may desire." The record offered shows that this was exactly what was done in that case. The court did ascertain and determine the respective interests of the original co-tenants, Sharp and Sproul, and made partition between them; then, at the request of the defendants, left them to remain tenants in common of the Sproul allotments, the same being subject to administration in the Sproul estate, and to final distribution therein, by partition or otherwise, as the probate court should determine.

Objection is also made to the sufficiency of the complaint, in that cause, to give the court jurisdiction to make partition; but an examination of the complaint shows it to be full, in every particular required by the chapter on partitions, setting out, not only the interests of the respective original co-tenants, but also the interests of the respective heirs of the Sproul estate.

It is also objected that the supplemental agreements hereinbefore referred to, providing that, upon final partition, Sharp was to have set apart to him an equivalent for certain lands theretofore sold for the benefit of Sproul, were not made part of the complaint, and called to the attention of the court; but this is a false call on the part of the plaintiffs in this action, for those agreements are both made a part of the complaint in the partition suit, and considered by the court, in making the partition.

It is also objected that all the parties were not joined, necessary to give the court jurisdiction to make the partition, for that Sampson and Reynolds were not made parties thereto. Sampson and Reynolds were not tenants in common with the others in any part of the tract sought to be partitioned. They were purchasers from Sharp and Sproul of certain lots or blocks in the Sharp and Sproul tract, and held them in severalty, free from any claim or interest of either Sharp or Sproul. Their properties were not included in the land to be partitioned, and they were neither necessary nor proper parties to the partition suit.

It is also objected that the summons was insufficient to give the court jurisdiction to make the partition, but an inspection shows it to have been full and complete.

It is also objected that legal service of the summons was never made, so as to give the court jurisdiction over the persons of the defendants. The objection is as to the service upon the minors, who are claimed to have been at that time under 14 years of age. The provision of the statute at that time, as to service in such case, was as follows, (section 411, subd. 3:) "If against a minor under the age of fourteen years, * * * to such minor personally, and also to his father, mother, or guardian; or, if there be none within this state, then to any person having the care or control of such minor, or with whom he resides, or in whose service he is employed." The return of the sheriff in that case shows that he personally served the minors, naming each of them, on the 10th day of December, 1873, and on the 12th day of the same month personally served Mary Ann Sproul, administratrix of the estate of John Sproul, deceased, Mary Ann Sproul, Mary Ann Sproul, guardian of the persons of Elizabeth Sproul, Mary Sproul, and Matilda Sproul, minors, and also Mary Ann Sproul, guardian of said minor defendants, by delivering to each of said defendants personally, in the city and county of San Francisco, a copy of said summons; the summons so served upon Mary Ann Sproul being attached to a copy of the complaint in said action. We are unable to see wherein the return fails to show sufficient service upon the defendants. Besides, the appearance of the general guardian was sufficient to give the court jurisdiction of the persons of the defendants. Smith v. McDonald, 42 Cal. 484.

It is also claimed that the final decree is void for uncertainty on its face, because it set apart defendants' interest to the estate of John Sproul, deceased. All the defendants in that action were heirs and representatives of the estate of John Sproul, deceased, one of the two original co-tenants. As such, they asked in their answer that partition be not made between themselves, but that the interest of their ancestor be set off as an entirety, and they be left as tenants in common therein as before. The statute authorized this to be done, and it was so done. As the estate was then in course of administration, it was a very proper thing to do. There was no error in such a course, and no uncertainty as to whom, or in whose favor, the allotment was made. In view of our express statute, the long list of authorities cited by counsel on this point are not applicable, except that of Hill v. Den, 54 Cal. 6, which is directly in point in support of the course pursued by the court in the case under consideration.

It is also claimed that the proceedings in partition were void because a single referee was appointed, and because he, acting in a judicial capacity, acted without notice to the parties, and they had no opportunity for a hearing before him. As to the appointment of a single referee, that is expressly provided for in the statute. By section 797 it was provided that the court might appoint a single referee, in proceedings in partition, by the consent of the parties; and the decree recites in this case that it was done by the consent of the parties. To this it is replied, however, that minors could not consent. By section 795, Code Civil Proc., it was provided that the general guardian of an infant could consent to partition without action. This being so, and the general guardian having authority to appear for the minors in an action for partition, it would seem that, in the action, the guardian might consent to a mere course of procedure authorized by statute, and coming within the purview of the action itself.

As to the other point of the objection, counsel has evidently got confused between the two classes of referees who might be appointed in cases of partition. Sections 761 and 762 provided for the appointment of referees to take certain evidence, and report certain facts, affecting the question of title, for the information of the court, before the interlocutory decree. Such referees acted judicially in the taking of testimony, and the investigation of the facts; and of their sittings notice had to be given, and the parties were entitled to an opportunity be heard before them. But such was not this case. The only referee appointed in this case was one appointed, under sections 763 and 797, to make partition, after interlocutory decree. His sole duty was to apportion and allot these lots and blocks between the original co-tenants, according to their respective interests as found and determined by the court, quantity and quality relatively considered, and make report of his proceedings, specifying the manner in which he had executed his trust, and describing the property divided, and the shares allotted to each party. All this was done. The statute did not require that he should report a valuation of the whole, or of any allotment, or for any hearing of the parties before him. If any contest arose as to the relative value of the several allotments, or as to the justice of his report in any other respect, the settlement of such dispute was to be had before the court, which had full power to confirm, change, modify, or set aside his report. See sections 764-766.

Objection is also taken to the record, because of the apparent haste in, and of the order of, procedure. The answer was filed March 13, 1874, 90 days after the service of summons. It would seem, from the course of procedure, that in the mean time the parties had agreed between themselves upon the manner of partition, as they might have done if no action had been commenced, and now, in the action, were carrying out their agreement with the court, as well as the guardian, to protect the interests of the minors. Be that as it may, the defendants all appeared and answered, and, among other things, asked that partition be not made between themselves, but only between the original co-tenants. On the same day the court made and signed its interlocutory decree, determining the interests of the parties according to the allegations and admissions of the pleadings, reciting all the jurisdictional facts, and also showing that, inasmuch as the general guardian of the minors was herself interested personally in the subject-matter of the partition, Francis G. Newlands, Esq., had been appointed attorney specially to protect the interest of said minors; that it had been agreed by all the parties that it was inexpedient that certain lots and blocks designated and described therein should be then partitioned, and that they should be omitted from the partition; also that it was inexpedient that partition should be made as between the defendants at that time, and that partition should only be made as between the original co-tenants; also that a single referee, naming him, should be appointed. By some oversight this interlocutory decree was not filed until April 21st, when it was filed nunc pro tunc, by order of the court, as of March 13th, the day it bore date. The report of the referee was filed on the same day, April 21st, nunc pro tunc as of March 20th. The final decree is dated April 20, and recorded May 5, 1874. All this, instead of proving fraud, as claimed by the defendants, but verifies the supposition that the parties, being properly in court, had agreed among themselves, had submitted their agreement to the court, and the court, finding it lawful and proper, had carried it into effect in the judgment, and according to the forms of law, and that in doing it the papers had remained in the hands of the judge until he had reached and signed his final decree. While counsel broadly intimates that there was fraud in these proceedings, he nowhere intimates, and it is not claimed, that there was injustice in them. We see nothing in them showing evidence of fraud, to which the court itself must have been a party, if there was any. The proceedings were not in conflict with the statute, and nothing was done which the parties had not full power to agree to, and the court had not full power to decree and do. The final decree of partition was valid and binding between the parties, and allotted to the plaintiff therein, under whom the defendant in this case deraigns his title, the property described in the complaint herein. There was no error in the ruling of the court, in this cause, admitting the judgment roll in evidence.

That decree operated to sever the unity of possession, (Wade v. Deray, 50 Cal. 376; McBrown v. Dalton, 70 Cal. 94, 11 Pac. Rep. 583;) and each became entitled by the judgment to the exclusive possession of that part which was allotted to him. In the subsequent distribution of the Sproul estate in the probate court, the part which had been allotted to the Sproul estate was distributed to the plaintiffs herein and their mother, but no part of the property described in the complaint in this cause was distributed or mentioned in said decree of distribution. From the date of said decree of partition, the lands described in the complaint herein were assessed to Sharp, and he paid the taxes thereon until his death, and thereafter the taxes were paid by his executor until the sale to this defendant, immediately after which this suit was brought.

All the specifications of insufficiency of evidence, and of errors of law, herein, are addressed to the proceedings in partition already considered, and there is little left now to be considered on this appeal, except to say that the court below found that all the plaintiffs herein were barred by the provisions of section 318, Code Civil Proc., except the plaintiff Matilda S. Filmer. The court was right in that finding, so far as it goes; but the said Matilda is also barred by said section, so far as relates to the interest acquired from her mother, for the statute had run against the mother before she conveyed to her daughters. As they are all concluded, however, by the decree of partition, and the fee-simple title coming down to defendant under it, he is not required to rest his defense as against any of them on the statute of limitations alone. Judgment and order affirmed.

WEST COAST LUMBER CO. v. NEWKIRK et al. (No. 13,026.)

MECHANICS' LIENS—PLEADING—HARMLESS ERROR.

1. Under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1187, providing that a contractor's claim of lien shall contain, inter alia, the name of the owner or reputed owner of the realty, if known, where such name is not known, the claim need aver nothing on that subject.

2. Under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1192, providing that certain buildings constructed on land with the knowledge of the owner thereof shall be held to have been constructed at his instance, and the land shall be subject to a lien therefor, unless the owner shall give proper notice that he will not be responsible for such construction, the giving of such notice is matter of defense, and need not be denied in the complaint, in an action to foreclose such a lien.

3. Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1185, provides that, if the person causing the construction of a building on land does not own the fee-simple thereof, then only his interest in such land shall be subject to the contractor's lien for such building, and section 1192 provides that, when the construction of a building upon land is known to the owner of any interest therein such interest shall be subject to the contractor's lien. Held that, where the construction is at the instance of a leaseholder, with the knowledge of the owner of the fee, not only the leasehold interest, but also the fee, is subject to such lien.

4. Testimony to show the manner in which books were kept, and that they are correct, is admissible, where the books themselves are properly in evidence.

5. Improper allowance of a question, the answer given thereto having been admitted by the pleadings, is not prejudicial error.

BEATTY, C. J., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; E. PARKER, Judge.

John M. Lucas and Hunsaker, Britt & Lamme, for appellant. Oscar Trippett, for respondent.

THORNTON, J. Action to foreclose the lien of a material-man. Judgment for plaintiff. Motion for a new trial by the defendant Roberts, which was denied. Appeal by the same defendant from the judgment and order denying a new trial. Defendant Roberts demurred to the complaint. The demurrer was overruled. It is argued that the court below erred in so ruling. It is said on behalf of appellant that there is no averment in the complaint that there was a statement in the claim of lien filed that the reputed owner of the fee was not known, and for this reason the demurrer should have been sustained. It is provided in section 1187 of the Code of Civil Procedure that the claim of lien filed with the recorder shall contain, inter alia, "the name of the owner, or reputed owner, if known," of the property to be charged with the lien. The complaint charges that the claim filed stated the name of E. B. Newkirk as the owner of said house, and a reputed owner of a leasehold interest in said realty, and stating in said lien that the owner of the fee of said real estate was not known. This averment shows a compliance with the requirement of the statute above quoted. It is substantially an averment that it was stated in the claim filed that neither the name of the real owner nor of the reputed owner was known to the plaintiff when he filed his lien. The plaintiff is only required to state the names mentioned, if known. If the names are not known, the claim filed is sufficient if it is silent on this subject.

It is further urged as a reason why the court erred in overruling the demurrer that it is not averred in the complaint that the appellant did not give notice that she would not be responsible for the materials furnished by the plaintiff. It is further said that it is not alleged that Roberts had notice of the construction of the building.

We are of opinion that it is averred in the complaint that Roberts had notice of such construction. The allegation is "that such building was constructed upon the said land with the knowledge of each of said defendants." Roberts was one of the defendants referred to in this allegation. We do not think it necessary that it should be averred that the owner of the realty did not give notice that he would not be responsible for the construction of the building. Such notice, under section 1192 of the Code of Civil Procedure, if given, is matter of defense, to be set up by defendant. The averments of the complaint above referred to are, in our judgment, sufficient.

It is further argued that the complaint does not state a cause of action against appellant, for the reason that it is alleged in the complaint that she is the owner of the fee of the land upon which the building was constructed, and that defendant Newkirk, who caused the building to be constructed, is the owner of a leasehold interest therein, and it is provided in section 1185 of the Code of Civil Procedure that, if the person who caused the building to be constructed owned less than a fee-simple estate in such land, then only his interest therein is subject to such lien. The above, it is true, is the provision of section 1185 of the Code of Civil Procedure, but it is also provided in section 1192 of the same chapter that every building or other improvement mentioned in section 1183 of this Code, constructed upon any lands with the knowledge of the owner, or the person having or claiming any interest therein, shall be held to have been constructed at the instance of such owner or person claiming any interest therein, and the interest owned or claimed shall be subject to any lien filed in accordance with the provisions of this chapter, unless such owner or person having or claiming an interest therein shall, within three days after he shall have obtained knowledge of the construction, alteration, or repair, or the intended construction, alteration, or repair, give notice that he will not be responsible for the same by posting a notice in writing to the same effect in some conspicuous place upon said land, or upon the building or other improvement situated thereon.

It is clear that the foregoing provisions of sections 1185 and 1192 must be reconciled, if they can be consistently, with a fair construction of the words used in each section; and in our judgment this can be done within the rule just above stated. We think that the provisions referred to may and should be read as follows: "If the person who caused the building to be constructed owned, when the work was commenced or the materials for the same were furnished, less than a fee-simple estate in the land to be charged with the lien, then only his interest in the land is subject to such lien; provided, however, that if the building was constructed with the knowledge of the owner of the fee of such land, or the person having or claiming any interest therein, such building shall be held to have been constructed at the instance of such owner or person having or claiming any interest therein, and the interest owned or claimed shall be subject to any lien filed in accordance with the provisions of this chapter, unless such owner or person having or claiming an interest shall, within three days after he shall have obtained knowledge of the construction, give the notice above referred to.

In our view, the two sections, when reconciled, as they may be in the mode just pointed out, make the estate of the owner of the fee, (Roberts,) as well as the estate of the owner of the leasehold interest herein, subject to the lien sought to be enforced in this action. Our predecessors, in Phelps v. Mining Co., 49 Cal. 336, so construed like provisions in the act of 1868. This act was entitled "An act for securing liens of mechanics and others," and was approved March 30, 1868. The provisions of section 1185 of the Code of Civil Procedure are found in section 2, and the provisions of 1192 of the Code of Civil Procedure in section 4, of this act of 1868. St. 1867–68, pp. 589, 590. In the case cited the defendant corporation above named was the owner, and one Gilbert Douglass was in possession as lessee of the owner for an unexpired term of the land sought to be charged with the lien. The lessee, Douglass, caused the materials to be furnished for the repairs of the mill. The corporation knew that the work was being done, and gave no notice that it would not be responsible. In an action brought by the plaintiffs, who had furnished the materials, to enforce their lien, the court held that while the corporation was not personally responsible, under the act above cited, for the value of the materials, that its estate in the land as well as the estate of the lessee might be sold for the lien. 49 Cal. 338, 339. See, also, Fuquay v. Stickney, 41 Cal. 583, and Moore v. Jackson, 49 Cal. 109. The two cases last cited sustained the view of the statute taken in Phelps v. Mining Co., in 49 Cal., as well as the conclusion which we have herein reached.

There was no error in refusing defendants' motion to strike out a part of the testimony of C. A. Baker. This testimony was only introduced to show the mode in which the books were kept, and that they were correct. These books were properly admitted in evidence. Landis v. Turner, 14 Cal. 573. The defendant was not injured by the allowance of the questions put to the witness Baker in these words: "State whether or not you knew at the time this lien was filed on lot 1, block 755, of New San Diego, the property on Columbia street, who was the reputed owner of the real estate in fee-simple?" It was averred in the complaint that at the time the lien was filed the plaintiff did not know who was the owner or reputed owner of the fee of the real estate involved herein. This was not denied in the answer. The witness, to the above question, answered that he did not know. It was entirely unnecessary under these circumstances to put the question, but, the question having been put and answered, as admitted by the pleadings, we cannot see that defendant sustained any injury Conceding that the allowance of the question was error, still, as defendant was not injured by it, it is no ground of reversal.

The court did not err in admitting in evidence the claim of lien, nor in admitting the lease from Roberts to Newkirk. The objection to the claim of lien that it did not state that the name of the reputed owner of the fee was not known has been heretofore disposed of. If there is no finding that defendant did not give the notice spoken of in section 1192 of the Code of Civil Procedure, it must be regarded that no such notice was ever given. As such fact does not appear, it must be taken not to have existed. The evidence was sufficient to justify the finding that the materials were furnished by plaintiff to be used in the building mentioned in the complaint. The cartage complained of was a portion of the cost of the materials furnished, and, if allowed at all, was allowed as a part of the value of the materials.

We find no error in the record, and the judgment and order are affirmed, with directions to the court below, on the going down of the remittitur, to allow plaintiff, under section 1195 of the Code of Civil Procedure, a reasonable fee for the services of its attorney in this court. In re BROWN'S ESTATE. (No. 13,096.)

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS—APPOINTMENT—NON-RESIDENTS.

Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1354, provides that "where a person absent from the state * * * is named executor, * * * if there is no other executor, letters of administration with the will annexed must be granted," and § 1388 empowers the court to examine "on oath the party applying, and any other persons," as to the value of the property, to determine the penalty of the bond required of an executor. Held, that a non-resident, named as executor in a will, may apply for and receive letters testamentary, and it is unnecessary that he be actually in the state when the order for issuance of the letters is made.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county; W. C. VAN FLEET, Judge.

Clinton L. White, for appellant. Chauncey H. Dunn and Taylor & Holl, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. C. Emeline V. Brown died on the 16th of February, 1888, and at the time of her death was a resident of the city of Philadelphia, in the state of Pennsylvania. She left real property situate in the city of Sacramento, in this state, of the value of about $15,000. She left a duly-executed will, disposing of all her property to certain legatees, who were non-residents of this state. In her will George A. West was named as sole executor. The will was duly admitted to probate on the 21st of February, 1888, in the orphans' court of Philadelphia, and letters testamentary were issued to said West. On the 6th of October, 1888, a copy of the will and the probate thereof, duly authenticated, was filed in the superior court of the county of Sacramento, and E. A. Burr, a resident of that county, filed a petition asking that letters of administration with the will annexed be issued to him. Subsequently, S. B. Smith, the public administrator of the county, filed his petition that letters of administration upon the estate with the will annexed be issued to him. And thereafter George A. West, named in the will as executor thereof, filed his petition, stating that he desired to act as executor of the will in the state of California, and asking that letters testamentary be issued to him. The petitions were heard together, and an order was made admitting the will to probate, and directing the issuance of letters of administration with the will annexed to S. B. Smith, the public administrator. The petition of West was denied, because of his being a non-resident of the state. The finding on that point is as follows: "The petitioner, George A. West, was, at all the times named in his petition, and now is, a resident of the state of Pennsylvania, and is not now in the state of California, but is absent therefrom, and has not been therein at any time pending said proceedings." And from the facts found the court concluded the law to be "that said George A. West is not eligible to appointment as executor of said will in this state, and has no authority to nominate an administrator of said estate, and his petition in that regard should be denied." In due time West moved the court to set aside the order denying his petition and granting that of Smith, and for a new trial, on the ground that the decision was not justified by the evidence. The motion was made on a brief statement of the case, and one of the specifications therein was as follows: "The evidence is insufficient to justify that portion of the finding of fact of the court as follows: 'But is absent therefrom, and has not been therein at any time pending said proceeding,' in this,—that the evidence shows that George A. West had never been a resident of the state of California or personally present therein; but that he duly filed his petition for the issuance to himself of letters testamentary, submitted to the jurisdiction of the court, and would have and will appear in person, and qualify as such executor, within a reasonable time after his appointment." The court granted the motion, and Smith appealed from the order.

The record presents but a single question for decision, viz.: Is a person who is named in a will as the executor thereof, but who is a non-resident of this state and has never been therein, for that reason alone incompetent to be appointed executor of the will here? The question must be solved by an examination of the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure relating to proceedings in probate courts. Section 1369 declares that no person is competent or entitled to serve as administrator who is "not a bona fide resident of the state." Section 1350 declares what classes of persons are incompetent to serve as executors, but omits the clause above quoted from section 1369. It then provides that, "if the sole executor or all the executors are incompetent, or renounce or fail to apply for letters, or to appear and qualify, letters of administration with the will annexed must be issued," etc. Section 1354 provides that, "where a person absent from the state * * * is named executor, if there is another executor who accepts the trust and qualifies, the latter may have letters testamentary, and administer the estate until the return of the absentee, * * * who may then be admitted as joint executor. If there is no other executor, letters of administration with the will annexed must be granted; but the court may, in its discretion, revoke them on the return of the absent executor." And section 1388 provides that every person to whom letters testamentary are directed to issue must, before receiving them, execute a bond in an amount fixed by the court; and to determine the penalty of the bond the court must ascertain the value of the property "by examining on oath the party applying and any other persons."

It is admitted by counsel for appellant that under these provisions a non-resident person may be appointed, and may serve as executor in this state, but it is contended that he must be in the state at the time of his appointment, and must personally submit himself to the jurisdiction of the court.

We think a non-resident may apply for and receive letters testamentary in this state. His application may be made by himself in person or by attorney, and, if made by attorney, he is constructively present. If required by the court, he must appear and testify when the penalty of his bond is fixed, and, at any rate, must appear and qualify within a reasonable time. If he fails to make application for letters, or to appear and qualify within proper time, letters of administration with the will annexed will be issued to some other person. Where, however, he has made application for letters, either in person or by attorney, it is not absolutely necessary that he be actually in the state when the order is made directing the issuance of letters. If a bond is required, the court may delay for a time fixing the penalty of it, or may fix it by examining on oath other persons, and, if the property requires immediate care, a special administrator may be appointed. Of course the appointee must come here within a reasonable time, and personally submit himself to the jurisdiction of the court, and personally conduct the settlement of the estate. What we have said above is in harmony with the provisions of section 1354, supra. The words, "a person absent from the state," used in that section, mean, as we interpret them, a person both actually and constructively absent; that is to say, a person who is out of the state, and has made no application for letters. In this case West was not thus absent. The court, therefore, properly granted his motion for a new trial, and the order should be affirmed.

Venue—Actions for Injury to Realty.

A suit to enjoin the building of a dam which it is alleged will flood plaintiff's land is such an action for injury thereto as must be tried in the county where the same is situated under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 392, providing that actions for injury to real property must be tried in the county where the subject of the action is situated.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; James G. Maguire, Judge.

Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 392, provides that actions for injury to real property must be tried in the county where the subject of the action is situated.

Ben Morgan and A. Ruef, for appellant. Kellogg & King, Wm. F. Herrin, and Charles N. Fox, for respondent.

Beatty, C. J. This is a suit to enjoin the defendant from building a dam which plaintiff alleges defendant has commenced and is now constructing, and asserts its intention of completing, and which, it is alleged, will when completed permanently flood a certain tract of land in San Mateo county, in which plaintiff has a leasehold estate. The action was commenced in San Francisco, and in due time the defendant moved to transfer the cause for trial to the county of San Mateo, on the ground that the proper place for the trial thereof was in the county in which the real property subject to the threatened injury was situated. The superior court granted the motion, and this appeal is from the order transferring the cause.

The only question presented for our consideration is whether this is an action for injury to real property within the meaning of subdivision 1, § 392, of the Code of Civil Procedure. If it is, the county of San Mateo is the proper place of trial, and the order of the superior court was correct. That the sole object and purpose of the action is to prevent a threatened injury to real property is clear, but the appellant contends that section 392 only comprehends actions for damages for injuries past and completed. We see no reason in the language of the statute or in the policy it was intended to conserve for making this distinction of limiting its operation to one class of actions for injuries to real property. The injury is the same whether threatened or completed, and the privilege accorded to the plaintiff to prevent the injury by injunction ought not to be held to give him the right to have the trial in a county where the cause would not have been triable if he had waited the completion of the injury before seeking redress. Order affirmed.

PLEADING.

A complaint which, after stating a good cause of action, proceeds to anticipate the defense, violates a plain rule of pleading, but is good against a general demurrer.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Page & Eells, for appellant. Joseph M. Nougues, for respondent.

WORKS, J. This is an action for the recovery of money. Demurrer to the complaint was overruled, and, the defendant failing to answer, judgment was rendered against him, and he appeals.

The appellant contends that the complaint was insufficient, and that the court below erred in overruling the demurrer thereto. The complaint, after stating a good cause of action, proceeded to anticipate an expected defense. By thus violating a plain rule of pleading, the pleader rendered his complaint uncertain and ambiguous. But we think it was good against the general demurrer that was interposed. The point made against it is that it shows a former adjudication of the question presented in this case, but we think that it does not. Judgment affirmed.

HUSBAND AND WIFE—WIFE'S SEPARATE PROPERTY.

1. A woman before her marriage had a possessory title to, and was in possession of, certain public land. After her marriage the United States government conveyed the tract of which said land formed a part to the board of town trustees, "in trust for the use and benefit of the occupants thereof." Subsequently thereto the husband made application that said land be conveyed to the wife, which was done, and the required sum was paid by the husband. Held, that the wife, under the conveyance from the government, had an equitable interest, which was her separate property, and was not made community property by the husband's advancing money to obtain the legal title thereto.

2. It is immaterial, as regards the character of the property, whether such conveyance by the government was made before or after the marriage, where it appears that she, or those from whom she claimed possessory title, had settled upon and occupied the land prior to her marriage.

P. F. Simonds, for appellant. Caldwell & Little, for respondents.

HAYNE, C. This was an action to quiet title as to several lots in Nevada City. As to some of the lots the court gave judgment for the defendant, and as to the other lots the court gave judgment for the plaintiffs, from which judgment the present appeal is taken by the defendant. The evidence is not brought up. The defendant contends that upon the findings the judgment should have been for him.

The material facts shown by the findings are as follows: The plaintiffs' testatrix, one Mary J. Lones, was the wife of the defendant. Before her marriage she had a "possessory title" to, and was in possession of, the lots in controversy on this appeal. The land was then public land, and the title was in the United States government. After the marriage the tract covered by the town was conveyed by the government to the board of town trustees, "in trust for the several use and benefit of the occupants thereof," and subsequently thereto the husband made application that said lots be conveyed to the wife, which was done. The sum necessary to be paid to the municipal authorities was paid by the husband out of his separate property. The difference between this case and that made on the other appeal (20 Pac. Rep. 248) is that here the wife was in possession under "possessory title" before the marriage, while there the husband entered into possession under deeds from prior occupants after marriage. Upon that state of facts it was held that under no view that could be suggested was the property the separate property of the wife. We think, however, that as to the lots involved in this appeal a different conclusion results. It is true, as argued for the defendant, that mere possession of public land gives no right as against the government. But the government has chosen to convey the land to trustees in trust for the occupants, and we think that the wife was one of the beneficiary class. She had, therefore, an equitable interest, which was her separate property. This was held in the case of Eversdon v. Mayhew, 65 Cal. 163, 3 Pac. Rep. 641. The only difference between that case and this is that there the patent to the municipal authorities had issued before the marriage. Here it was issued after the marriage. But we do not think that this alters the case. The question is, what was the class of persons whom the townsite acts were intended to protect? The act itself (quoted on the former appeal) designates such class as consisting of those by whom said lands have been "settled upon and occupied." It must be taken from the findings that either the wife or those from whom she acquired her "possessory title" had settled upon and occupied said lands before her marriage. The circumstances, therefore, which entitled her to the bounty of the government had occurred before the marriage, and, this being so, we think that the conveyance of the government title to the town authorities was for her benefit, and that the fact that she married before the patent to the board of trustees had issued is immaterial.

The wife being the owner of the equitable estate as her separate property, the husband could not turn it into community property by advancing from his own funds the sums necessary to obtain the legal title from the municipal authorities. Fuller v. Ferguson, 26 Cal. 566; Noe v. Card, 14 Cal. 600. If there is any expression in the former opinion in conflict with this proposition, it is inaccurate, and was not intended to assert the contrary of what is here stated. The question as to whether the property is the separate property of the wife is the only one discussed by counsel. We therefore advise that the judgment appealed from be affirmed.

We concur: Foote, C.; Gibson, C.

Welsh v. Plumas County. (No. 12,953.)

Toll-Roads—Injunction.

1. A right of way for a toll-road is such an interest in the land covered by it as will enable its owner to bring an action against a county declaring the road to be a public highway, under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 738, which provides that an action may be brought by any person against another, who claims an estate or interest in real property adverse to him, for the purpose of determining such adverse claim.

2. Though such right of way be a mere incorporeal hereditament, yet a complaint which shows that plaintiff is the owner of the right of way for the toll-road, and entitled to collect tolls thereon, and that defendant interferes with his enjoyment of his property by depriving him of his tolls, presents a sufficient case for an injunction, under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 731, which provides that anything which is an obstruction to the free use of property may be enjoined.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Plumas county; G. G. Clough, Judge.

Action by P. R. Welsh against the county of Plumas. Judgment was rendered for defendant, and plaintiff appeals.

Hundley & Gale, for appellant. C. E. McLaughlin, for appellee.

Gibson, C. This is an appeal from a judgment entered upon the declination of plaintiff to amend his amended complaint, a general demurrer thereto having been sustained. The amended complaint presents these facts: An act entitled "An act to authorize the construction of a wagon road from the Cold Spring House, in Butte county, to Greenville, in Plumas county," approved March 17, 1866, authorized James R. Baylan, A. Miller, A. Wood, their associates and assigns, to construct and keep in repair a good wagon road, commencing at the points named in the title of the act, said road to be completed within one year from the passage of the act. The act granted the right of way over and along the route of the road, provided no public road then in use between the points designated should be used, unless by permission of the board of supervisors of Plumas county, and also the right to collect such tolls upon the road, after its completion, as might be directed by the board of supervisors. Pursuant to this act the grantees therein and their associates accepted the grant, and within the time specified in the act laid out and constructed a good wagon road, and have ever since kept the same in good repair. In the laying out and construction of the road they did not, except by permission of the said board of supervisors, granted by a resolution entered on its minutes, occupy any public road then in use between the points designated in the title of the act. On the 25th day of September, 1866, and after the completion of the road, the board of supervisors of Plumas county passed an order, and entered the same on its minutes, fixing the rates of toll to be charged and collected on the wagon road by the said grantees, their associates and assigns. Plaintiff, by virtue of legal conveyances in writing from the original grantees named in the act, is the owner of the wagon road as successor and assignee from the said grantees, and is entitled to have and receive the tolls, and to enjoy all the rights and privileges, pertaining or incident thereto. Ever since the completion of the road the plaintiff, his predecessors and grantors, have been the owners, and in possession, of the wagon road, and received and collected tolls therefrom, until the board of supervisors of Plumas county, at a regular meeting on the 4th day of May, 1887, by an order entered on its minutes, without notice to plaintiff, declared the Cold Spring House and Greenville toll-road, by which name the wagon road was known, to be a public highway, and since that date defendant has claimed to be the owner of the road, and denies the right of plaintiff to charge and collect tolls thereon. This claim of defendant is without right, and it has no estate, right, title, or interest in the road or any part thereof. By reason of these acts of the defendant all persons traveling on the road refuse to pay toll, or to recognize the right of plaintiff to collect the same, whereby he has been deprived of the full use and enjoyment of his property, without due process of law, and without compensation made or tendered to him.

These facts, respondent contends, do not show any estate or interest in the land covered by the wagon road, but simply a franchise to collect tolls thereon, and therefore this action will not lie under section 738 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides that "an action may be brought by any person against another who claims an estate or interest in real property adverse to him, for the purpose of determining such adverse claim;" and that, even assuming that the facts show an estate or interest in the land covered by the wagon road, it also appearing that the board of supervisors, as the officers of defendant, acted beyond the scope of their authority, such action is therefore void, and cannot injure plaintiff.

Has the plaintiff such an interest in the wagon road as will enable him to maintain this suit? We think he has. The act of March 17, 1866, does not prescribe how the acceptance of the grant by the grantees should be manifested, but, as they built the road within the time mentioned in the act, they acquired whatever passed by the legislative grant. Rush v. Jackson, 24 Cal. 308. The principal thing granted by this act was the privilege or franchise of collecting tolls upon a wagon road between the points designated in the act, for an indefinite period, for the private advantage of the grantees and their assigns, in consideration of building and maintaining, at their own expense, the wagon road for the benefit of the public. In order to enjoy this private advantage it was necessary to build and maintain the wagon road, and the plaintiff's predecessors and assignors, having built and maintained it, thereby acquired the right of way for the road over the land embraced within it. This right of way is private property, but for a public use, and is incident and necessary to the privilege of collecting tolls thereon, and constitutes an interest in the land upon which the wagon road rests. Appeal of Railroad Co., 32 Cal. 500. This case decided that a legislative grant of a right of way for a street railroad through a street in the city of San Francisco, with the privilege of collecting a certain specified fare from the passengers riding thereon, gave the appellant corporation such an interest in the street as to make it liable for its proportion of the cost of improving the street. A wagon road may be mortgaged or hypothecated to obtain funds for the construction or repair of such road, (Civil Code, §§ 522, 523;) and may, with the franchise, be sold upon execution, (Id. § 388.) The right of way for the wagon road held by plaintiff may be terminated by forfeiture for abuse of his franchise in collecting illegal tolls, (see Id. § 514;) or by condemnation by the county, (Pol. Code, § 2643, subd. 4;) or by purchase by the county, (Id. § 2800;) or by expiration or non-user of the franchise, (Id. § 2619.) In either of these events the board of supervisors, having the general supervision of highways in their county, would be required, by proper ordinance, to either cause the road to be recorded as a highway free to the public, or, if not necessary for the use of the public, to abolish or discontinue it. Id. §§ 2643, 2681; County Government Act, approved March 14, 1883, (St. 1883, p. 303, § 25.)

It is therefore clear that the board of supervisors have the power to act in relation to the property in controversy, but, as it does not appear that plaintiff's franchise was terminated in any of the ways above stated, the board of supervisors, in declaring the wagon road a public highway, and denying plaintiff's right to collect the proper tolls thereon, which, as we have seen, they can do under certain circumstances, asserted a claim, for and on behalf of the defendant, to plaintiff's interest in the land embraced within the wagon road that is adverse to plaintiff's interest therein, and prevents the free use and enjoyment of his property, which adverse claim he has a right to have determined in this form of action under section 738, Code Civil Proc. If plaintiff's franchise has expired or been determined by forfeiture or otherwise, whereby the defendant can properly declare the wagon road a free highway, it can set it up in its answer to plaintiff's complaint for adjudication.

Again, treating plaintiff's right of way for the toll-road as a mere incorporeal hereditament, which does not carry an estate in land, still, as his complaint shows that he is the owner of the right of way for the toll-road, and in and entitled to the possession thereof, for the purpose of collecting tolls thereon, and that the action of the defendant, through its officers, the board of supervisors, interferes with and obstructs the free use and enjoyment of his property, by depriving him of his tolls, a sufficient case in equity is presented to sustain an injunction against the defendant, enjoining it from interfering with or obstructing the use of plaintiff's property, by asserting an adverse claim thereto, and denying his right to collect tolls. Id. § 731; Conniff v. San Francisco, 67 Cal. 45, 7 Pac. Rep. 41.

We therefore advise that the judgment be reversed, and the cause remanded, with instructions to the court below to overrule the demurrer to the amended complaint, with leave to defendant to answer.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with instructions to the court below to overrule the demurrer to the amended complaint, with leave to the defendant to answer.

APPEAL—RECORD.

Intermediate, non-appealable orders cannot be reviewed on an appeal from the judgment, where no bill of exceptions has been filed.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; T. H. REARDEN, Judge.

Moses G. Cobb, for appellant. J. F. Castlehun, for respondent.

HAYNE, C. This is an appeal from a judgment of dismissal for want of prosecution. From papers printed in the transcript it is to be surmised that the defendant moved to dismiss the action for want of prosecution; that this motion was granted; that thereafter the plaintiff moved to have the order for dismissal set aside; that this latter motion was denied, and that thereafter a judgment of dismissal was recorded. The appeal is not from the orders, but is from the judgment. The appellant seeks to have the orders reviewed as intermediate, non-appealable orders, affecting the merits, etc., but in order so to review them it is essential that there should be a bill of exceptions, (Douglas v. Dakin, 46 Cal. 51; Stoddart v. Burge, 53 Cal. 398; Welsh v. Allen, 54 Cal. 211; Hayne, New Trials & App. § 262;) and there is no bill of exceptions. Even if the orders were themselves the subject of appeal, and an appeal had been taken from them, it would have been necessary to identify the papers used on the hearing, (Pardy v. Montgomery, 77 Cal. 326, 19 Pac. Rep. 530;) and there was no such identification. We therefore advise that the judgment be affirmed.

We concur: Foote, C.; Gibson, C.

Schmidt v. Bauer. (No. 12,588.)

Negligence—Dangerous Premises.

1. In an action for personal injuries, it appeared that plaintiff was in defendant's saloon, and asked him the way to the urinal; that in the direction defendant pointed there was a stairway leading down to the urinal, and on the wall the word "Toilet" was painted; that in the same general direction there was a door leading to a porch, from which a stairway led down into the back yard, and plaintiff passed through this door and down this stairway; that he, in attempting to return, opened another door leading into another part of the house, where the floor had been taken up for repairs, and, stepping in, fell into the cellar and was injured; that he did not know the condition of the building, and supposed he was going in through the door at which he had gone out. Plaintiff both denied and admitted that he knew what the word "Toilet," painted on the wall, meant, but testified that he did not see it. Held, that the evidence showed no actionable negligence on the part of defendant.

2. A complaint alleging that plaintiff was at the place where the accident occurred on business with, and at the invitation of, defendant, is sufficient to show defendant's duty, as between the parties, to keep the premises in safe condition.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; John F. Finn, Judge.

J. F. Castlehun, for appellant. Marcus Rosenthal, for respondent.

Works, J. This is an action for damages for personal injuries, alleged to have been the result of the defendant's negligence. There was a trial by jury. When the plaintiff's evidence was in, the defendant moved for a nonsuit, which was denied. There was a verdict for the plaintiff, the defendant's motion for a new trial was denied, and he appeals.

The evidence on the part of the plaintiff showed substantially that the defendant was a keeper of a liquor saloon, and that his private residence was connected therewith, in the same building; that the plaintiff was in the saloon, drinking beer; that he asked the defendant the way to the urinal; that the defendant pointed the way; that in the direction indicated by him there was a stairway leading to the urinal in the basement of the building, and on the wall the word "Toilet" was painted in large letters to direct the way; that in the same general direction pointed out by the defendant there was a door leading out onto a porch, back of the defendant's dwelling or family rooms, from which a stairway led down into the back yard; that the plaintiff, instead of taking the stairway leading to the urinal connected with the saloon, passed through the door out onto the porch, and down into the back yard, where there was a urinal for the use of the family; that the plaintiff attempted to return to the saloon, but instead of coming through the door through which he had passed out, he opened another door leading into another and private part of the house, where the floor had been taken up for the purpose of making repairs, and, stepping in, was precipitated into a cellar and injured; that the plaintiff did not know the condition of the building which caused his fall, and that he supposed that he was coming back through the door at which he had gone out. The plaintiff both denied and admitted that he knew what the word "Toilet," painted on the wall, meant, but testified that he did not see it.

This evidence showed no actionable negligence on the part of the defendant, and for that reason the nonsuit should have been granted. The keeper of a public place of business is bound to keep his premises, and the passage-ways to and from it, in safe condition, and use ordinary care to avoid accidents or injury to those properly entering upon his premises on business. Parker v. Publishing Co., 69 Me. 173; Carleton v. Steel Co., 99 Mass. 216; Bennett v. Railroad Co., 102 U. S. 577. But this rule only applies to such parts of the building as are a part of, or used to gain access to, or constitute a passage-way to and from, the business portion of the building, and not to such parts of the building as are used for the private purposes of the owner, unless the party injured has been induced by the invitation or allurement of the owner, express or implied, to enter therein. Zoebisch v. Tarbell, 10 Allen, 385; Parker v. Publishing Co., 69 Me. 173; Pierce v. Whitcomb, 48 Vt. 127; Wilkinson v. Fairrie, 1 Hurl. & C. 631; Murray v. McLean, 57 Ill. 378; Victory v. Baker, 67 N. Y. 366; Toomey v. Sanborn, 14 N. E. Rep. 921. As was said in Sweeny v. Railroad Co., 10 Allen, 372: "In order to maintain an action for an injury to person or property by reason of negligence or want of due care, there must be shown to exist some obligation or duty towards the plaintiff which the defendant has left undischarged or unfulfilled." The evidence fails to show any such duty resting upon the defendant towards the plaintiff. His injury resulted from his entrance, uninvited, into the private apartments of the defendant. No duty rested upon the defendant, as between him and the plaintiff, to keep such part of his premises in a safe condition. The plaintiff was there without right. The evidence does not show that he was in any way induced by the defendant to enter upon that part of his premises. It not only fails to show negligence on the part of the defendant, but does clearly show contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff. The way to the urinal was plain to be seen. The plaintiff chose to go into the private yard of the defendant, and in coming back mistook the door through which he fell for the one through which he passed out. He had no right to pass through either of these doors. To do so under the circumstances was such negligence as must preclude him from recovering for his injuries. Victory v. Baker, 67 N. Y. 366.

Conceding that the respondent was not wrongfully in the place where the accident occurred, and giving the most liberal construction to his evidence, he was there by the mere license of the appellant, and for that reason the appellant owed him no duty, and he went there subject to all the risks attending his going. Holmes v. Railway Co., L. R. 4 Exch. 257; Parker v. Publishing Co., supra.

Counsel for respondent rely mainly upon McRickard v. Flint, 21 N. E. Rep. 153, as supporting his case. The case referred to differed widely from the one before us. The negligence relied upon there was that the defendants had failed to comply with a statute of that state, which provided that "in any store or building in the city of New York in which there shall exist or be placed any hoist-way, elevator, or well-hole, the openings thereof through and upon each floor of said building shall be provided with and protected by a substantial railing, and such good and sufficient trap-doors with which to close the same as may be directed and approved by the superintendent of buildings; and such trap-door shall be kept closed at all times except when in actual use by the occupant or occupants of the building having the use and control of the same," etc. It was held that the failure to comply with this statute was prima facie evidence of negligence, and that the plaintiff, being in the building on business with one of the occupants, and walking through a door opening onto the elevator shaft, by reason of which he fell and was injured, was not guilty of contributory negligence. This, it seems to us, presents an entirely different question from the one we are considering, and does not in any way militate against the conclusions we have reached. There are other cases cited, but they do not conflict with the views we have expressed.

The appellant also contends that the court below erred in overruling his demurrer to the complaint. We think the complaint was sufficient. It alleges that the plaintiff was at the place where the accident occurred on business with, and at the invitation of, the defendant. This was sufficient to show the duty on the part of the defendant, as between the parties, of keeping the premises in safe condition. As we have seen, the evidence failed to establish this allegation, and for that reason the plaintiff's case was not made out. Judgment and order reversed.

APPEAL—RULINGS ON EVIDENCE.

Where the bill of exceptions does not contain all the evidence, it cannot be said that the court erred in allowing a witness to testify that an instrument purporting to be a deed was a mortgage.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county; J. G. SWINNERTON, Judge.

L. W. Elliott, for appellant. J. C. Campbell, for respondent.

WORKS, J. This is an action to quiet title. The court found fully the claim of title under which both of the parties claimed to own the property, which clearly showed that the plaintiff was the owner thereof, and that the defendant had no title thereto. The appellant assigns as error that the court permitted a witness to testify that a certain instrument purporting to be a deed was in fact a mortgage. The bill of exceptions does not contain all of the evidence, or purport to do so; therefore, conceding that the question asked called for a conclusion of the witness, or was otherwise improper in form, we cannot say that this error was injurious to the appellant, or such as should reverse the judgment. There is nothing in the findings to show an estoppel as against the respondent or his grantors. The findings covered the issues raised, or attempted to be raised, by the cross-complaint of the defendant.

FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES — PLEADING — COMPLAINT.

Action to set aside fraudulent conveyances, by Fox against Dyer and others. From a judgment sustaining a demurrer to the complaint, plaintiff appeals.

E. J. & J. H. Moore and A. E. Ball, for appellant. Haggin & Dibble and Metcalf & Metcalf, for respondents.

WORKS, J. The complaint in this case attempts to state the facts showing that certain conveyances of real estate by an assignee in insolvency were fraudulent, and that the plaintiff, as one of the creditors of the insolvent, was thereby damaged. The complaint is unnecessarily long, and to attempt to state even its substance would for that reason extend this opinion in like manner, and serve no useful purpose. The court below sustained a demurrer to the complaint, and we think properly. It does not sufficiently state the facts claimed to have constituted the fraud, nor does it show that the plaintiff was in a position to have been injured, conceding that the conveyances were fraudulently made. Judgment affirmed.

TAPPAN v. ALBANY BREWING CO. (No. 12,433.)

CONTRACT—PUBLIC POLICY.

An agreement to pay one of the owners of land sold under a decree in a suit for partition a further sum for her interest therein, provided she would not oppose the confirmation of such sale, which was made for an inadequate price, is against public policy, as being a promise to pay a consideration for the concealment of a fact which it was the party's duty to make known to the court and her co-tenants.

N. D. Anderson, for appellant. Thos. H. Smith, for respondent.

WORKS, J. The complaint in this case alleges, in substance, that an action for partition of certain real estate having been brought, judgment rendered, decree for the sale of the property entered, the property was sold to the defendant; that the property was sold for much less than its real value; that the plaintiff's assignor, who was one of the defendants, and a tenant in common of the real estate, being dissatisfied with the price at which the property was sold, was about to commence proceedings to prevent the confirmation of the sale by the court; that the defendants, to induce her not to make such objections, agreed to pay her $1,000 additional for her interest in the property immediately upon the sale being confirmed; and that she, relying upon such promise, and in consideration thereof, refrained from making objections to the confirmation of said sale, and that, no objection being made, the sale was duly confirmed. The defendant paid $100 of the amount, and this action is to recover the balance of $900. The court below overruled a demurrer to the complaint, and the defendant failing to answer, judgment was entered against it, and it appeals.

The demurrer should have been sustained. The contract was a fraud, not only upon the court, whose duty it was to pass upon and confirm or set aside the sale, but upon the parties in the action of partition. It was the plain duty of the plaintiff's assignor, if she knew of any valid reason why the sale should have been set aside, or not confirmed, to make it known to the court and her co-defendants. It is contended by the respondent that this was nothing more than the payment of a sum of money by way of a compromise of litigation, and that such contracts have been upheld. We do not so construe the agreement. It was a promise to pay a consideration for the concealment of a fact from the court and the parties, material to the rights of said parties, and which it was her duty to make known. Such a contract was against public policy, and neither party should receive the aid of the courts to enforce it. Beard v. Beard, 65 Cal. 356, 4 Pac. Rep. 229. The judgment is reversed, with instructions to the court below to sustain the demurrer to the complaint.

TROUSCLAIR v. PACIFIC COAST STEAM-SHIP CO. (No. 13,025.)

CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—EVIDENCE.

1. Plaintiff was injured by a train while pushing off from a wharf in a boat. He might have easily escaped injury if he had changed his position in the boat, or had entered it at another place, and could have seen and heard the approaching train from a distance. His testimony showed that his mind was so fixed on the boat that he paid no attention. Held contributory negligence, warranting a nonsuit.

2. In such case it is immaterial that defendant was negligent in having its tracks so near the edge of the wharf, and in having only two men in charge of the train, and in using inferior brakes, and that it had no wharf franchise, and the bay was a public highway for boats, in the absence of evidence that the injury was willful and wanton.

BEATTY, C. J., dissenting.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; E. PARKER, Judge.

Olin Wellborn and Henry J. Stevens, for appellant. Henderson & McDonald, for respondent.

HAYNE, C. Action for damages for personal injuries. Verdict and judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals.

The defendant is a corporation owning and operating a wharf extending into the bay of San Diego, at which vessels land. Along the length of the wharf was a railroad track, which was used for the purpose of transporting freight to the shore. On one side of this track was a space about seven feet, which was used as a passage-way for travelers along the wharf. On this side was a landing for small boats, with steps going down to the water, and a boat-house, which was rented by the defendant to a man who kept boats for hire. On the other side was a space of about 13 inches between the outer rail and the edge of the wharf. On this side, about 300 yards from the shore, was a raft moored to the wharf. There was some staging there, with steps down to the raft. The plaintiff must have been familiar with the general features of the place, for he testifies that he had "been going there for about three years." On the day of the accident the plaintiff had been fishing on the raft. While there, he accepted an invitation from one of his companions to go boating. The companion procured a boat, and attempted to bring it up to the raft. He did not succeed in getting it close enough, and the boat drifted along-side the wharf. He then told the plaintiff to go upon the wharf, and get down from there into the boat, which the plaintiff proceeded to do. The boat might have been brought up to the raft with slight trouble. The plaintiff himself testifies in this regard as follows: "I don't know what there was to obstruct the passage to the raft. He didn't get up close enough. I suppose, if he had taken a run out and back again, he might have come in. I don't recollect any obstruction to prevent his getting in." When the plaintiff got into the boat the bow had got under the wharf, with which the boat then made an angle. The mast was close up to the side of the wharf, and projected several feet above it. The companion was in the stern. According to the plaintiff's story, he was engaged for 10 or 15 minutes in trying to push the boat out from the wharf. While so engaged, the train came backing out towards the end of the wharf at the rate of about "six or eight" miles an hour. When about 40 yards from the boat, the lookout on the end of the train saw the mast and the plaintiff, and signaled the engineer to stop. The latter did not see the signal as soon as he ought to have done; and although, when he did see it, he tried to stop, he was not able to do so before the place of danger was reached. The edge of the cars caught the mast, and broke it in two. The plaintiff was struck by the mast, thrown against a cross-piece or "cap-head," on which the floor of the wharf rested, knocked overboard, and seriously injured. The view between the place of the accident and the starting point of the train was unobstructed. In this regard the plaintiff testified as follows: "Between me and the point where these cars would start out was an open space. There was nothing to obstruct the view to me or to them. I might have been obstructed by the canvass between me and them. I could not see the cars. I didn't know the cars were coming. I had no thought to determine whether the man in the cars could see me or not. I didn't know they were coming." "There was no train in sight when I got into the boat that I recollect. If there was any train, I didn't know it. My mind was so fixed on the boat that I never paid any attention. I did not notice any before I got into the boat." As above stated, the lookout on the train (who was one of the plaintiff's witnesses, and no longer in the employ of the defendant) saw the plaintiff. He "could see his head." And it seems entirely clear that, if plaintiff had looked, he must have seen the train coming. Not only could he have seen it if he had looked, but he could have heard it if he had listened. One of his witnesses testified that "a train of that kind, running out on that pier, makes a great deal of noise and fuss. You can hear it from one end of the wharf to the other. You often can, except on account of the wind. It depends whichever way the wind blows. * * * A train could be very easily heard running, at the rate we were running, long before we got to where the man was at the mast." And the plaintiff himself testified that "there was scarcely no wind going." If he had seen or heard the train, he could easily have saved himself by stepping back to the stern of the boat, where his companion remained uninjured. But he neither looked nor listened. His mind "was so fixed on the boat" that he "never paid any attention."

It therefore appears from the plaintiff's own account that, while seeking amusement and recreation, he voluntarily placed himself in a dangerous position,—a position in which, unless care was taken, he would in all probability be injured by the running of the defendant's train in the ordinary way; that he did so, although the perfectly safe course of having the boat come up to the raft involved very slight exertion or delay; that while in such dangerous position he never thought of danger. He did not look, he did not listen, but allowed his entire attention to be absorbed by what he was doing. This seems to us to have been gross negligence. Suppose that a man should go to sleep upon a railroad track running in the middle of a highway, or should stop his vehicle on a crossing to converse with a friend, and pay absolutely no attention to the approach of trains. Would he have a valid claim if, while in such a position, a train should injure him? The answer to such a claim would be simple and obvious. It was his own fault to act in such a way, and but for such fault the accident would not have happened. In other words, his own neligence contributed directly and proximately to the injury. This seems to be a plain proposition, and the facts of this case are within it. But authority is not wanting. The case of Glascock v. Railroad Co., 73 Cal. 137, 14 Pac. Rep. 518, is directly in point. There a person was killed while crossing a railroad track at a place where the view was unobstructed for 200 yards. Although the engineer did not ring his bell or blow his whistle, as he should have done, it was held, in a suit brought by his administratrix, that the plaintiff was properly nonsuited; and PATERSON, J., delivering the opinion, said: "Having good eyes, it was his duty to use them, at least to some extent, for his own protection, and his failure to do so would be contributory negligence, and prevent a recovery, notwithstanding the negligence of the defendant in failing to ring the locomotive bell or blow the whistle. * * * If he looked, he saw; and, having age and faculties to understand the dangers, is charged with a knowledge of them, and was bound to act upon that knowledge as a prudent and cautious man would under the circumstances."

In the case before us, it may be conceded, for the purposes of the opinion, that there was negligence on the part of the defendant in having its track so near the edge of the wharf, and in having only two men in charge of the train, and in not having better appliances in the way of brakes. In view of the contributory negligence of the plaintiff this is immaterial. So the fact, if it be such, that the defendant had no wharf franchise, and the fact that the bay was a public highway for boats, are immaterial. The want of a wharf franchise could only go to establish wrong on the part of the defendant, and not to excuse wrong on the part of the plaintiff. And the right to navigate the bay does not give immunity from the consequences of doing so negligently. It is certainly true that the plaintiff's conduct did not give the defendant a right to willfully or wantonly injure him; but there is no pretense that the injury was willful or wanton on the part of the defendant or its employes. The evidence does not show anything of the kind, and the jury expressly found to the contrary. The plaintiff should have been nonsuited on his own statement. And, to say the least, his case was not strengthened by the evidence introduced by the defendant. In a case like this, the fact that the jury viewed the locality makes no difference. We therefore advise that the judgment and order denying a new trial be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; GIBSON, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order denying a new trial are reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

WORKS, J., did not participate in the decision of the above cause.

BEATTY, C. J. I dissent. At the time defendant's motion for a nonsuit was sub mitted it had been made perfectly clear by the plaintiff's own testimony that he was giving no heed to the passage of trains along the wharf or pier when the accident occurred. He was neither looking nor listening; was, in fact, taking no precaution whatever to avoid danger from that source; and was therefore guilty of contributory negligence if he knew or had reasonable grounds for apprehending injury from a passing train. But was it clearly shown by plaintiff's testimony that he had such knowledge or grounds of apprehension? I cannot say that it was. He was not on the track or pier, but was in a small sailboat on the bay, which, by the careless and unskillful management of his companion, had been drifted by the wind against the wharf, so that its bow was under, and its mast was resting against, the side of the pier, in which position it was held by the force of the wind or current so firmly that all their efforts were insufficient to disengage it. It makes no difference, it seems to me, that he entered the boat from the pier while it was in this situation. Except in so far as that and previous visits to the pier might tend to prove knowledge on his part of the manner in which the pier and track were constructed, I think that, after he was once fairly in the boat, his subsequent conduct must be viewed precisely as if he had been sailing on the bay, and by accident or unskillfulness had been carried into the position in which defendant's train found him. The question, then, is whether he knew or had reason to suppose that defendant's track had been so laid that its cars moving upon the rails would project beyond the edge of the wharf so as to come in contact with the mast of his boat. As to this he testified that he did not know that the track was so laid, and it appears to me he had no reasonable grounds to suppose so. The wharf in question extends from the shore to the ship channel, a distance of about 1,200 feet across the bay of San Diego,—a bay navigated by small sailing vessels, which are liable at any time to be drifted against the side of the pier; and certainly no one could presume that a track would be so laid upon it that cars in passing would impinge against the masts of boats lying along-side. In fact, it was shown that the cars first used on the track did not project beyond the edge of the wharf, but that wider cars were subsequently adopted, which projected 12 or 15 inches, and that the rails were never moved in so as to render the wider cars harmless. For these reasons I cannot say that the superior court erred in denying the motion for a nonsuit.

EXECUTORS—EMPLOYMENT OF COUNSEL.

Executors have no authority to litigate adverse claims of heirs, legatees, or devisees, and payments to counsel so employed will not be allowed on settlement of the executorial accounts.

For former report, see 21 Pac. Rep. 976.

John H. Dickinson, for appellants. Henry I. Kowalsky, (W. H. L. Barnes, of counsel,) for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This appeal is from an order settling the annual account of Isaac Jessup and S. O. Putnam, executors of the last will and testament of Gershom P. Jessup, deceased. The alleged error consists of the disallowance by the court of certain items of account for moneys expended by the executors in the employment of counsel to resist the claim of Richard P. Jessup to the estate, as the pretermitted heir of the deceased. As to the value of the legal services of the attorneys, no question arises. But the contention of the respondents is that the contest was between the legatees named in the will and the pretermitted heir, and that in such a contest the executors cannot represent either side. In Roach v. Coffey, 73 Cal. 281, 14 Pac. Rep. 840, the court said: "We think that it is the settled law of this state that an administrator cannot represent either side of a contest between heirs, devisees, or legatees contesting for the distribution of an estate. He cannot litigate the claims of one set against the other. His duty is to preserve the estate, and distribute it as the court shall direct." Citing Estate of Wright, 49 Cal. 550; Bates v. Ryberg, 40 Cal. 465; Estate of Marrey, 65 Cal. 287, 3 Pac. Rep. 896. It is true that in none of these cases was the question of the allowance of attorney's fees directly involved; but the right of executors or administrators to litigate adverse claims of heirs, legatees, or devisees necessarily involved the right to employ counsel for that purpose. The right to employ counsel depends upon the right to litigate. Order affirmed.

ROBINSON v. MERRILL et al. (No. 12,107.)

JUDGMENT—OPENING.

An order granting a motion to vacate a judgment for plaintiff because notice of motion to restore the cause to the calendar was not given, as required by a former order striking it off, is not an abuse of discretion, though it does not require the costs of trial paid out by plaintiff to be refunded, where no request to impose terms was made.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Santa Clara county; F. E. SPENCER Judge.

J. M. Wood, for appellant. G. B. Merrill, for respondents.

FOX, J. The transcript shows that this was an action upon a street assessment. Complaint in the usual form, and alleging ownership of the land in all of the defendants. The answer of defendant Merrill traversed all the allegations of the complaint except that of ownership of the land. Default of the defendants Low and the Hibernia Savings & Loan Society was entered. On the 22d of January, 1883, it was by the court ordered that the case be stricken from the calendar, to be restored on notice. On the 31st of January, 1887, the plaintiff dismissed the case as against defendants Moses Ellis and John Doe, (both of whom were owners in the land, according to the allegations of his complaint,) and without amending his complaint, and in the absence of defendant Merrill, who had answered, submitted his proofs, and took judgment against all the defendants except the two whom he had just dismissed. On the 4th of February the matter came on for hearing on the application of defendant Merrill to vacate and set aside said judgment, notice of which application had been duly given, under an order made by the court on the 1st of February, shortening the time for such notice. The application or motion was heard on affidavits and the records of the court; and the attention of the court being called to the fact of the order of January 22, 1883, striking the case from the calendar, to be restored on notice, and it not appearing that any notice of motion to restore the case to the calendar had ever been given, and other reasons also appearing from the affidavit of the moving party, the court made an order vacating and setting aside the judgment entered in the cause, and that the cause be restored to the calendar, to be taken up on notice to be given by plaintiff to defendants. From this order the appeal is taken. Appellant makes the point that the granting of this order was an abuse of judicial discretion, especially as he had paid out nine dollars costs of trial and entry of judgment, and that the order vacating the judgment was made without requiring the refunding of this sum. It does not appear from the record that any application was made to the court to impose terms as a condition of its order. If such application had been made, it would have been entirely in the discretion of the court to impose them or not; and from the facts appearing in this record it does not appear to us that it would have been any abuse of discretion to refuse such terms. The appeal is without merit, and the order appealed from is affirmed.

Newman v. Bank of California et al.

(No. 11,932.)

Tenants in Common—Adverse Possession.

In an action by one of several tenants in common against an adverse claimant to recover possession of the entire land, his recovery of judgment inures to the benefit of all his co-tenants; and as his possession is their possession, and relates back to the time he commenced his action, no title by adverse possession can be acquired as against them during the pendency of his action. Thornton, J., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

George A. Nourse, for appellants. Newlands & Allen, T. M. Osment, and B. B. Newman, for respondent.

Works, J. The appellants and one Chapman were the owners as tenants in common of the real estate in controversy. The respondent Quinn was in possession, claiming to be the owner of the whole of the property, and holding the same adversely. Before the statute of limitations had run, Chapman brought his action against Quinn, alleging that he, Chapman, was the owner of the undivided one-half of the property; that Quinn was in possession thereof without right, and had no right, title, or interest therein; and asking for the possession of the whole of the property. The court below found the facts as alleged in the complaint, and rendered judgment in favor of Chapman that he was the owner of the undivided half of the property, that Quinn had no right, title, or interest in any part thereof, and that Chapman recover possession of the whole of the property. Quinn appealed to this court and the judgment was affirmed. Chapman v. Quinn, 56 Cal. 266. He then appealed to the supreme court of the United States, with the same result. Quinn v. Chapman, 111 U. S. 445, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 508. Upon the final determination of the case, a writ of possession was issued upon the judgment, and Quinn was ousted, and Chapman put in possession of the land. Between the time of the bringing of Chapman's suit and his being put into actual possession under the writ the time necessary to give Quinn title by adverse possession, if undisturbed, as against the appellants, had fully run. The sole question presented here is whether the bringing of the action by Chapman, one of the tenants in common, in the manner above stated, and his recovery of the possession, had the effect to prevent the possession of Quinn ripening into a title to the property as against the appellants, the other tenants in common. Counsel for respondents contend that there is no privity between tenants in common, and that the commencement of an action by one cannot inure to the benefit of another, as against the statute of limitations, and that a judgment recovered by him affects his interest in the property alone. In support of these propositions they cite: Chipman v. Hastings, opinion of this court, December 8, 1873, (unreported;) Read v. Allen, 56 Tex. 176; Read v. Allen, Id. 182; Stovall v. Carmichael, 52 Tex. 383; Burleson v. Burleson, 28 Tex. 385, 417; Pendergrast v. Gullatt, 10 Ga. 224; McFarland v. Stone, 17 Vt. 175; Wade v. Johnson, 5 Humph. 118; Bronson v. Adams, 10 Ohio, 135; Gray v. Givens, 26 Mo. 303; Doolittle v. Blakesley, 4 Day 273; Hammett v. Blount, 1 Swan, 385; Walker v. Perryman, 23 Ga. 309, 315; Mobley v. Bruner, 59 Pa. St. 481; Bennett v. Hethington, 16 Serg. & R. 196; Roe v. Rowlston, 2 Taunt. 446. It is contended that the unreported case of Chipman v. Hastings is conclusive of the question in favor of the respondents; and so it would be, but for the fact that a rehearing was granted in the case, and upon a second hearing the question was not decided, or in effect decided the other way. 50 Cal. 310. Counsel for appellants concedes that the judgment recovered by Chapman did not inure to the benefit of his clients, but contends that, as he finally recovered possession, such possession related back to the time of bringing his action, and under the well established rule that the possession of one tenant in common is the possession of all, the appellants must be regarded as having been in possession, and the respondent Quinn to have been ousted, at the time such action was commenced.

We think the learned counsel for appellants has conceded too much. If the judgment of Chapman did not inure to the benefit of the appellants, their title is undoubtedly lost by adverse possession. It is only by the aid of such judgment that his position that Quinn was, in contemplation of law, out of possession from the time the action was commenced, can be maintained. The complaint of Chapman against Quinn presented two questions for litigation, viz., the title to the undivided half of the property, and the right to the possession of the whole thereof. Quinn might have defeated the action entirely by proving that Chapman had no title to the property. He might have defeated a recovery of the undivided half of the land not claimed by Chapman, by showing that he, Quinn, was the owner, or entitled to the possession of the same. He did neither. Therefore the judgment in that case is, as between him and Chapman, conclusive against him that he was a mere trespasser upon the land at the time the action was commenced, and that Chapman, as one of the tenants in common of the property, was then entitled, as against him, to the possession of the whole thereof. If Chapman had, as such tenant in common, gone into the actual possession at that time, his possession would have been that of all of the owners, and they would, in contemplation of law, have been in possession. Did his recovery of possession, under the circumstances, have the same effect? One tenant in common may maintain a separate action to recover possession of his interest in the property. In such case his title and right to possession alone is involved, and the judgment cannot operate for or against the other owners. Williams v. Sutton, 43 Cal. 71; Walker v. Perryman, 23 Ga. 309. But such tenant may maintain an action against a mere trespasser for the possession of the whole of the property. Williams v. Sutton, supra; Chipman v. Hastings, 50 Cal. 310.

The right to recover the whole might have been defeated by a showing that at the time the suit was brought the defendant had acquired the title of the other owners by deed, estoppel, the statute of limitations, or otherwise, as one tenant in common may be barred of his rights, and another not. McFarland v. Stone, 17 Vt. 173; Bronson v. Adams, 10 Ohio, 136. It may be conceded, also, though we do not decide it, that, as to any claim of title existing at the time the suit was commenced against those defendants not suing, the defendant in that action was not concluded as between him and the tenants not suing. But the question here is quite a different one. Can he obtain title by possession subsequent to the bringing of the action, when the right to such possession, not only as to a part, but as to the whole, of the land, is put in issue in the case, and finally determined against him? We are quite clear that he cannot. As between him and Chapman, the judgment determines that he was, from the time the action was commenced, in the wrongful possession of the property, and, as between them, this question of the right to such possession relates to the time the suit was brought, and from that time, as between them, his possession conferred no title. The effect of the judgment, and the enforcement thereof by the writ of possession, was to make Quinn's possession of the whole tract the possession of Chapman from the time the action was commenced. If not, Quinn could have resisted the enforcement of the writ by saying, "I had no title to the undivided half of the property not claimed by you when you recovered your judgment, but I have since obtained it by remaining in possession. Therefore, you are not now entitled to the possession of that half, but only to the possession jointly with me as your tenant in common." This he certainly could not do as against Chapman. Now, if, in contemplation of law, Chapman was in possession from the time he commenced his action, for the same reason Quinn must be regarded as out of possession. Chapman's possession was the possession of the appellants. Unger v. Mooney, 63 Cal. 586; Olney v. Sawyer, 54 Cal. 380. Therefore they were in possession, and the statute of limitations could not run against them. So far, the judgment of Chapman, and subsequent proceedings under it, inured to the benefit of the appellants and preserved their title.

While the cases cited by the respondent support the general doctrine that a judgment for or against one tenant in common does not affect the rights of his co-tenants, they do not reach the question presented here. Some of the language used may be so construed as, in general terms, to cover the question under consideration, but they do not determine it. In some of the cases the doctrine that a judgment recovered by one tenant in common does not inure to the benefit of another is placed upon the express ground that he cannot recover the possession of the whole property, but only his own undivided share. Mobley v. Bruner, 59 Pa. St. 483; Bennett v. Hethington, 16 Serg. & R. 196; Gray v. Givens, 26 Mo. 291, 302. The conclusion reached must necessarily follow from such a rule, as the right of possession, as to the interest of other owners, is not involved or determined. But, as we have seen, the rule is the other way in this state. In some of the cases cited the right of one tenant in common to recover the whole of the land from a mere trespasser is recognized; and those cases tend to confirm the conclusion we have reached, but are not decisive of the question. Read v. Allen, 56 Tex. 176, 182; Read v. Allen, Id. 182, 190; Stovall v. Carmichael, 52 Tex. 388; Pendergrast v. Gullatt, 10 Ga. 218, 224; McFarland v. Stone, 17 Vt. 165, 175.

For the reasons stated we think the court below erred in holding the respondent Quinn to be the owner of the undivided half of the land. Judgment reversed, with instructions to the court below to modify its conclusions of law in accordance with this opinion, and to render judgment on the findings in favor of the appellants.

Reynolds v. Willard. (No. 12,977.)

Adverse Possession—Payment of Taxes.

1. Where defendant in ejectment claims by adverse possession, he is bound to prove either that taxes were assessed on the land, and were paid by him, or that none were assessed, and, in the absence of any such evidence on his part, it will be presumed that taxes have been assessed, and that he has not paid them.

2. Where his adverse possession began, but did not have the required duration, before the statute requiring the payment of taxes on land so claimed took effect, and where the verdict must have been against him, as it was not shown that he had paid the taxes, or that none had been assessed, after the statute took effect, an instruction that defendant, to establish his adverse possession, must prove his payment of all taxes assessed on the land, is a harmless error.

3. Under such statute it is not sufficient that defendant should prove his payment of taxes on certain lands, supposing the land claimed by adverse possession to be included therein, but he must prove that he actually paid taxes on the land in dispute.

THORNTON and MCFARLAND, JJ., dissenting.

W. L. Dudley, for appellant. J. C. Campbell, for respondent.

WORKS, J. Action of ejectment. Defense, adverse possession. Trial by jury, and verdict for plaintiff. Judgment accordingly. Motion for new trial denied. Defendant appeals. There was evidence tending to show that the land in controversy was held adversely by the defendant from August, 1882, until the commencement of this action, September 22, 1887, but there is other evidence tending to show that this possession was not continuous, but was interrupted by a third party taking and holding possession for a part of one year, and cultivating and growing a crop on the land. There was also some evidence slightly tending to show that the defendant's adverse possession commenced as early as 1874. The court instructed the jury that, in order to make out his defense of adverse possession, the defendant must have proved the payment by him of all taxes levied and assessed against the land.

The appellant contends that this instruction was erroneous for two reasons: (1) Because there was no evidence that any taxes had been levied or assessed against the land. (2) As the evidence tended to show that the land was held adversely, prior to the enactment of the statute requiring payment of taxes, it was error to instruct that all taxes must have been paid by the defendant, including the time prior to the enactment of the statute.

As to the first of these, counsel claim, on the authority of Ross v. Evans, 65 Cal. 439, 4 Pac. Rep. 443, and McNoble v. Justiniano, 70 Cal. 396, 11 Pac. Rep. 742, that the burden was upon the plaintiff to show that taxes had been levied and assessed against the property, and that, in the absence of such proof, the defendant was not called upon for any evidence on the subject. The cases cited do not support this contention, nor do we believe it to be the correct rule. The plaintiff made out his case by showing a paper title to the property. The defendant, in support of his claim of title by adverse possession, was bound to prove every fact necessary to show such possession, for the requisite time, including the payment of taxes, if any had been levied and assessed. If taxes had been levied and assessed, he should have proved the fact, and also that he had paid the same. If none had been levied and assessed, he should have proved that fact as a reason for not making payment. Having failed to make such proof, it cannot be presumed in aid of his possession that no taxes had been levied and assessed. Neither of the cases relied upon by the appellant are in conflict with this view of the law. McNoble v. Justiniano has no bearing on the question. Ross v. Evans related to the findings of the court and not to the evidence. In that case the court below found that the taxes had not been paid, but failed to find that any had been levied and assessed, and this court held, very properly, that the findings were defective in this respect. But while we adhere to the case referred to, we are clearly of the opinion that, in the absence of any evidence on the point, the court below should find that taxes had been levied and assessed, and that the defendant had not paid the same. The presumption that the assessor had done his duty should be regarded as prima facie evidence that such property had been assessed. In the absence of any evidence from the defendant, the fact should be found against him. This must be the result of the well-established rule that a party who relies upon adverse possession must prove every fact necessary to establish such possession for the requisite length of time. Garwood v. Hastings, 38 Cal. 223; Figg v. Mayo, 39 Cal. 267.

Conceding that the evidence tended to show that the adverse possession commenced in the year 1874, the other objection to the instruction is well taken. The statute requiring the payment of taxes took effect in 1878. From the time the defendant took possession until the statute took effect the payment of taxes was not necessary, and to instruct the jury that all taxes must have been paid to entitle the defendant to recover was error. But, as it is conceded that there was no evidence showing either that the defendant had paid the taxes levied and assessed subsequent to the enactment of the statute, or that none had been levied or assessed, and as the full term of five years could not have run before the statute took effect, the verdict of the jury must necessarily have been against him on that ground, and the giving of the instruction was a harmless error. Besides, the evidence tending to show possession on the part of the defendant prior to the year 1882 was so meager as to be unworthy of notice. It is perfectly evident that the only possession relied upon by the defendant at the trial was that commencing with the year 1882, and as to that the instruction was correct.

It was admitted at the trial that the defendant had paid all taxes levied and assessed against certain lands covered by a patent to him, and the evidence tended to show that he supposed the land in controversy to have been a part of such lands, but that in fact it was not, but was part of a tract patented to the plaintiff's grantor, and by him conveyed to the plaintiff. The defendant asked the court to instruct the jury that if the defendant held the land, believing it to have been within his patent, and paid the taxes on the land patented to him, supposing that he was paying on the land in dispute, such payment was a sufficient compliance with the statute. The instruction was correctly refused. The defendant was bound to prove, under the statute, that he actually paid the taxes on the land in controversy. It was not sufficient for him to show that he paid on other lands, supposing it to include the lands in dispute. Judgment and order affirmed.

NONSUIT—GROUNDS OF MOTION—FINDINGS.

1. In an action to enjoin defendant from destroying a levee alleged to have been built by plaintiff on land belonging to her to protect another tract of her land from overflow, where there is no evidence that plaintiff owned the land on which said levee was built, or any other land as alleged, a motion for a nonsuit on the ground of plaintiff's failure to prove any of her material allegations, is too general to raise any question as to the want of such evidence.

2. In such action a finding that "said levee is upon the line dividing the lands of plaintiff and defendant, and is built partly upon the lands of each," is a sufficient finding that said levee was built upon land owned by plaintiff, to sustain a judgment for her.

WORKS, J. This is a proceeding by the respondent to enjoin the appellant from destroying a levee alleged to have been constructed by the respondent on a certain tract of land owned by her to protect a certain other tract of her land from overflow. There was a trial by the court, findings for plaintiff, and judgment accordingly. The appellant moved the court below for a nonsuit, which was denied. He also moved for a new trial, which was also denied, and he appeals. The motion for a nonsuit was "on the grounds of plaintiff's failure to prove any of the material allegations of the complaint, and a failure to prove any damage done to the levee, or any notice to the defendant of the claim of the plaintiff to the levee prior to his purchase." The evidence tended to show that one Taylor was the owner of property, which he sold to the appellant, and that at the time of such sale he called to the attention of the appellant the fact that the respondent had with his (Taylor's) consent constructed the leveo in question on the line of, and partly upon, the lands then owned by Taylor, and that the appellant purchased his lands with full knowledge of the fact that such levee was constructed by the respondent, and owned by her. There is an entire absence of any evidence in the record that the respondent was the owner of the lands upon which the levee was constructed, or of any other lands, as alleged in her complaint, and if the record contains all the evidence, and the motion for a nonsuit had pointed out this want of evidence as a ground for the motion, it should have been sustained. But the motion was entirely too general to raise any such question. It was not sufficient to move on the ground that the plaintiff had failed to prove any of the material allegations of the complant. The particulars in which it was claimed the evidence was insufficient should have been specifically pointed out. Poehlmann v. Kennedy, 48 Cal. 201; Coffey v. Greenfield, 62 Cal. 602. As to the specific objections pointed out in the motion, there was sufficient evidence on the part of the plaintiff, and the nonsuit was for that reason properly denied.

It is also contended by the appellant that the evidence does not show that the plaintiff was the owner of the lands described in her complaint. It is not clear whether it is intended to claim that the findings are not sustained by the evidence in this respect or not, but, if so, there is no specification in the transcript which raises any such question.

It is further contended that the findings of the court are insufficient to sustain the judgment for the reason that there is no finding that the respondent was the owner of the real estate. But the court does find that "said levee is upon the line dividing the lands of plaintiff and defendant, and is built partly upon the lands of each." This, we think, is a sufficient finding that the levee was constructed upon land owned by the respondent, and is sufficient in that respect to uphold the judgment.

As to the point made that the evidence is not sufficient to show that the appellant in any way injured the levee, we think there was evidence to sustain the finding of the court, and the same may be said with reference to the other objections made to the findings. We find no available error in the record. Judgment and order affirmed.

QUINN v. QUINN et al. (No. 12,961.)

PARTNERSHIP — WHAT CONSTITUTES — AUTHORITY OF PARTNER.

1. An agreement between two persons, providing that they shall together work a quarry and share equally in the profits, and that the manager thereof shall pay the expenses out of the proceeds of the same, constitutes a partnership between such persons, as defined by Civil Code Cal. § 2395, being "an association of two or more persons for the purpose of carrying on business together, and dividing its profits between them."

2. Where, in consideration of such an agreement, a lease of the quarry, personal property used in working it, and stone already quarried, are transferred from one party to the other for the purpose of carrying on the business, all such property becomes partnership property.

3. Where one partner promises to devote his time, labor, and skill to working said quarry, but does little work in the three months succeeding the formation of the partnership, and then leaves the quarry and is absent for six months seeking work elsewhere, and declares to several persons that he has no interest in the quarry, such conduct is an abandonment of the business such as to give his partner the right to dispose of all the partnership property without his assent or knowledge, under Civil Code, § 2430, declaring that one partner has no right to make such disposal unless his copartners have wholly abandoned the business to him.

4. Where a judgment is right upon the facts found, the appellate court will not reverse it for an erroneous statement of the principles of law involved.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Placer county; B. F. MYERS, Judge.

F. P. Tuttle and Charles F. Hanlon, for appellant. John M. Fulweiler, for respondents.

HAYNE, C. Suit for an accounting. The general facts are as follows: On March 3, 1885, the plaintiff, Thomas Quinn, who was then the owner of the lease of a certain quarry, and the owner of certain personal property used in connection therewith, and of some stone which had been quarried and was on the ground, assigned the lease to his brother, Patrick Quinn. On the same day, and as part of the same transaction, the two brothers signed an agreement, which referred to the assignment of the lease, and recited that "the true consideration of said assignment are the terms, covenants, and agreements herein contained, and the due fulfillment of the same," and provided for the working of the quarry. The material provisions of this agreement were as follows: The expenses of working the quarry, including those previously incurred by Thomas, were to be paid by Patrick "out of the proceeds of the business," and the net profits were to be equally divided between them. The business was to be conducted in the name of Patrick, and he was to have "complete management and control" thereof. But Thomas was to "devote his time, labor, and skill" thereto, and was to incur a penalty of $3.50 for every day that he failed to do so. The business was carried on up to December 12, 1885, when work on the quarry was stopped. On February 3, 1886, Patrick, without the knowledge or consent of Thomas, transferred the lease and all the personal property to one Healy, who thereupon took possession, and soon afterwards ordered Thomas off the premises. The main question is as to the validity of this transfer. The court below gave judgment for the defendant Healy, and the plaintiff appeals.

We think that a partnership existed between Thomas and Patrick. The written agreement provided for the working of the quarry together, and that each was to share equally in the profits of the business. There was, therefore, "an association of two or more persons, for the purpose of carrying on business together, and dividing its profits between them." And this, in general, constitutes a partnership. Civil Code, § 2395. There was not only a community in the right to profits, but also a community in the liability for losses. The agreement provided that the expenses should be paid by the manager "out of the proceeds of the business," but there was no express provision as to liability in case of loss. The contract was silent on that point. Hence an equal liability for losses was implied. Civil Code, § 2404. And the profits were to be divided as profits, and not as rent or compensation for services, such as is allowed by a certain class of cases. There was, therefore, a partnership. Moreover, this is alleged by the plaintiff in his complaint, and his counsel insists upon it in his brief. Such partnership was a strict, and not a mere mining, partnership; for, even if it be assumed that there could be a mining partnership in such a thing as a quarry, (compare Civil Code, § 2511,) the partnership was created by the express agreement of the parties. Decker v. Howell, 42 Cal. 636. All of the property was partnership property. The lease appears from the partnership agreement to have been transferred solely in consideration of the covenants of said agreement, and is alleged in the complaint to have been transferred "for the purpose of forming said partnership." And the personal property used in connection with the quarry, and the quarried stone which then existed, is in the same category. For the complaint alleges that "it was agreed between him and said Patrick that said personal property should be used by the partnership in their said business, and that the value of said personal property was an advance made by him to the partnership, for which the partnership became indebted to him." It does not appear what became of the stone which had been quarried at the time of the partnership agreement. Probably it was disposed of during the operation of the business. The quarried stone which was in existence at the time of the transfer to Healy is found to have been quarried "at the expense and by the labor of said Patrick and Thomas," and this finding is not attacked by the specifications. The other personal property is found to have been transferred to Patrick with the lease, and this finding is not attacked by the specifications. But, even if the evidence could be examined with reference to the matter, we think that, although it perhaps would not show that the transfer of the personal property was by the written agreement, yet that the circumstances show that it was the intention that all the personal property should go into the concern. At any rate, the plaintiff, who has expressly alleged the fact in his complaint, is not in a position to have the findings and judgment against him set aside on the ground that the fact is not as he alleged it. Then, had one of the partners the right to transfer said property to a third person without the assent or knowledge of the other? Section 2430 of the Civil Code provides that "a partner, as such, has not authority to do any of the following acts, unless his copartners have wholly abandoned the business to him, or are incapable of acting. * * * (3) To dispose of the whole of the partnership property at once, unless it consists entirely of merchandise." This prohibition, as will readily be seen, does not apply if the non-consenting partner has wholly abandoned the business. The distinct implication is that if he has wholly abandoned the business the other partner has authority to make the transfer. Now, the court found, in substance, that before the transfer to Healy the plaintiff had abandoned the business. The precise language of the finding is as follows: "The plaintiff abandoned his right and privilege under his agreement with Patrick before the assignment to Healy, but did not repudiate any obligations." This, we think, must be construed as a finding that the plaintiff abandoned the business; for, while he might have abandoned the business without abandoning his right therein, we cannot see how he could have "abandoned" his right to the business without abandoning the business, within the meaning of the provision. If this finding is to stand, we think that the judgment will have to be affirmed. The plaintiff attacks it as unsupported by the evidence, but we think that there is sufficient evidence to support it.

It appears that plaintiff did very little work after his agreement of March 3, 1885. He did not work at all in that month. He worked only about 14 days in April and 17 days in May, and not at all thereafter. He left the place in June, and did not return until December, which was after work on the quarry had stopped. His own account of his wanderings is as follows: "I went to British Columbia, and remained there about six weeks, after leaving the quarries. Not being able to get work in British Columbia, I returned to San Francisco, and tried for some time to get work there. About the forepart of September, 1885, I went to Mare island, and worked there for about two months or more. I then returned to San Francisco, and remained there awhile, and some time in the month of December came back to the quarry. From the time I left the quarry in June, 1885, up to December, 1885, I did not do any work at the quarry." After work on the quarry was stopped in December, it appears that it laid idle for a while. In this regard the defendant Healy testified as follows: "At the time I took possession, in February, 1886, the quarry had not been worked for nearly two months. It was all filled up with water, and I got horses and had it pumped out. Tom was there, with other idle men, and I let him go to work with them." Not long afterwards plaintiff was ordered away, according to Healy, on account of drunkenness and idleness. While plaintiff was away, between June and December, as above stated, he seems to have declared to several persons that he had no interest in the quarry. There is evidence tending to show that he so declared to R. J. Harrington, in Vallejo; to J. P. M. Phillips, at Mare island; and to C. C. Wolfcott, at the same place. These declarations do not operate in any way as an estoppel. But they are evidence, in connection with his absence from the quarry, of an abandonment of the business; and, taking the whole evidence together, we think that it was sufficient to support the finding in question. And if the court was justified in finding an abandonment of the business, its judgment was right, and not, as stated by the learned counsel for the appellant, "sans reason, sans authority, sans excuse." If it be objected that the conduct of the parties showed a dissolution of the partnership, which was at will, then either partner was authorized to act in liquidation, (Civil Code, § 2459,) and had authority to dispose of the partnership property, (Id. § 2461.) Nor is it any objection to the view we have taken that the trial court stated as its conclusion of law that "there was no partnership between Thomas and Patrick Quinn, and that the defendant Healy is entitled to judgment for his costs." If the judgment is right upon the facts found, the appellate court will not reverse for an erroneous statement of the principles of law involved, in view of which the only conclusion of law which is necessary is that one side is entitled to judgment, etc. See cases collected in Hayne, New Trials & App. § 243. The complaint alleges fraud, and want of consideration for the transfer to Healy. But the findings negative both of these charges, and the plaintiff does not attack them by his specifications of the insufficiency of the evidence. We therefore advise that the judgment and order denying new trial be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C. C.; VANCLIEF, C.

TREADWELL v. WHITTIER et al. (No. 11,656.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 24, 1889.)

NEGLIGENCE—DANGEROUS MACHINERY—DAMAGES—EVIDENCE.

1. In a suit for damages for personal injuries, where the complaint alleges the nature of the injuries received and their permanent character, evidence of damages through inability to attend to business, necessarily resulting from such injuries, can be introduced without such damages being specially pleaded.

2. An instruction that plaintiff must prove his case to the satisfaction of the jury by a preponderance of testimony complies with Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1826, providing that such degree of proof is not required as produces absolute certainty, but only moral certainty.

3. Where defendants use an elevator for the purpose of lifting persons 40 feet vertically, they are carriers of passengers, and are liable for any defect or flaw in the machinery which is discoverable on a reasonable and careful examination according to the best known tests reasonably practicable.[1]

4. Persons furnishing elevators must use, as to customers or others using their elevators by request, all reasonable efforts to furnish good machinery, of good material, and of the kind found safest for the purpose, and must adopt such new inventions as combine the greater safety with practical use.

5. Evidence of advice given by a skilled mechanic to one of the defendants as to their careless manner of running the elevator, and by him communicated to all other persons in the store, is admissible.

McAllister & Bergin, D. M. Delmas, and J. C. Denson, for appellants. Lloyd & Wood and Garber & Bishop, for appellee.

[1] The rule as to the degree of care required, and as to the onus of proof, in case of injury from defective machinery, applicable between a common carrier of passengers and his passengers, is applicable as between the owner and manager of a passenger elevator and the passengers in it. Goodsell v. Taylor, (Minn.) 42 N. W. Rep. 873.

THORNTON, J. The plaintiff brought this action to recover damages for injuries to his person, caused by the falling of an hydraulic elevator operated by defendants in their store, on which he (plaintiff) was riding at the time. The cause was tried before a jury. Verdict and judgment passed for plaintiff, and the defendants prosecute this appeal from the judgment and from an order denying their motion for a new trial. The action is based on the negligence of the defendants in using the elevator with broken, insecure, and insufficient machinery, in not taking proper care of such machinery, and in the running and operating of the elevator, in consequence of which the plaintiff, without any fault or negligence on his part, received the injuries of which he complains. We insert here the averments of the complaint specifically setting forth the cause of action: "That defendants are, and at all times hereinafter mentioned were, copartners in business, engaged in trade and commerce at the city and county of San Francisco under the firm name and style of Whittier, Fuller & Co.; that the said defendants, as copartners, did, at the times hereinafter mentioned, conduct and carry on business in a building at the south-west corner of Pine and Front streets, in said city and county, comprising three stories or floors and a basement, and the defendants at said times had owned and maintained an elevator or hoist, operated by machinery, situated in the basement of said building, and wholly under the control and management of the said defendants, and in their exclusive use, which said hoist or elevator was used, and intended to be used, by defendants for the purpose of transporting and carrying their customers and those in said building for the purpose of trading with them, or such persons as they might request to be so transported, and their merchandise, to and from the different floors or stories of said building; that heretofore, to-wit, on the 23d day of December, 1878, this plaintiff, being lawfully in the said store or building of the defendants as a customer, and for the purpose of trading with defendants, was requested by the said defendants to get upon the said hoist or elevator for the purpose of being carried from the upper or third floor of said building to the lower or street floor thereof; and then and there the said plaintiff, in pursuance of such request, got into the said elevator or hoist for the purpose aforesaid, and immediately thereupon, when the said defendants undertook to transport or lower the said plaintiff from the said upper or third floor to the lower or street floor of their said store, the said hoist or elevator, by reason of the broken, insecure, and insufficient machinery by which the same was run, and by reason of the negligent and careless conduct of the defendants in the care of the said machinery, and in the running and operating of the same, and in the running and operating of the said hoist or elevator, without any fault or negligence on plaintiff's part whatsoever, was precipitated from said upper or third floor into the basement of said building with great and excessive rapidity and violence, and the plaintiff was thereby greatly bruised, broken, damaged, and injured in his body and limbs, and became and was thereby made sick, sore, lame, and disordered, and so remained for a long space of time, to-wit, from thence hitherto, and said plaintiff sustained a fracture of his left leg in the ankle joint, and was otherwise seriously injured, so that he was confined to his bed for a long period of time, to-wit, three months, and was thereafter, for a period of four months, unable to walk save with crutches, and his said left leg, by reason of said fracture, is, and always will be, shorter than his other or right leg, and the plaintiff has sustained other and internal injuries from which he can never recover, and the same will and do permanently affect and impair the health, strength, and activity of plaintiff, and said plaintiff for a long period of time, to-wit, ever since said accident, has suffered great pain of body and anguish of mind; that plaintiff at the time aforesaid had no notice or knowledge that the machinery whereby the said elevator or hoist was run or operated was out of order, or broken, or insecure, and defendants had full notice and knowledge thereof." On the argument, and in the briefs, several points were and are elaborately discussed and presented for consideration and determination. To the consideration of these points we proceed, in the order in which they were presented by counsel for defendants (appellants here) on the oral argument.

1. It is argued that the court erred in giving the tenth instruction requested by the plaintiff. That instruction was given in these words: "If, under the evidence and instructions of the court, the jury find for plaintiff, then, in assessing the plaintiff's damages, the jury may take into consideration not only the loss and immediate damage arising from the injuries received at the time of the accident, but also the permanent loss and damage, if any is proved, arising from any disability resulting to the plaintiff from the injury in question, which renders him less capable of attending to his business than he would have been if the injury had not been received." It is said by counsel for defendants that the loss or impairment of the capacity to attend to business is in the nature of special damages, and must, as such, be specially pleaded; that, if not specially pleaded, no evidence can be introduced to show diminished capacity for business, nor any inquiry legitimately made in respect to it. The allegation of damage in the complaint has been quoted above at large. It is averred and set forth by plaintiff that by reason of his fall he was greatly bruised, broken, damaged, and injured in his body and limbs, and became and was thereby made sick, sore, lame, and disordered, and so remained up to the time of action brought; that he sustained a fracture of his left leg in the ankle joint, and was otherwise seriously injured, so that he was confined to his bed for three months, and for a period of four months thereafter was unable to walk except with crutches; that his left leg, by reason of the fracture, is, and always will be, shorter than his right leg; that he sustained other and internal injuries, from which he will never recover, and the same will and do permanently affect and impair his health, strength, and activity; and that ever since the fall he has suffered great pain of body and anguish of mind. Damages which necessarily result from the act complained of are denominated "general damages," and may be proved under the ad damnum clause, or general allegation of damage, while those which are the natural consequences of the act complained of, and not the necessary result of it, are termed "special damages." The defendant must be presumed to be aware of the damages which necessarily result from the act done, and therefore he cannot be held to be taken by surprise when proof is offered of such necessarily resulting damage. But as to the damage naturally, though not necessarily, resulting from the act done, the defendant cannot be presumed to be aware of them, and therefore, in order to prevent a surprise on defendant, it must be specially set forth in the complaint, or the plaintiff will not be permitted to give evidence of it at the trial. On this subject, see Chit. Pl. (16th Amer. Ed.) 348; 2 Greenl. Ev. § 254; Stevenson v. Smith, 28 Cal. 103; Potter v. Froment, 47 Cal. 165; Hunter v. Stewart, 47 Me. 419. Now, considering the physical injuries complained of, and set forth in the complaint, by plaintiff, viz., the fracture of his right leg, by reason of which it will always be shorter than his other leg, and that he has sustained other and internal injuries from which he can never recover, and which will permanently impair his health, strength, and activity, the court will not be straying from the rule above stated, if it directs the jury, in assessing the amount of damages sustained by plaintiff, to take into consideration the permanent loss and damage, if any is proved, arising from any disability resulting to the plaintiff from the injury complained of, which renders him less capable of attending to his business than he would have been if the injury had not been received. The court, in this instruction, only directed the jury to take into consideration in assessing the damages such as necessarily resulted from the injuries set forth in the complaint, if such injuries were proved by the evidence. That the injuries set forth will necessarily render a person less capable of attending to his business is clearly apparent, and no argument is needed to make it clear. The conclusion here reached is sustained by the rulings in the following cases: Morris v. Railroad Co., 45 Iowa, 30; Conner v. Construction Co., 29 Fed. Rep. 631; Wade v. Leroy, 20 How. 44; Nebraska v. Campbell, 2 Black, 592; Elkhart v. Ritter, 66 Ind. 140; Indianapolis v. Gaston, 58 Ind. 224; Potter v. Railroad Co., 28 Law T. (N. S.) 735; McKeever v. Railroad Co., 59 Cal. 294; Bradbury v. Benton, 69 Me. 199; Railroad Co. v. Wightman, 29 Grat. 431, 440, 441; Tyson v. Booth, 100 Mass. 266; Roberts v. Graham, 6 Wall. 578; Ward v. Smith, 11 Price, 19. We refer particularly to the case of Wade v. Leroy, above cited. In that case the court said: "The evidence conduced to prove that the plaintiff was seriously injured." Subsequently, in the opinion, these observations were made: "That before that time he had been concerned in conducting a business that required a degree of mental and bodily vigor, and that his time was of some pecuniary value; or that he had suffered a loss of some profit; and that, after some detention in New York, he had returned to his house in an infirm condition,—so infirm that his medical attendant and adviser deemed him incapable of pursuing any ordinary business or occupation, and had advised him to abstain from personal exertion. This evidence would certainly assist a jury to determine that the plaintiff had sustained an injury of no slight character,—an injury to his person, and which was followed by expense, suffering, and loss of time, which had for him a pecuniary value. These were the direct and necessary consequences of the injury, and sustained strictly and almost exclusively as an effect from it." In Bradbury v. Benton, above cited, the action was for a personal injury, and no special damages were alleged. The point was as to the recovery of prospective damages. As to this, the court, per LIBBEY, J., said: "In legal contemplation, all damages which will be sustained as the effect of the injury are sustained immediately. The future effect of the injuries is not special damages, which must be alleged, but general damages, which necessarily flow from the injuries received. Hunter v. Stewart, 47 Me. 419. The declaration specifically describes the injuries received. It is sufficient to authorize a recovery of all damages which had been or would be sustained by the plaintiff as the natural and ordinary effect of the injuries." We will remark here that in our judgment the words "his business," used in the instruction, referred to any business which plaintiff might undertake to carry out, and that there is no difference in meaning between the words "his business" and "his ordinary business." Plaintiff was entitled to the instruction as given, and the court committed no error in giving it.

2. The defendants requested the court to give the following instruction: "Plaintiff, in order to recover in this action, must prove to your satisfaction that defendants have been guilty of some fault or negligence, and must also prove what that fault or negligence was, and this plaintiff must do by a preponderance of evidence and to a moral certainty." This instruction was refused by the court as asked, and to this refusal defendants excepted. The court struck out the words at the end of the request, "and to a moral certainty," and gave it as thus modified. To this defendants also excepted. It is argued by defendants that they were entitled to have the instruction given as asked by reason of the provisions of section 1826 of the Code of Civil Procedure. That section is as follows: "The law does not require demonstration; that is, such a degree of proof as, excluding possibility of error, produces absolute certainty, because such proof is rarely possible. Moral certainty only is required, or that degree of proof which produces conviction in an unprejudiced mind." We are inclined to the opinion that giving the instruction as asked would have been error, and that the giving it as modified was also error. The law does not put on the plaintiff the burden of proving, not only fault or negligence on the part of the defendants, but also "what that fault or negligence was." The law requires proof that plaintiff has sustained an injury by the breaking of the machinery by which he is carried or transported, and that such machinery was under the control and management of the defendant. When plaintiff has made such proof he has made out a case which entitles him, if not rebutted or disproved, to recover of defendant. The plaintiff, by such proof, has made a case showing negligence on the part of defendant. The burden is then thrown on defendant to show that he was not guilty of negligence for which he could be charged. This he can do by going into proof of the manner in which the hurt occurred, and showing that it was caused by an inevitable casualty, for which the law imposed on him no responsibility, or by establishing any fact which relieved him of responsibility. Take, for instance, the case of a passenger alleged to be injured by the negligence of a carrier in so carelessly driving a coach, on which plaintiff was a passenger, that it was overturned, and plaintiff was injured. The plaintiff only is called on to prove the overturning of the coach, and that he was hurt by it. This overturning the defendant is called on to show was not caused by his negligence at all. This he may show by direct proof that he was not negligent at all, or that the overturn occurred from some latent defect in the machinery, which broke and caused the overturn. The particular fault or negligence may come out on the evidence in the cause, but plaintiff is not required to prove what caused the overturn. The above is virtually established to be law by two cases decided by this court. Reference is here made to Boyce v. Stage Co., 25 Cal. 468, and Lawrence v. Green, 70 Cal. 420, 11 Pac. Rep. 750. In this case the plaintiff was only called on to show that he was hurt by the breaking of the machinery of the elevator, by which he was injured. When this is done he has made out a case, on which, there being no other evidence introduced, he has a right to recover. The plaintiff is not called on to make any more particular proof. Doubtless there are exceptions to this rule, but this case is not one. For the above reasons we are inclined to think that the instruction asked and refused, and the instruction as given, were erroneous. But, conceding that the views above stated are not tenable, we are still of opinion that the court below, by its ruling, committed no error of which defendants can complain. The defendants urge that they are entitled to the instruction that their fault or negligence should have been proved "to a moral certainty," under the provisions of section 1826 of the Code of Civil Procedure. That section is fully quoted above. By this section that degree of proof is required to establish a matter in dispute which produces conviction in an unprejudiced mind. When the evidence is such as to produce conviction of the truth of a fact in an unprejudiced mind, such a fact is said to be established to a moral certainty. Such evidence is deemed to be satisfactory, and will justify a verdict. It is so declared in the Code of Civil Procedure by section 1835. When a matter is proved to the satisfaction of a jury, by a preponderance of evidence, then it can be affirmed that they are convinced of its truth, and, being thus convinced of its truth, they can base a verdict on it. Code Civil Proc. § 2061, subd. 5, and section 1835, supra. It follows from the foregoing that when the jury were told that the plaintiff, in order to recover in this action, must prove to their satisfaction that the defendants had been guilty of what was stated in the instruction complained of, by a preponderance of evidence, they were, in effect, told that they must be convinced from the evidence to a moral certainty that defendants were so guilty, or the plaintiff was not entitled to recover. They could not be satisfied that the plaintiff had made such proof without being convinced of its truth to a moral certainty. The instruction, as given, was the equivalent of the requirements of section 1826 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and hence there was no error in the rulings of the court in regard to the request refused or the instruction given. If there was any error committed by the court, it was in giving an instruction too favorable to defendants, of which they cannot be heard to complain.

3. Defendants contend that the court erred in modifying the instruction numbered 9, requested by them. The instruction as asked by defendants was as follows: "If the accident in question was caused by a defect or flaw in one of the piston-rods of the elevator apparatus, which defect or flaw was not discoverable on an ordinary, reasonable, and careful examination, then your verdict should be for the defendants." The court modified the instruction so as to read as follows: "If the accident in question was caused by a defect or flaw in one of the piston-rods of the elevator apparatus, which defect or flaw was not discoverable on a reasonable and careful examination, according to the best-known tests reasonably practicable, then your verdict should be for the defendants." It is said by defendants that it was error for the court to insert the words, "according to the best-known tests reasonably practicable." The defendants used their elevator in lifting persons vertically to the height of 40 feet. That they were carriers of passengers, and should be treated as such, we have no doubt. The same responsibilities as to care and diligence rested on them as on the carriers of passengers by stage-coach or railway. In Fairchild v. Stage Co., 13 Cal. 599, which was an action by a passenger against a stage-coach proprietor, it was held that proprietors of stage-coaches are not insurers or warrantors of the safety of passengers to the same extent as common carriers of goods; still they are liable for the slightest neglect, and are held to extraordinary diligence and care. The court cites sections 592 and 601a, Story, Bailm., and Farish v. Reigle, 11 Grat. 711, where the same rule is laid down. As to the vehicle, Judge STORY says, in section 592, of such proprietors: "They are bound to provide coaches reasonably strong and sufficient for the journey, with suitable harness, trappings, and equipments, and to make a proper examination thereof previous to each journey." And, further: "Hence it has been held that if there is any defect in the original construction of a stage-coach,—as, for example in an axletree,—although the defect be out of sight and not discoverable upon a mere ordinary examination, yet if the defect might be discovered by a more minute examination, and any damage is occasioned to a passenger thereby, the coach proprietors are answerable therefor. The same rule will apply to any other latent defect, which might be discovered by more minute examination and more exact diligence, whereby the work is not roadworthy, and a damage thereby occurs to any passenger." In section 601a, Justice Story says that "the law will, in tenderness to human life and human limbs, hold the proprietors liable for the slightest negligence, and will compel them to repel, by satisfactory proofs, every imputation thereof." In Farish v. Reigle, supra, the question was directly raised whether a stage-coach proprietor was responsible for more than ordinary diligence. The court unanimously held that he was. The court approved of the doctrines of Justice Story on this subject. In the cases cited, the court, speaking by Justice DANIEL, said: "The liabilities of such carriers naturally flow from their duties. As they are not, like common carriers of goods, insurers against all injuries except by the act of God, or by public enemies, the inquiry is naturally presented, what is the nature and extent of their responsibility? It is certain that their undertaking is not an undertaking absolutely to convey safely. But although they do not warrant the safety of the passengers at all events, yet their undertaking and liability go to the extent that they and their agents possess competent skill, and that they will use all due care and diligence in the performance of their duty. But in what manner (the author asks) are we to measure this due care and diligence? Is it ordinary care and diligence which will make them liable only for ordinary neglect? Or is it extraordinary care and diligence which will render them liable for slight neglect? As they undertake for the carriage of human beings, whose lives, and limbs, and health are of great importance, as well to the public as to themselves, the ordinary principle in criminal cases, where persons are made liable for personal wrongs and injuries arising from slight neglect, would seem (he says) to furnish the true analogy and rule. It has been accordingly held that passenger carriers bind themselves to carry safely those whom they [admit] into their coaches, as far as human care and foresight will go,—that is, for the utmost care and diligence of very cautious persons; and of course they are responsible for any, even the slightest, neglect. Section 601. In section 601a the further proposition is stated that, when injury or damage happens to the passengers by the breaking down or overturning of the coach, or by any other accident occurring on the ground, the presumption prima facie is that it occurred by the negligence of the coachman; and the onus probandi is on the proprietors of the coach to establish that there has been no negligence whatsoever, and that the damage or injury has been occasioned by inevitable casuality, or by come cause which human care and foresight could not prevent; for the law will, in tenderness to human life and limbs, hold the proprietors liable for the slightest negligence, and will compel them to repel, by satisfactory proofs, every imputation thereof." This ruling in Fairchild v. Stage Co. was approved in Boyce v. Stage Co., 25 Cal. 468, and Lawrence v. Green, 70 Cal. 417, 420, 421, 11 Pac. Rep. 750.

It thus appears to be settled law in this state that a proprietor of stage-coaches is liable for the slightest negligence in regard to the vehicle provided by him; that he is responsible to his passenger for the utmost care and diligence of very cautious persons. In Rodgers v. Railroad Co., 67 Cal. 608, 8 Pac. Rep. 377, it was said by the court: "Manifestly it was the duty of the defendant, a railroad company, to furnish alike to its passengers and employes a suitable and safe road, engines, cars, and appliances for conducting its business," etc. Certainly the degree of care and diligence to be exercised by a stage-coach proprietor, as to the vehicle to be provided by him for the carriage of passengers, is just as high as regards a railroad company, and the cars or other machinery which it is to provide and furnish for such transportation. The railroad company is bound for the utmost care and diligence of very cautions persons, and is responsible for any, even the slightest, neglect. The same rule applies in both cases, and for the same reason, that each undertakes to carry human beings, whose lives and limbs and health are of great importance, as well to the public as themselves.

In Maverick v. Railroad Co., 36 N. Y. 378, the rule is stated as well settled that "passenger carriers bind themselves to carry safely those whom they take into their coaches, as far as human care and foresight will go; that is, to the utmost care and diligence of very cautious persons." The court cites Bowen v. Railroad Co., 18 N. Y. 408, and Deyo v. Railroad Co., 34 N. Y. 9, where the same rule is laid down.

In Taylor v. Railroad Co., 48 N. H. 313, a large number of authorities are collected in an able opinion by BELLOWS, J. In this opinion it is declared: "The doctrine of the American courts is still more strict and explicit; and the general current of the authorities is that the carrier of passengers is bound to the utmost care and diligence of very cautious persons, and is responsible for any, even the smallest, neglect; holding their undertaking to be to carry their passengers with safety as far as human care and foresight can go. This is distinctly laid down in Story, Bailm. §§ 601, 601a; and also in 2 Greenl. Ev. § 221; and in 2 Kent, Comm. *601, *602; and Redf. R. R. c. 17."

In Railroad Co. v. Derby, 14 How. 486, it is said by the court: "When carriers undertake to convey persons by the powerful but dangerous agency of steam, public policy and safety require that they be held to the greatest possible care and diligence. And, whether the consideration for such transportation be pecuniary or otherwise, the personal safety of the passengers should not be left to the sport of chance, or the negligence of careless agents. Any negligence in such cases may well deserve the epithet of 'gross.'" This statement is approved in The New World v. King, 16 How. 474, as resting not only on public policy, but sound principles of law. See Redf. R. R. § 149, note 5. The above rule is sustained by Stokes v. Saltonstall, 13 Pet. 181; in Massachusetts, by Ingalls v. Bills, 9 Metc. 1; and McElroy v. Railroad Co., 4 Cush. 400; in Maine, by Edwards v. Lord, 49 Me. 279; in Connecticut, by Hall v. Steam-Boat Co., 13 Conn. 320; Derwort v. Loomer, 21 Conn. 253; Fuller v. Railroad Co., Id. 557, 576; in Vermont, by Hadley v. Cross, 34 Vt. 586. See, also, Hegeman v. Railroad Corp., 16 Barb. 353, approved in 13 N. Y. 9; Caldwell v. Murphy, 1 Duer, 241; Railroad Co. v. Burke, 13 Wend. 626; Railroad Co. v. Aspell, 23 Pa. St. 147; Railroad Co. v. Kennard, 21 Pa. St. 203; Railroad Co. v. Yarwood, 15 Ill. 468; Railroad Co. v. Fay, 16 Ill. 558; Frink v. Potter, 17 Ill. 406; Frink v. Coe, 4 G. Greene, 555; McKinney v. Neil, 1 McLean, 540; Maury v. Talmadge, 2 McLean, 157; Cornwall v. Railroad Co., 28 N. H. 169; Clark v. Barrington, 41 N. H. 51.

In Railroad Co. v. Kennard, supra, Judge GIBSON said "that the carrier is bound to guard the passenger from every danger which extreme vigilance can prevent." And it is said by AGNEW, J., speaking for the court, in Meier v. Railroad Co., 64 Pa. St. 225, that the above expresses the true measure of responsibility.

In Laing v. Colder, 8 Pa. St. 482, Judge BELL said that, though in legal contemplation the carrier does not warrant the absolute safety of his passengers, he is bound to the exercise of the utmost degree of diligence and care. The slightest neglect against which human prudence and foresight may guard, and by which hurt or loss is occasioned, will render them liable in damages.

One of the ablest of our text-writers and jurists, Judge Cooley, thus states the rule as to carriers of passengers: Such carrier "only undertakes that he will carry them without negligence or fault. But as there are committed to his charge for the time the lives and safety of persons of all ages and of all degrees of ability for self-protection, and as the slightest failure in watchfulness may be destructive of life or limb, it is reasonable to require of him the most perfect care of prudent and cautious men, and his undertaking and liability as to his passengers goes to this extent: that, as far as human foresight and care can reasonably go, he will transport them safely. He is not liable if injuries happen from sheer accident or misfortune, where there is no negligence or fault, and where no want of caution, foresight, or judgment would prevent the injury. But he is liable for the smallest negligence in himself or his servants." Cooley, Torts, (2d Ed.) 768, 769. The learned author cites, as sustaining his statements of the law, a long list of cases, which will be found in note 1, p. 769.

As said by BELLOWS, J., in Taylor v. Railroad Co., 48 N. H. 314: "Upon grounds of public policy, also, the carrier of passengers is bound to exercise the highest degree of care and diligence. To his diligence and fidelity are intrusted the lives and safety of large numbers of human beings;" and when passengers are carried by steam the demand for the utmost skill and diligence is especially required, "for then, in consequence of the greater speed, the hazards to life and limb are largely increased." The same degree of responsibility must attach to one controlling and running an elevator. Persons who are lifted by elevators are subjected to great risks to life and limb. They are hoisted vertically, and are unable, in case of the breaking of the machinery, to help themselves. The person running such elevator must be held to undertake to raise such persons safely, as far as human care and foresight will go. The law holds him to the utmost care and diligence of very cautious persons, and responsible for the slightest neglect. Such responsibility attaches to all persons engaged in employments where human beings submit their bodies to their control, by which their lives or limbs are put at hazard, or where such employment is attended with danger to life or limb. The utmost care and diligence must be used by persons engaged in such employments, to avoid injury to those they carry. The care and diligence required is proportioned to the danger to the persons carried. In proportion to the degree of danger to others must be the care and diligence to be exercised; where the danger is great, the utmost care and diligence must be employed. In such cases the law requires extraordinary care and diligence. We know of no employment where the law should demand a higher degree of care and diligence than in the case of the persons using and running elevators for lifting human beings from one level to another. The danger of those being raised is great. When persons are injured by the giving way of the machinery the hurt is always serious, frequently fatal; and the law should and does bind persons so engaged to the highest degree of care practicable under the circumstances. It would be injustice and cruelty to the public in courts to abate in any degree from this high degree of care. The aged, the helpless, and the infirm are daily using these elevators. The owners make profit by these elevators, or use them for the profit they bring to them. The cruelty from a careless use of such contrivances is likely to fall on the weakest of the community. All, including the strongest, are without the means of self-protection upon the breaking down of the machinery. The law, therefore, throws around such persons its protection by requiring the highest care and diligence. The carrier of passengers is under obligations to use the utmost care and diligence in providing safe, suitable, and sufficient vehicles for the conveyance of his passengers. Readhead v. Railroad Co., L. R. 2 Q. B. 412, L. R. 4 Q. B. 379; Jamison v. Railroad Co., 55 Cal. 593; Ingalls v. Bills, 9 Metc. 1; Taylor v. Railroad Co., 48 N. H. 304; Caldwell v. Steam-Boat Co., 47 N. Y. 287; Railroad Co. v. Huntley, 38 Mich. 537; Railroad Co. v. State, 29 Md. 252; Railroad Co. v. Sanger, 15 Grat. 230; Kelly v. Railroad Co., 15 N. E. Rep. 879; Railroad Co. v. Herbert, 116 U. S. 651, 652, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 590.

Railroads must keep pace with science and art and modern improvement, in their application to the carriage of passengers, but are not responsible for the unknown as well as the new. Meier v. Railroad Co., 64 Pa. St. 225. In this case it is stated that the rule laid down in the second assignment of error is a correct summary of the law. The language used in the assignment of error referred to is this: "That the rule in regard to carriers of passengers is this: the utmost care and vigilance is required on the part of the carrier. This rule does not require the utmost degree of care which the human mind is capable of imagining; but it does require that the highest degree of practicable care and diligence should be adopted that is consistent with the mode of transportation adopted. Railway passenger carriers are bound to use all reasonable precautions against injury of passengers; and these precautions are to be measured by those in known use in the same business, which have been proved by experience to be efficacious. The company is bound to use the best precautions in known practical use. That is the rule: The best precautions in known practical use to secure the safety of the passengers, but not every possible preventive which the highest scientific skill might suggest." Railroad companies are bound to adopt the most approved modes of construction and machinery in known use in the business. If they fail to do so, and injury result in consequence, they are responsible, as is said in Ford v. Railroad Co., 2 Fost. & F. 730. The company "was bound to use the best precautions in known practical use, to secure the safety of their passengers, but not every possible preventive which the highest scientific skill might have suggested."

In Steinweg v. Railroad Co., 43 N. Y. 123, it is held that railway companies, as common carriers, are bound to have such vehicles and machinery for the transportation of goods as the improvements known to practical men, and tested by practical use, may suggest, but not to take every possible precaution which the highest scientific skill might suggest, nor to adopt any mere speculative and untried experiment. As stated above, it is said in Ingalls v. Bills, 9 Metc. 1, that the carrier of passengers is responsible for defects that might have been discovered upon the most careful and thorough examination. In Hadley v. Cross, 34 Vt. 586, the doctrine of Ingalls v. Bills, supra, was applied to a livery stable keeper letting a defective carriage, and he was held liable if the defect could have been discovered upon the most careful and thorough examination.

It was held in Hegeman v. Railroad Corp., 16 Barb. 353, that the carrier is bound to conduct his business with all the care which human prudence and skill could suggest, and the defendants in that case were held liable for injuries caused by a defect in a car made by a competent manufacturer, which defect was not discoverable upon a thorough examination after the car was finished, but might have been before, by bending the axle in which the defect was. This decision was affirmed in 13 N. Y. 9. See, also, Caldwell v. Steam-Boat Co., 47 N. Y. 287.

In Railroad Co. v. Hamilton, 66 Tex. 95, the court said, in regard to a passenger carrier: "If any certain or satisfactory test is known which is within the reach of the company, it should be applied, and they should not, in that case, be excused, if they rely upon a test which is clearly insufficient."

In relation to tests, it was said in Hegeman v. Railroad Corp., 13 N. Y. 26, 27: "It is perfectly understood that latent defects may exist, undiscoverable by the most vigilant examination, when the fabric is completed, from which the most serious accidents have and may occur. It is also well known, as the evidence in this suit tended to prove, and the jury have found, that a simple test (that of bending the iron after the axle was formed, and before it was connected with the wheel) existed, by which it could be detected. This should have been known and applied by men 'professing skill in that particular business.' It was not known, or, if known, was not applied, by these manufacturers. It was not used by the defendants, nor did they inquire whether it had been used by the builders. They relied upon an external examination, which they were bound to know would not, however faithfully prosecuted, guard their passengers against the danger arising from concealed defects in the iron of the axles, or in the manufacture of them. For this omission of duty, or want of skill, the learned judge held, and I think correctly, that they were liable." Here it is held that the test referred to should have been known and applied by men "professing skill in that particular business," (viz., that of making axles and wheels for railway cars.) The case related to a broken axle. The defendants were held liable, if the test was not known to the manufacturers, or, if known, was not applied by them.

In the light of the foregoing well-settled rules of law, that carriers of passengers are responsible, as far as human care and foresight will go, for the utmost care and diligence of very cautious persons, and therefore for the slightest neglect; that they are bound for defects in the vehicles which they furnish, which might have been discovered by the most careful examination,—we think the court below did not err in modifying the instruction under consideration as pointed out above. It is a most reasonable precaution imposed on such a carrier, of whom we consider the owner of an elevator one, to require him to test the vehicles or machinery used by him by the best known tests reasonably practicable. If such tests are not used, the carrier is wanting in the care and foresight required. Nor are the defendants excused from the degree of care and diligence above pointed out, by the fact that the elevator in use was constructed by a competent and skilled manufacturer, from whom they purchased it. The manufacturer was their agent or servant in the construction of the elevator, and they are responsible for any want of care of the maker or builder. The obligation of care and foresight rests on the person using the elevator, and he cannot shift it from himself to another person. This point is made and decided in Hegeman v. Railroad Corp., 16 Barb. 356, as also by the court of appeals of New York in the same case, where it was there heard. In the case in 16 Barb. the court, per HARRIS, J., said: "They [the defendants] gave evidence to show that they had purchased the car from a manufacturer of high reputation for the excellence and safety of the cars manufactured by him, and that, after employing all reasonable care and skill for the purpose of detecting any defect in the machinery, the defect in the axle, which was the cause of the accident, had remained undiscovered, and, in fact, could not be discovered by means of any examination which the defendants were able to make. The rule of law applicable to the evidence upon this branch of the case was very accurately stated by the learned judge at the circuit. After having distinctly laid down the general proposition that the defendants were not liable if they had exercised all reasonable care and diligence in providing a safe track and a safe engine and cars, and had properly supplied their train with a suitable number of competent and faithful men to take charge of the train, and those men had managed it in a careful and skillful manner, he proceeded to say, in respect to the defect in the axle, that the defendants were responsible for this defect to the same extent as if the axle had been manufactured by themselves. Of the soundness of this rule I think there can be no doubt. From the very necessity of the case, the defendants are obliged to carry on their business through the instrumentality of agents. Some are employed to construct or keep in repair their road-way; others, to construct or repair their engines and cars; and others, again, to operate such engines and cars upon the road. For neglect or want of skill in any of these the defendants, as principals, are answerable to third persons. Whether the engine or car which they place upon the road for the purpose of carrying passengers has been manufactured in their own workshops, by agents employed directly for that purpose, or by a manufacturer engaged in the business of supplying such articles for sale, they are alike bound to see that in the construction no care or skill has been omitted for the purpose of making such engine or car as safe as care and skill can make it. When such care and skill has been exercised, the defendant's duty, in this respect, has been discharged. If, on the other hand, a defect exists in the construction, which might have been detected and remedied, they are answerable for the consequences." The same point was thus disposed of in the opinion of the court in the same case in 13 N. Y. 26: "It was said that carriers of passengers are not insurers. This is true. That they were not required to become smelters of iron or manufacturers of cars in the prosecution of their business. This also must be conceded. What the law does require is that they shall furnish a sufficient car to secure the safety of their passengers by the exercise of the 'utmost care and skill in its preparation.' They may construct it themselves, or avail themselves of the services of others; but in either case they engage that all that well-directed skill can do has been done for the accomplishment of this object. A good reputation upon the part of the builder is very well in itself, but ought not to be accepted by the public or the law as a substitute for a good vehicle. What is demanded, and what is undertaken by the corporation, is not merely that the manufacturer had the requisite capacity, but that it was skillfully exercised in the particular instance. If to this extent they are not responsible, there is no security for individuals or the public."

It was said of a coach proprietor by ALDERSON, J., in Sharp v. Grey, 9 Bing. 457, that he is liable for all defects in his vehicle which can be seen at the time of construction, as well as for such as may exist afterwards, and be discovered on investigation. If not, he might buy ill-constructed or unsafe vehicles, and his passengers be without remedy. The above remarks apply with all their force to the proprietor of an elevator. The reasonableness of the rule that the responsibility cannot be shifted to the manufacturer appears from the consideration that the law gives no remedy to the injured passenger against the manufacturer or builder of the elevator. There is no privity between the builder and the passenger.

The remarks of HANNEN, J., in Francis v. Cockrell, L. R. 5 Q. B. 184, are especially appropriate here. In that case the plaintiff sued to recover for an injury occasioned by the fall of a grand stand at a race-course. The defendant owned the stand, but had contracted with another to build it. It was defectively constructed through the negligence of the contractor, and from the defect the fall occurred. The defendant was held liable. HANNEN, J., said that the case was analogous to that of a carrier of passengers contracting with a builder to construct a car for him, where the builder was guilty of negligence in its construction. He said further: "In the ordinary course of things, the passenger does not know whether the carrier has himself manufactured the means of carriage, or contracted with some one else for its manufacture. If the carrier has contracted with some one else, the passenger does not usually know who that person is, and in no case has he any share in the selection. The liability of the manufacturer must depend on the terms of the contract between him and the carrier, of which the passenger has no knowledge, and over which he can have no control; while the carrier can introduce what stipulations and take what sureties he may think proper. For injury resulting to the carrier himself by the manufacturer's want of care the carrier has a remedy against the manufacturer; but the passenger has no remedy against the manufacturer for damage arising from a mere breach of contract with the carrier. Longmeid v. Holliday, 6 Exch. 761, 20 Law. J. Exch. 430. See George v. Skivington, 5 L. R. Exch. 1. Unless, therefore, the presumed intention of the parties be that the passenger should, in the event of his being injured by the breach of the manufacturer's contract, of which he has no knowledge, be without remedy, the only way in which effect can be given to a different intention is by supposing that the carrier is to be responsible to the passenger, and to look for his indemnity to the person whom he selected, and whose breach of contract has caused the mischief." In Francis v. Cockrell, supra, the plaintiff was allowed to recover for the negligence of the contractor, a competent builder, though the defendant was not himself guilty of negligence, and was affirmed on this point in the exchequer chamber. L. R. 5 Q. B. 501. To the same effect are Grote v. Railway Co., 2 Exch. 251, and Burns v. Railway Co., 13 Ir. C. L. 543.

4. It is further argued that the court erred in giving the first instruction asked by plaintiff. The instruction is as follows: "That the defendants owed it as a duty to the persons using the elevator in their store, either as customers or by their invitation or request, to use all reasonable means and efforts to furnish good and well-constructed machinery adapted to the purposes of its use, of good material, and of the kind which is found to be safest when applied to use; and, while they were not required to seek and apply every new invention, they must adopt such as are found by experience to combine the greater safety with practical use." We think this is a direction that the defendants were bound to use all reasonable means and efforts to furnish good and well-constructed machinery adapted to the purpose of its use, and all reasonable means and efforts to furnish or provide it of good material, and of the kind that is found to be the safest when applied to use; that the kind of machinery furnished and the material furnished must be of that kind which has been found by others using it or constructing such machinery to be safest in practical use. The latter portion of the instruction bears out this interpretation. It is that the defendants must adopt such inventions as are found by the experience of other persons to combine the greatest safety with practical use; yet, while they are bound to do this, the law excuses them from seeking and applying every new invention. The instruction, as we understand it, is but a fair deduction from the rule that the defendants must use the utmost care and diligence to carry safely those who ride in their elevator, as far as human care and foresight will go; and, while they do not engage for absolute safety, they do bind themselves and warrant that they will use the utmost care and diligence of very cautious persons, as far as human care and foresight will go, to provide such means of carriage as are above pointed out. Like common carriers of passengers, they must keep pace with science, art, and modern improvement in supplying safe obtainable vehicles, machinery, and appliances for their use. See 2 Redf. R. R. 241, 242. They must adopt the most improved modes of construction and machinery in known use in the business; and if they do not, and injury occur, they will be held responsible. 2 Redf. R. R. (6th Ed.) 242. As was said in Hegeman v. Railroad Corp., 16 Barb. 358: "The defendants were bound to use every precaution which human skill and foresight could suggest to insure the safety of passengers." A like obligation rested on the defendants in this case. See, on this point, Smith v. Railroad Co., 19 N. Y. 127; Steinweg v. Railroad Co., 43 N. Y. 127; Bevier v. Canal Co., 13 Hun, 258; Meier v. Railroad Co., 64 Pa. St. 225, 227, 230. We find no error in the giving of this instruction by the court below.

5. It is urged that the court below erred in allowing the witnesses Bangs and Ravekes to testify as to the instructions given the defendants and their employes with respect to running the elevator. Bangs appears to have been a skilled mechanic, who had been engaged in putting up elevators. He had repaired the elevator of defendants several times. On one occasion, when he was repairing this elevator, he cautioned one of the defendants as to the mode in which they ran it. He told this defendant, when he was there repairing the elevator, about their using it very carelessly; that they ought to be more cautious; that the pressure should be shut off at a particular point. "Ravekes was one of the defendants, and he testified that Bangs generally instructed us that we should always ease the water off as it was getting to the place to be stopped, and not let it run without that; that Bangs further told him what the effects would be of neglecting this." The questions which brought out this testimony, and the answers to the questions, were objected to. It would be strange to hold that this evidence was not admissible. The defendants were bound to acquaint themselves with the best mode of running this elevator, so as to carry safely those who rode on it. They should have sought information diligently on this point. Making use of a contrivance for raising human beings vertically, if they failed to acquaint themselves with the safest mode of running it, would be of itself the grossest negligence. Any caution which they received should have been most acceptable to them. Here they were cautioned by a skilled man that they were running the elevator carelessly. The evidence was competent and material to show a knowledge by defendants that they were operating the elevator incautiously and carelessly. We cannot conceive that the scienter can be proved in any other mode than by information from others. Conceding that the evidence of Bangs was hearsay, it was of that character of hearsay which is admissible for the purpose for which it was allowed. Certainly the evidence of Ravekes, one of the defendants, was not hearsay. He testified to information conveyed to him material on the main issue in the case, viz., of negligence. What was said by Bangs to Ravekes was said in reply to inquiries by the latter, and the information was communicated by Ravekes to everybody else in the store. On the point of admissibility, see 1 Greenl. Ev. § 101, and 1 Whart. Ev. § 252.

The above disposes of all the points discussed on the oral argument, and all, we presume, relied on to secure a new trial. We have nevertheless looked into all the other points discussed in the opening brief of appellants, and, after consideration, find no error in the rulings of the court below. The judgment and order must be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

I concur: SHARPSTEIN, J.

MCFARLAND, J. I concur in the judgment of affirmance.

1. I concur in all that is said in the first point discussed in the opinion of Mr. Justice THORNTON.

2. I think, also, that the court below did not err in striking the words, "and to a moral certainty," out of the instruction asked by defendants. The words "moral certainty," as found in section 1826 of the Code of Civil Procedure, are certainly somewhat confusing, considering their celebrated use by Chief Justice SHAW in the Webster Case, 5 Cush. 320, as part of the definition of belief beyond "a reasonable doubt." It is evident, however, that the words were not used in the latter sense in the section referred to, else the well-recognized distinction between the amount of evidence required for conviction in a criminal case and the amount sufficient to determine an issue in a civil action would be entirely obliterated. The legislature must be held as stating, or trying to state, in section 1826, the general difference between a mathematical, or strictly scientific, demonstration, and the kind of proof usually obtainable in judicial trials. They did not intend to use the words, in that relation, as synonymous with proof beyond a reasonable doubt. And this is apparent from section 2061, which provides that the court, on proper occasions, must instruct the jury, among other things, "that in civil cases the affirmative of the issue must be proved, and, when the evidence is contradictory, the decision must be made according to the preponderance of evidence; that in criminal cases guilt must be established beyond reasonable doubt." It was sufficient, therefore, in the case at bar, for the court to tell the jury that plaintiff must prove his case "by a preponderance of evidence." To have added, "and to a moral certainty," would have tended to confuse and mislead the jury.

But I do not entirely agree with the other reasons which Mr. Justice THORNTON gives for sustaining the action of the court on this instruction. I think he states the doctrine too broadly, that the mere happening of an accident, of itself, proves the negligence of the carrier. Of course, in many instances, the nature of the accident, and the circumstances under which it occurred, will, if unexplained, make a prima facie case of negligence; but I do not take it to be established as a rule of law that any accident by which a passenger is injured will have that effect. In Boyce v. Stage Co., 25 Cal. 468–470, there are some expressions (in the opinion of the court) which tend towards such an extreme doctrine; but they were not necessary to the decision of the case. In that case the circumstances showed extreme carelessness on the part of the driver of the coach. The court say: "At the point where the overturning occurred, the road formed the arc of a circle. Instead of moving on the arc, the team took the chord, and went so near the precipice as to allow the wheels to run off. * * * One cannot read the evidence in connection with the diagram contained in the record without coming to the conclusion that the overturning which caused nearly fatal injuries to the plaintiff, and death to some of the other passengers, was the result of careless inattention on the part of the coachman in not keeping his team in the road. * * * It is most probable, from the evidence, that his inattention was the result of drowsiness, induced by the hour and the use of too much liquor." But if, in such a case, the plaintiff should merely show that while a coach was going at a moderate gait, along the middle of a good, wide, and commonly traveled road, it was suddenly overturned without any apparent cause, would those facts alone make out a case of negligence (which is always the gist of such an action) against the defendant?

3. I concur in the doctrine that the responsibility of a common carrier of passengers attaches to one who controls and runs an elevator used as appellants used the elevator by which respondent was injured.

I also concur in the conclusion that the court below did not err in giving the first instruction asked by plaintiff, or in adding to the ninth instruction asked by defendants the words, "according to the best-known tests reasonably practicable;" but I think that some of the cases cited by Mr. Justice THORNTON, with apparent approval, in his discussion of those instructions, carry the rule concerning the application of tests beyond its legitimate reach. On all other points I concur in the opinion of Mr. Justice THORNTON.

FRESNO CANAL & IRRIGATION CO. v. DUNBAR. (No. 12,780.)

COVENANTS RUNNING WITH THE LAND—LIENS—EVIDENCE.

1. Plaintiff entered into a written contract with R. to furnish him water on his land by means of an irrigating ditch, at a stated price, for 40 years. The contract declared that "this agreement and the covenants therein contained on the part of the party of the second part run with and bind the land." The contract was recorded. Held, that the clause providing that the contract should run with and bind the land created a lien on the land for its enforcement, and, when recorded, was notice to all subsequent purchasers. MCFARLAND, J., dissenting.

2. Under Civil Code Cal. §§ 1460–1466, specifying what covenants run with the land when contained in a grant of the estate, the covenants under the contract in question do not run with the land, not being contained in the grant of the estate, and no personal judgment can be had against a purchaser of the land for his refusal to perform them.

3. Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1951, provides that every instrument conveying or affecting real property, acknowledged, or proved and certified as provided in the Civil Code, may, together with the certificate of acknowledgment or proof, be read in evidence in any action or proceeding; and a certified copy of the record of such instrument, thus acknowledged or proved, may also be read in evidence with the like effect as the original, on proof, by affidavit or otherwise, that the original is not in the possession or under the control of the party producing the certified copy. Plaintiff sued on a contract in writing, which purported to be a lien on the land of defendant, and alleged that the instrument had been duly acknowledged and recorded. On trial he introduced in evidence an instrument purporting to be the one sued on or a duplicate, but which had not been acknowledged. He then introduced the record of the instrument with the acknowledgment added. Held, that the instrument was inadmissible as the one sued on, because it had not been acknowledged, and that the record was inadmissible without accounting for the original.

4. Where plaintiff agrees with defendant to furnish him water from a main ditch, and to put in a box or gate, to be used in transferring the water to a ditch to be dug by defendant, and plaintiff complies with its part of the contract, defendant cannot avoid payment by failing to dig his ditch.

5. Where the proof showed that the water was furnished by plaintiff at the place agreed, the offer of defendant to show that plaintiff's ditch was negligently and unskillfully constructed was properly refused, as immaterial.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; J. B. Campbell, Judge.

Action by the Fresno Canal & Irrigation Company, on a contract to furnish water from an irrigating ditch to the land of defendant, L. L. Dunbar. The contract was made with one Roeding, the vendor of defendant. The defense was that the contract did not create a covenant running with the land, and that it was not a lien on the land. On trial by the court without a jury a personal judgment was entered against defendant, and also a decree enforcing a lien on the land for the amount of the judgment, and ordering the property sold to satisfy it. Civil Code Cal. §§ 1460–1466, provide that every covenant contained in a grant of estate in real property, made for its direct benefit, runs with the land, including covenants of warranty, or for quiet enjoyment, or for further assurance on the part of the grantor, or for the payment of rent, taxes, or assessments, on the part of the grantee, or for the addition of some new thing, or for the direct benefit of some part of the property not then in existence or annexed thereto, when made by the covenantor expressly for his assigns or the assignees of the covenantee, and that such covenant runs with the land only so far as the assigns thus mentioned are concerned, and that the only covenants which run with the land are those specified in this title, or those incident thereto. Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1951, provides that every instrument conveying or affecting real property, acknowledged or proved and certified as provided in the Civil Code, may, together with the certificate of acknowledgment or proof, be read in evidence in any action or proceeding; and a certified copy of the record of such instrument, thus acknowledged and proved, may also be read in evidence with the like effect as the original, on proof by affidavit or otherwise that the original is not in the possession or under the control of the party producing the certified copy.

Wharton & Short, for appellant. Geo. E. Church, for respondent.

Works, J. The respondent, the plaintiff in the court below, being a corporation engaged in diverting and supplying water for irrigation, entered into a contract with one Roeding, who was then the owner of a certain tract of land, by which the respondent sold to said Roeding for the sum of $1,200 a water-right for said real estate, and in and by said contract "grants, bargains, sells, and conveys to the party of the second part, from the main canal of the party of the first part, or from a branch thereof, all the water that may be required, not exceeding at any time four cubic feet per second, for the purpose of irrigating said lands;" and agreed to place a suitable box or gate in the bank of its main canal, or a branch thereof, at the most convenient point for the conveyance of the water to said land. And the party of the second part, said Roeding, agreed to construct a ditch from said box or gate to said land at his own risk, cost, and expense, and that the ditch so constructed should be a branch ditch of said company, and under its control. The contract contained the following further covenants, material to the question presented on this appeal: "It is understood and agreed that the water to be furnished under this agreement is intended to form a part of the appurtenances to said section of land, and the right thereto shall be transferable only with, and run with, said land, and that the party of the first part is bound by this instrument to all subsequent owners of said land, but to no other person. The party of the second part, for himself, his heirs and assigns, covenants and agrees that he and his successors in interest and estate in said land will pay annually to the party of the first part, at their office, in gold coin of the United States, on the first Monday in September of each year, after the water shall first be brought to the said land, until the year 1920, and during the existence of said corporation, the sum of four hundred dollars, and in case of default of such payment in any one year for the space of thirty days after it shall become due, this agreement shall terminate and become thenceforth null and void and of no effect, at the option of the party of the first part, their successors and assigns. * * * It is covenanted that this agreement and the covenants therein contained on the part of the party of the second part run with and bind the land." The contract was to run and be in force from the 8th day of December, 1881, until the 16th day of February, 1921, and during the existence of said corporation. Roeding sold and conveyed the lands described in the agreement to the appellant. This action was brought against the appellant, alleging the making of the contract, and that the respondent had complied with the terms and conditions thereof; that the land had been conveyed to the appellant; that the contract was duly acknowledged and recorded before his purchase of the property, and that certain installments of the amount agreed to be paid by Roeding had become due and were unpaid. There was a demurrer to the complaint on the ground that the same did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, which was overruled. The defendant answered, denying the material allegations of the complaint, and by way of cross-complaint set up that the ditch of the plaintiff had been so negligently and improperly constructed as to cause the overflow of the defendant's lands, by which he had been damaged in the sum of $1,000. A demurrer to the cross-complaint was sustained. The cause was tried by the court, and findings made in favor of the plaintiff, and a personal judgment rendered against the defendant, and also a decree enforcing a lien for the amount due, and ordering the sale of the property for its satisfaction.

The appellant contends that the complaint was insufficient, and that the demurrer thereto should have been sustained on the ground that the contract sued upon created no lien upon the land, and was not personally binding upon the purchasers from Roeding. This is placed on the ground that at common law, and under the provisions of the Code of this state, a covenant cannot be made to run with the land except where such covenant is made in connection with and as a part of the conveyance or transfer of the land itself, and that the clause in the contract attempting to extend the liability beyond the person contracting was nothing more than an attempt to create and enforce a covenant running with the land. We are inclined to the opinion that counsel are right, that this was not such a covenant as would run with the land. Civil Code, §§ 1460-1466; Cole v. Hughes, 54 N. Y. 444; Bloch v. Isham, 28 Ind. 37; Scott v. McMillan, 76 N. Y. 144. But there is something more in the contract than the attempt to extend the liability to subsequent purchasers or assignees of the party contracting. There is an express agreement that it shall bind the land itself; therefore, it does not depend upon the question whether a covenant on the part of the then owner of the property would run with the land or not. The question is whether the provision in the contract was such as to create a lien upon the land. We think it perfectly clear from the language used that this was the intention of the parties. It was provided that the right to the water to be furnished by the respondent should be and become appurtenant to the land, and this was followed by an express agreement that the contract to pay the money therefor should bind the land. This, we think, created a lien upon the land, and as the complaint alleges that the contract was acknowledged and recorded, it was notice to the appellant of the existence of such lien. Under such a covenant the land is liable in the hands of a subsequent purchaser. Scott v. McMillan, 76 N. Y. 144. But it does not follow that by reason of such covenant in the contract, and the subsequent purchase by the appellant, he became personally liable for the payment of the amount to become due, although the contract inured to his benefit so long as he continued to be the owner of the land; and so far as the judgment is personal against him it is erroneous. He purchased and held the real estate subject to the lien, but did not become personally liable to pay the debt. We think for these reasons that the demurrer to the complaint was properly overruled, as it stated a cause of action for the foreclosure of the lien.

At the trial the plaintiff offered in evidence a contract shown to have been signed by Roeding, similar to, if not the same as, the one sued upon in the action, except that it was not acknowledged; and there was evidence in connection with its offer that it was the custom of the respondent to take these contracts in duplicate. The contract was objected to by the defendant on the ground that it was not the one sued upon, and it was alleged to have been duly acknowledged, and the acknowledgment was set out in full in the complaint. The court overruled the objection, and the contract was read in evidence. The plaintiff then offered in evidence the record of the same contract, with the acknowledgment added, as recorded in the recorder's office. To this the defendant objected on the grond that the record was incompetent. The court also overruled this objection, and allowed the record of the contract to be read. Conceding that the contract read in evidence was the same, except the acknowledgment, as the one sued upon, and was a duplicate thereof, it failed to prove sufficient to charge the land in the hands of the defendant in this action, for the reason that he could only be held liable, or the lands charged in his hands, by proof of the acknowledgment and recording of the instrument, which was the only evidence of notice on his part at the time of his purchase of the existence of the lien upon the land. Therefore, if the admission of the record of the contract was erroneous, the plaintiff failed to make out his case in this respect. The admission of the record of the contract without proof of the loss of the original, or otherwise accounting for it, was error. Code Civil Proc. § 1951; Brown v. Griffith, 70 Cal. 14, 11 Pac. Rep. 500. It is otherwise under the Code as amended. St. 1889, p. 45.

There was a motion for a nonsuit, which was denied. The appellant contends that the nonsuit should have been granted, for the reason that there was no evidence that the water had ever been brought to the lands of the defendant, or used by him. The solution of this question depends upon the construction to be given to the contract, which provided that the company should furnish the water from its main ditch, or a branch thereof, and that it would put in a box or gate, to be used in transferring the water to a ditch to be constructed by the defendant to conduct the water to his lands. If the plaintiff could only recover upon the water being actually conducted to and upon the lands of the defendant, then the motion was well taken; but we think this should not be the construction of the contract. When the company had complied with its agreement to bring water through its main ditch, and to construct a box or gate through which to pass the water into a ditch to be constructed by the defendant, as provided in the contract, it had done all that was necessary to be done on its part, and the defendant could not avoid a recovery by the failure on his part to construct the ditch agreed to be constructed by him. The company was entitled to recover for the water from the time it was prepared to furnish it at the box or gate to be put in by it.

The defendant offered to prove that the plaintiff had so negligently and unskillfully constructed its ditch as to amount to a failure to perform its part of the contract, and so as to cause the destruction of defendant's land, instead of being a benefit to it; and that therefore plaintiff had not complied with its agreement, and that the defendant had been deprived of the beneficial use of the water in that way, and that therefore there was no consideration to defendant. The court below refused to allow the proof, and, we think, properly. If the defendant could have proved, or had offered to prove, that the water was not supplied at the place agreed upon, this would have been a good defense to the action; but it was entirely immaterial whether such failure was caused by the want of a sufficient ditch to carry the water, or the improper and negligent construction of the same, or from some other cause. Plaintiff proved that the water was supplied at the place agreed upon, and this was the material question to be determined. Besides, there was no pleading under which the offered evidence was proper. There is the further contention that the plaintiff failed to construct a head-gate at the most convenient point for irrigating the land, but upon this question the evidence was conflicting, and we cannot disturb the finding of the court. The personal judgment against the defendant for the amount claimed to be due was erroneous, but in other respects it was proper in form, and should be upheld, except for the errors commited at the trial, as above stated. Judgment and order reversed.

We concur: BEATTY, C. J.: THORNTON, J.; PATERSON, J.; SHARPSTEIN, J.; FOX, J.

MCFARLAND, J. I concur in the judgment of reversal; but in my opinion the contract sued on is not one that can be enforced against the land in the hands of subsequent grantees. It is true that the contract is not strictly what is usually called a "covenant running with the land," but it is in the nature of such a covenant, and has practically the same consequences. In my opinion, therefore, it is within the meaning of section 1460 et seq. of the Civil Code; and, not having been made in a case, and in the manner contemplated by those sections, it is invalid, except as between the original contracting parties.

FORD v. BOARD OF STATE HARBOR COM'RS.
(No. 13,374.)

OFFICE AND OFFICER—APPOINTMENT AND TENURE.

1. Pol. Code Cal. § 2521, provides that the board of state harbor commissioners shall appoint certain officers, including a chief wharfinger and such number of wharfingers and collectors as they deem necessary, and that such officers shall hold for the term of four years, but may be removed by the board at any time, after due investigation, for causes affecting their official character and competency; and in case of a vacancy in such offices the board must fill the same by appointment for four years. Held, that the power delegated to the board, by the legislature, of creating the office of collector, necessarily implied the power to abolish the office, when, in the judgment of the board, it was no longer necessary, though the term of four years, for which the incumbent was appointed, had not expired.

2. St. Cal. 1880, p. 11, § 4, provides that as soon as practicable the rates of wharfage must be adjusted and classified by such system, and collected by such officers, as the commissioners may direct; that the duties of such officers, and their compensation, shall be fixed by the commissioners, and when such system is put in force no tolls must be collected by load or vehicle on any merchandise passing on or off the wharves, and the system of collection by toll collectors must cease. Held, that the revision of the Code in 1883, by which the collectors were declared to be officers, did not impliedly repeal the statute of 1880, so as to take from the commissioners the power to remove collectors, as it left in full force section 2524 of the Code, giving the commissioners and mayor of San Francisco authority to modify dockage and wharfage rates, and directing that thereafter the collection of tolls should cease and the collectors be discharged.

BEATTY, C. J., and WORKS and THORNTON, JJ., dissenting.

James G. Maguire, for plaintiff. W. W. Morrow and T. C. Coogan, for defendant.

FOX, J. This is an application for a writ of mandate to compel the defendant to allow and pay to plaintiff the sum of $30, as and for the balance due him on account of his salary as collector for the month ending July 24, 1889. The real purpose of the action is to determine the question of the power of the board of state harbor commissioners to discharge a collector before the expiration of his term of office, for no cause except that his services are no longer needed. The case is submitted upon an agreed statement of facts, from which it appears that on the 9th of June, 1887, the board appointed the plaintiff to the office of collector, in accordance with the provisions of section 2521 of the Political Code; that the plaintiff duly qualified as prescribed by law, and entered upon the discharge of his duties as such officer, and continued to discharge them until the 16th day of July, 1889; that subsequent to such appointment and qualification, and prior to said last-named date, the board adjusted and classified the rates of wharfage on merchandise and other articles, and determined and directed that such charges should be collected upon that portion thereof described in a written statement to be furnished to the board by the master, owner, consignee, or agent of the vessel, describing the merchandise intended to be discharged from, or received on, such vessel, while lying at and making use of the wharves within the jurisdiction of said board; that by reason of the adoption of such system the board determined that the services of said Ford, as such officer, were no longer necessary, and on the 12th day of July, 1889, passed a resolution requiring said Ford to appear before the board on the 16th day of said month, and show cause, if any he had, why he should not be removed from his position as collector; that on said last-named day Ford appeared, and for cause pleaded his appointment and qualification in June, 1887, that his term had not expired, and that he was ready, able, and willing to perform the duties of the office until the expiration of his term, notwithstanding which the board then and there passed a resolution removing him from his position as collector, having before voted to adopt a system for the collection of the revenue, under which system his services as collector would not be necessary; that the board has appointed no other person to succeed Ford in said office of collector, and has determined not to appoint any successor to him, but to abolish said office; that on the 23d of July the board ordered paid a demand in favor of said Ford for $70, which was to pay for his services from the 24th of June to and including the 16th of July, and no more; that on the 25th of July Ford demanded an additional sum of $30, to pay for his services from the 16th of July to and including the 24th of July, but the board refused to allow the same; that ever since the 16th of July the said Ford has been ready and willing to perform the duties of said office, but the board has refused to accept such performance; that no charges and no question concerning any cause or causes affecting the official character or competency of said Ford were ever investigated by said board; and that said board has under its control a sufficient fund to pay said claim of $30.

The board of state harbor commissioners, defendant herein, is an executive board, created by law, and having charge of that portion of the bay of San Francisco lying along the water front of the city and county of San Francisco, and adjacent thereto, and of the improvements, rights, easements, and franchises appurtenant thereto, and connected therewith, of the construction and maintenance of the sea-wall, wharves, docks, etc., and of the collection of the revenues therefrom. It was first created and organized under the "Act to provide for the improvement and protection of the wharves, docks, and water front of the city and county of San Francisco," approved April 24, 1863, (St. 1863, p. 406.) This act authorized the leasing out of the wharves, as fast as they came into the possession of the board, for terms not exceeding three years, and in section 5 provided: "Should the commissioners be unable to lease any wharf or other work coming into their possession, they shall employ some suitable person to collect the revenue which may arise from such wharf or other work, and pay him a proper compensation therefor, not exceeding the rate of $150 per month, and not in any case exceeding the amount by him collected." In 1864 (St. 1863-64, p. 141) this provision was amended so as to read as follows: "Should the commissioners be unable to lease any wharf or other work coming into their possession, they shall employ some suitable person or persons to collect the revenue which may arise from such wharf or other work, and pay a proper compensation therefor, not exceeding the rate of one hundred dollars per month to each person so employed, and not in any case exceeding the sum of two hundred dollars per month for collecting the revenue as aforesaid, and not exceeding the amount collected from such wharf or other work." This provision was carried into the Political Code of 1872, as section 2527, without any material change. In 1876 the entire article of the Political Code relating to harbor commissioners was remodeled, and in section 2522 it was provided: "Said commissioners shall also appoint a sufficient number of persons wharfingers to collect the revenue arising from dockage, cranage, rents, and tolls, by authority of this article, and may also appoint a sufficient number of persons toll collectors to collect the tolls authorized to be collected by this article." Thus the provision as to the method of collecting the revenue stood until 1883, when it was again remodeled and transferred to section 2521 of the Political Code, which is the section coming up for special consideration in this case. It will be observed that, up to the remodeling in 1883, wharfingers and collectors or toll collectors were mere appointees of the board. They were not denominated as officers, and no terms of office were fixed for them. Like any other appointees or employes, they were subject to appointment and removal at the pleasure of the board. The changes of 1883 involved the remodeling of several sections of the article pertaining to the board, and effected a complete reorganization of the board itself. Section 2521, as then adopted, provided: "The board, on entering on the duties of their office, must appoint the following officers, viz., a secretary, an assistant secretary, an attorney, a chief engineer, a chief wharfinger, and such number of wharfingers and collectors as they deem necessary. Such officers shall hold for a term of four years from the dates of their respective appointments, but may be removed by the board at any time, after due investigation, for causes affecting their official character or competency. The order for such removal, stating distinctly the causes therefor, must be entered on their minutes. In case of a vacancy in such offices by the expiration of a term, or for any other cause, the board must fill the same by an appointment for four years." Here will be noticed several significant changes from anything which had been found in the laws before. Certain of the appointees had before that time held positions which had been spoken of as "offices," such as the secretary, assistant secretary, and chief wharfinger, who had been required to give bonds for "the faithful performance of the duties of their offices," but no one of them had ever before been declared or designated by law as an officer having a fixed term of office, or protected from discharge at the pleasure of the board; and the term "officer" or "office" was never before applied to the position of wharfinger or collector, or toll collector, although all of them were required to give bonds for the faithful discharge of their duties. Now, however, every appointee of the board, except mere manual laborers, was designated as an "officer," and his place as an "office," with a fixed term, running to the full limit allowed by the constitution, protected in express terms against removal, except for cause affecting his official character or competency, and after due investigation; and the term was to run for the full four years, without regard to the time when it should begin, or any attempt to make the beginning or ending of the term correspond in time with that of other officers of the state, or of any department of either state or local government. Even in case of vacancy the appointment was not, as in other cases, to fill the unexpired term, but for a full term of four years, commencing at a time when the vacancy was filled. The wisdom of, or the motive for, this radical change and departure from the rules of practice usually adopted in other cases, are matters with which this court has nothing to do, and over which it has no control. Our only inquiry is, how far is the statute binding upon the state to keep a man in office after it has ceased to have any use for the office or the officer?

It may be conceded for the purposes of this case, that the contention of plaintiff, if made in behalf of the secretary, assistant secretary, attorney, chief engineer, or chief wharfinger, would be correct, although we do not so now decide, but does it follow that it is also correct when applied to the offices of wharfingers or collectors? The secretary, assistant secretary, attorney, chief engineer, and chief wharfinger hold offices created by the legislature itself, with fixed terms. But not so with the wharfingers and collectors. The same law which authorizes the board to fill the offices created by the legislature authorizes the board to create these latter offices, and fill them as it deems necessary. It is only when the board has deemed it necessary to fill the place of wharfinger or collector, and has filled the place, that it becomes an office, or has a term. Having created and filled the office, such filling is for the term, and during the term the board is prohibited by law from creating a vacancy in the office, except after due investigation, and for cause. But it by no means follows that it may not abolish that which it created,—the office itself,—and thus dispense with the officer. The legislature has not said to the board: "There shall be a collector, whom you may appoint, who shall hold his office for four years;" but it has said: "If you deem a collector necessary, you may appoint one, and in that case his term of office shall be for four years." It thus delegated to the board the power to create the office or not, as it might deem best.

Plaintiff contends that, the legislature having provided by law that if such an office was created and filled the term should be four years, and that during that time the incumbent could be removed only for cause, the office itself cannot be abolished, and the incumbent thus deprived of his office. Several authorities have been cited in support of this proposition, chief among which are People v. Hill, 7 Cal. 103, and People v. Jewett, 6 Cal. 291. But none of them are directly in point. Both the cases mentioned were cases of attempted removal of one person and appointment of another to the same office; not of removal because the office itself was abolished. The case at bar is more like that of State v. Smith, 65 N. C. 369, cited by defendant. The constitution of North Carolina provided that "the general assembly shall provide for the establishment of special courts for the trial of misdemeanors in cities and towns where the same may be necessary." As here, the board might appoint such collectors as it should deem necessary. In 1868 the general assembly by law established a special court for the city of Wilmington, and provided for a judge of said court, to be appointed by the governor, to hold office for the term of eight years. The governor appointed Cantwell judge of the court, and he entered upon the discharge of the duties of his office. In 1871 the general assembly repealed the law creating the court. The question was whether Cantwell could thus be deprived of his office before the expiration of his term. To this the court said: "If the effect be to abolish the court, the incidental effect must be that the incumbent of the office can no longer discharge the duties of a judge, for there can be no officer where there is no office," and held that the right of the general assembly thus to abolish the office was "too clear for discussion." So in this state it has been held that, when the legislature has created an office provided for or contemplated by the constitution, and it has been filled, the office may be destroyed during the term of the incumbent. People v. Squires, 14 Cal. 13. In People v. Jewett, supra, cited by plaintiff, it was held that the power to create an office included the power to destroy or abolish it. In People v. Banvard, 27 Cal. 475, the question was whether a county treasurer could be legislated out of office during the term for which he was elected,—a term regularly fixed and established by law. The court declared that the question was not an open one; that it had been met and determined in People v. Squires, supra. In Re Bulger and in Re Merrill, 45 Cal. 553, this court decided two points bearing upon the question involved in this case: (1) That the legislature had power to delegate, even to a mere voluntary association, the power to appoint to a position which the law had declared to be a public office; (2) that the legislature can abolish or change an office created by it, and it may extend or abridge the terms of its incumbents at pleasure. The exercise of this power to abolish an office by the same authority that created it and fixed its term, and thus remove the incumbent before the expiration of his term, has been too frequent and too long practiced in this state to leave the question of the right to do so longer open to discussion. The legislature abolishes offices of its creation, and thereby removes the incumbents thereof during their terms of office, at its pleasure. A significant instance of its exercise of this power is found in the very act under which the present board of harbor commissioners exists. The board was fully organized under the provisions of the Political Code as they had been remodeled in 1876, when in 1883 the legislature, by an amendment of the Code, legislated all the members out of office, notwithstanding their fixed terms, which had not expired, and provided for the immediate appointment of an entire new board. So, also, the people abolish offices which have been created, and the terms whereof have been fixed, by them, in the constitution itself, and thus remove officers of their own election during the terms for which they have been elected. In this way this court itself has been more than once reorganized, its judges removed during the constitutional terms for which they had been elected, a new court organized, with new judges on its bench. By the adoption of the constitution of 1879 the entire judiciary of the state was removed, although the majority of its officers were in the midst of their terms of office; and at the same time, and by the same act, many others of the state and county officers were deprived of their offices, not by the expiration of their terms, but by the abolition of the offices themselves. This was but the exercise by the people of the power to abolish the offices which they had themselves created, and no one ever questioned their power. So whenever the people, directly, or through the legislature, clothe any department of the government, or any of its boards or officers, with power, at discretion, to create an office, they clothe it with a like power to abolish the same office. The counsel for defendant have cited cases from more than half the states in the Union in support of this proposition, that the power which creates an office may abolish it, without regard to the expiration of the term of the incumbent. But, in view of the decisions and practice in our own state, it is unnecessary to review them. To all this, however, it may be replied (and perhaps that is the fair construction of the contention of plaintiff, although he has not expressed it in that form) that the office here under discussion was created, and its term fixed, by the legislature, and it is the board, and not the legislature, which attempts to abolish it. In a narrow, technical, and restricted sense it may be true that the legislature created the office, and fixed its term, but not in the broad sense that gives the legislature any control over the existence of the office. It has not appointed the officer, or said that there shall be such an office or officer. It has simply authorized a subordinate body (the defendant here) to make certain appointments, at its discretion, as it "may deem necessary," and provided that, if such appointments were made, the appointees should be officers, holding for a term of four years, and during that term protected from the perils caused by the pressure of others for the places held by them, by a provision that they may be removed by the board only after due investigation, for causes affecting their official character or competency. This certainly does not protect them against the abolition of the office. And who is to abolish it? The legislature did not establish it, or determine the question of the expediency or necessity of establishing it. It delegated to another the power to establish it when that other should deem it necessary,—ex necessitati,—that carried with it the power to abolish, whenever there was no longer a necessity to maintain that which had been so established. And we are not without an expression of legislative judgment as to whether or not these offices should be abolished. The general provisions of law for the organization, powers, and duties of the board of state harbor commissioners are, and since 1872 have been, found in the article on that subject in the Political Code. But the whole law affecting said board is not found there. In reference to this board, and the subject-matter of its jurisdiction, the legislature has been in the habit, as it has in reference to other subject-matters embraced in the Codes, of legislating from time to time by acts other than those amendatory of the Codes. Whether this was wise or unwise is not for us to say. Our duty is to examine and construe these acts and the Codes together, and whenever they are not in conflict with each other, to give force and effect to both. In 1878 the legislature passed "An act concerning the water front of the city and county of San Francisco," (St. 1877-78, p. 417.) This act conferred certain powers, and imposed certain duties, upon the board of state harbor commissioners, not imposed or conferred by the provisions of the Code. In 1880 another act was passed, amendatory of the one last mentioned, and conferring further powers on the board of state harbor commissioners. St. 1880, p. 10. Section 4 of that act reads as follows: "Sec. 4. As soon as practicable the rates of wharfage on merchandise and other articles must be adjusted and classified upon such system, and be collected in such manner, and by such officers, as the commissioners may determine and direct. The duties of such officers, their compensation and amount of bond for faithful performance of duty, shall be fixed by the commissioners. When such system is put in force, no tolls must be collected by the load or vehicle on any merchandise passing on or off the wharves, and the system of collection by toll collectors must cease." This provision still remains in force, unless repealed by implication, by the passage of the amendments made to the Code in 1883. There is nothing in the act making those amendments touching upon the subject-matter of this provision, or in conflict with it, unless it be held that the provision authorizing the board to appoint such number of collectors as it should deem necessary, and fixing their terms of office, is so in conflict. We do not think the two provisions conflict with each other. They certainly do not to such an extent that force and effect may not be given to both; and, if it had been intended by the latter act to have repealed the former, it would have been easy to say so, but this was not done. On the contrary, in the Code itself we find a provision looking to the same result. In section 2524, as it was passed in 1876, and still remains unchanged, we find the following provision: "And the commissioners and the mayor of San Francisco may so modify and establish such rates of dockage and wharfage as will produce a revenue not to exceed in amount the moneys collected in the year 1875, collecting, as near as possible, equal amounts from dockage and wharfage. When such modification has been made the collection of tolls must be abolished, and the toll collectors discharged."

It will thus be seen that as early as 1876 the legislature contemplated and authorized the adoption of a system by the board, by means of which the army of toll collectors on the city front should be withdrawn. To hasten the coming of that period the act of 1880 enlarged their discretion as to the kind of system which might be adopted, and enabled the board to act without the aid of the mayor in the matter, and, when the legislature of 1883 came to revise and remodel the Code on the subject, it left both provisions in full force, at least in so far as related to the discharge of toll collectors. If it should be said that only one of the two systems could be adopted, then, of course, it would be the one last provided for, and as that is practically the system which the board has adopted, and it accomplishes the result, it follows that the will of the legislature is being carried into effect.

Our conclusion therefore is that the board had full power to abolish the office as it did, without regard to the term of the officer, and thereupon discharge him; and that from the date when the office was so abolished, and he discharged, the plaintiff had no further claim upon the board, either to accept his service or to render him compensation. The writ is denied, and the complaint dismissed.

Beatty, C. J. and Works, J. We concur. The defendant is an executive board, created by law, and charged with the care and improvement of the water front of San Francisco. It has control of certain wharves, docks, slips, etc., and collects wharfage, tolls, and other charges for the use thereof. It was first organized under the act to "provide for the improvement and protection of the wharves, docks, and water front of the city and county of San Francisco," approved April 24, 1863, (St. 1863, p. 406.) From time to time this act has been amended and supplemented. It was carried into the Political Code upon its adoption in 1872, and has since been remodeled at different sessions of the legislature. From the establishment of the board down to the year 1883, the commissioners were authorized to appoint wharfingers and toll collectors; the provision concerning these employes in the last amendment of the Political Code, previous to 1883, being as follows: "Said commissioners shall also appoint a sufficient number of persons wharfingers to collect the revenue arising from dockage, cranage, rents, and tolls by authority of this article, and may also appoint a sufficient number of persons toll collectors to collect the tolls authorized by this article." Pol. Code, § 2522, amendments of 1876. In 1883 the Political Code was so amended as to effect a complete reorganization of the board, and the provisions relating to wharfingers and collectors were radically changed. By section 2521 it was enacted that "the board, [the new board,] on entering on the duties of their office, must appoint the following officers, viz., a secretary, an assistant secretary, an attorney, a chief engineer, a chief wharfinger and such number of wharfingers and collectors as they deem necessary. Such officers shall hold for a term of four years from the dates of their respective appointments, but may be removed by the board at any time, after due investigation, for causes affecting their official character or competency. The order for such removal, stating distinctly the causes therefor, must be entered on their minutes. In case of a vacancy in such offices by the expiration of a term, or for any other cause, the board must fill the same by an appointment for four years." By section 2522, prescribing the duties of the various officers, it was provided that "the wharfingers shall have supervision of the wharves to which they are assigned, and must require the regulations of the board and orders of the chief wharfinger to be respected and obeyed, and good order to be preserved thereon. The collectors must collect the revenues in such manner as the board may direct, and must daily account for and pay all moneys into the office. The wharfingers and collectors must each take and subscribe an official oath, and give such official bond as the board may require. * * * All the above named officers must perform such other duties pertaining to their positions as the board may from time to time prescribe." Section 2552 provides for the salaries of officers, and fixes that of the wharfingers at $125, and that of collectors at $100, per month. Under this amended and revised statute the present board was organized, and on the 9th of June, 1887, the plaintiff was appointed a collector.

Recently the board has decided to introduce some changes in their system of collecting revenues, which render the services of some of its collectors unnecessary, and for that reason alone they have undertaken to remove the plaintiff from his position, and to abolish his office. There is no charge against him affecting his official character or competency, but he has, by resolution of the board, after notice of its intention so to do, been removed, in the interest of economy in the administration of its business. No person has been appointed to succeed him, and there is no intention to make such appointment. On the contrary the office, so far as the board has the power to abolish it, is abolished. The plaintiff, claiming to be an officer with a fixed term and stated salary, has instituted this original proceeding by mandamus to compel the defendant to pay him the salary accrued since the date of its order declaring his removal. It is admitted that his salary since that date has not been paid; that the defendant has funds to pay, and that it is its plain statutory duty to pay, if the plaintiff is, notwithstanding its order of removal, still a collector. It is further admitted that the plaintiff has no other plain, speedy, or adequate remedy, and, in short, that, if the defendant had no power to abolish the collectorship held by the plaintiff, he is entitled to a peremptory writ. Had the defendant such power? If section 2521, as re-enacted in 1883, is constitutional and valid, we do not see how it can be so construed as to allow the removal of the collector except for one of the causes enumerated, nor how the board could, in such case, refuse to fill the vacancy thereby created by a new appointment for a term of four years, however useless the services of such collector may have become. The result of this construction seems to be absurd, and it may well be supposed that it was not actually contemplated by the legislature; but, in seeking the intent of the law-makers, we must be guided by the terms of the law if they are plain and unambiguous, and we cannot, even for the purpose of avoiding serious inconvenience, adopt a construction in conflict with the obvious effect of the language of a statute.

We discover no ambiguity here. On the contrary, the legislature has plainly said that the board of harbor commissioners, on entering on the duties of their office, shall appoint a secretary and certain other named officers, and also as many wharfingers and collectors as they deem necessary. These latter, like the rest, are to be officers, with prescribed duties, a fixed term for four years, and stated salaries. They are to take the oath of office, and furnish bonds, and are to be irremovable during the term for which they are appointed, except after notice and hearing upon charges affecting their official character and competency. Moreover, for each wharfinger or collector appointed an office is created,—a collectorship or wharfingership,—which thereafter continues in permanence, and must be filled for a full term of four years whenever it becomes vacant by expiration of a term or for any other cause. It may be created—a hundred or a thousand collectorships or wharfingerships may be created—by the board, but not one can be abolished. The highest number created at any time is, for all future time, the minimum number of said offices until the legislature shall intervene and abolish so many as it may deem to be superfluous. It matters not how clearly it may be demonstrated that, under a new and improved system of administration, the services of many or most of these officers could be profitably dispensed with, the board which created the offices cannot abolish them, but must go on in the old way until the legislature comes to its relief. We cannot, we repeat, see any way to avoid this conclusion, if section 2521 is, in all respects, constitutional and valid.

Counsel for defendant have referred us to a provision contained in an independent statute passed in 1880, (St. 1880, p. 10,) and also contained in section 2524 of the Political Code, which they contend modifies the construction, or changes the operation, of section 2521, but we do not think this contention can be maintained. The provision in question is one which, in substance, empowers the board to fix its revenue upon a basis which will admit of the abolition of tolls, and directs the commissioners thereupon to abolish tolls and discharge the toll collectors. But this provision existed not only in the statutes, but in the Political Code, before the revision of 1883, and referred exclusively to the tolls collected from wagons and other vehicles passing to and from the wharves and slips. It had no reference to the wharfingers, or to the charges collected by them for dockage, etc. By the revision of 1883 the collectors therein provided for were charged with the collection of the entire revenue of the board, including that part formerly collected by the wharfingers, —in other words, the collectors under the new law differ from the toll collectors under the old law, not only in name but in function, and the collectors cannot be discharged, as provided in the statute of 1880 and the corresponding provisions of section 2524 with respect to the toll collectors, without discharging the only persons who, under the new system, have anything to do with the collection of the revenue of the board. This being so, the mere fact that in re-enacting section 2524 in 1887 and 1889, for the purpose of amending it in other particulars, this old and obsolete clause referring to the toll collectors was re-enacted, will not justify us in holding that the legislature intended thereby to alter or modify the operation of the provisions of section 2521 respecting the term and tenure of the collectors.

But satisfied, as we are, that under the statute, considered by itself, the defendant has no power to remove the plaintiff upon the ground assigned for their action, we are nevertheless not satisfied that his position can be sustained. If the appointment of each collector by the board creates an office which can only be abolished by law, then the act of the board in making the appointment, and thus creating the office, has all the force and effect of a statute, and we are brought to the inquiry whether the legislature can in this way delegate to a board of three persons the power to make laws creating offices to be filled by officers holding for the full constitutional term of four years, with salaries payable out of the public revenues, and irremovable during the term prescribed. It is settled, we suppose, beyond controversy that the power delegated to the legislature to make laws cannot be delegated by the legislature to any subordinate body, and if the power to be exercised by the board of harbor commissioners, under the provisions of section 2521, according to the construction which the plaintiff contends for, and which we are unable to deny, amounts, in effect, to the law-making power, it follows that such provisions must be unconstitutional.

We think that the creation of an office with permanent tenure, and salary payable out of the public revenues, which must continue to exist until abolished by statute, can only be accomplished by the exercise of a power essentially legislative, a power which the legislature alone possesses under the constitution, and which cannot be delegated.

We do not question the power of the legislature to authorize an executive board, such as the harbor commissioners, to appoint persons to fill offices which have been created by law, nor its power to give to such appointees a permanent tenure of their office within constitutional limits. Nor do we deny the validity of a provision which protects subordinate employes in public institutions from arbitrary removal from their positions in order to make room for others. We merely hold that the legislature cannot commit to the discretion of others the important function of creating public offices in unlimited or indefinite number,—offices which the power creating them is incompetent to abolish.

DALTON v. LEAHEY. (No. 12,051.)

REFORMATION OF DEED.

In a suit to have a deed absolute in form declared a mortgage, where the allegations of the complaint and the evidence are that the money received by plaintiff was a loan, and not for the purchase of the property, a finding that there was a parol agreement that plaintiff could buy the land back at any time, by paying the price he had received, with interest, is outside the pleadings, and unsupported by the proof.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; T. H. REARDEN, Judge.

Craig & Meredith, for appellant. Kellogg & King, for respondent.

WORKS, J. This action was brought to have a deed, absolute in form, declared a mortgage. The court below found that the instrument was not a mortgage, but a conveyance in satisfaction of a debt due from the grantor to the grantee, and rendered judgment for the defendant. Counsel for appellant contend that the findings of the court are not sustained by the evidence; but we think otherwise. It is further claimed that the findings are contradictory, and do not support the conclusions of law and judgment. Some countenance is given to this claim by the finding of a parol agreement that the plaintiff should have the privilege of receiving back the property at any time by paying the price for which he sold the same, with interest; but this finding was outside of the issues, and was without any evidence to support it. The whole contention of the plaintiff, as shown by his complaint, and the evidence given to support it, was that the money received by him was a loan, and not for the purchase of the property, and that the instrument in controversy was a mortgage to secure such loan. There was no claim that the deed was either a conditional or a trust deed. We think this finding should not have been made, but it cannot so far affect the other findings as to justify a reversal of the case. As conclusions of law, the court found that the deed was not given as a mortgage, or as security for the payment of any indebtedness; that the relation of debtor and creditor, or mortgagor and mortgagee, did not exist between the parties, but that the grantee received and held the property as a trustee, for plaintiff's benefit, with the right to be reimbursed as such trustee for his outlay, but that under the complaint the plaintiff was not entitled to an accounting, or leave to redeem, or any other relief; and that the defendant was entitled to a judgment dismissing the action without prejudice. Judgment was entered accordingly. These conclusions of law are somewhat confusing; but the only criticism that can be made upon them is that, so far as they found the existence of a trust, they were outside of the issues, and were unwarranted by the evidence. They were more favorable to the appellant than we think they should have been, but we will not reverse the case for that reason.

Reade v. Reade. (No. 12,503.)

Divorce—A Mensa et Thoro.

Under Civil Code Cal. § 136, providing "though judgment of divorce is denied, the court may, in an action for divorce, provide for the maintenance of the wife and her children, or any of them, by the husband," a divorce a mensa et thoro with alimony cannot be granted, where there is no statutory ground for an absolute divorce, or for the absence of the wife from her husband's home. Hagle v. Hagle, 16 Pac. Rep. 518, followed.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Marin county; E. B. Mahon, Judge.

Action by Louise J. Reade against F. W. Reade, for a dissolution of marriage on the ground of cruelty, for the custody of the children of the marriage, and for alimony. The court found "that the manner of defendant towards plaintiff has been cold, perhaps harsh; that the charge of extreme cruelty on the part of husband (defendant) towards the wife (plaintiff) has not been made out; that both parties to this action are more or less to blame for the relations now existing between them." The court refused a divorce, but decreed a separation, and awarded the custody of the children, with alimony, to the wife.

William C. Flint, for appellant. James A. Waymire and F. M. Angelotti, for respondent.

Per Curiam. On the authority of Hagle v. Hagle 74 Cal. 608, 16 Pac. Rep. 518, the judgment is reversed, and cause remanded, with directions to the court below to enter judgment in favor of the defendant on the findings.
